Resolved, That we extend our sympathy to the house of Stillman, Allen & Co., for the double loss which they have sustained in this sad catastrophe, and express our assurance that in the death of Messrs. Alfred Stillman and Edward C. Storm, they are deprived of two most faithful and vigilant representatives of their interests, as well as warm-hearted and affectionate personal friends.

D. G. WELLS, Chairman.

N. M. STRATTON, Secretary.

THE SUNDAY IN CALIFORNIA.

It is stated that the people of Sacramento City, California, have passed a stringent ordinance against the violation of what they call the Sabbath. All theatrical performances, bull-fights and equestrian exhibitions on Sunday, are forbidden under a penalty of from $100 to $1,000. Gambling saloons, drinking shops and business houses, are to be closed, under a penalty of from $100 to $500. In San Francisco, also, as appears by the following extract from a paper printed in that city, efforts have been made, though unsuccessfully, to secure the enactment of laws for the better observance of Sunday:—

> "We think it high time (says the San Francisco Courier) that our Common Council take some action in the same line. Sunday, with us, is getting to be a day for the practice of all sorts of wickedness. Hundreds, perhaps thousands of splendid drinking saloons, and low groceries, in tents and by the way-side, are in full blast on the Sabbath. Men go reeling, from morning till morning again, through the streets, shouting and hallooing as though possessed of the devil—and unless police officers are properly commissioned and paid for keeping the peace of the city, we shall soon, as our population increases, be in a very unenviable condition. Sunday night is the night for Chilenos, Mexicans, and Kanackas, in San Francisco. Fandangoes, in which rowdy Americans participate, abound in all the outskirts of the city, and at these, knives and pistols are often brought into requisition. Frequent attempts have been made by Alderman Gillespie and others, in the Board of Aldermen, to break up this rowdyism, but nothing has, as yet, been done. Are any of our city fathers pecuniarily benefited by this state of things on the Sabbath?"

A CARD FROM ELD. SAMUEL DAVISON.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Permit me to say, through the Sabbath Recorder, that I have accepted an appointment from the American Bible Union, as agent for the State of Illinois and adjacent parts of Indiana, Iowa and Wisconsin. I shall not, however, leave my present engagements with the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society, until a reasonable time has elapsed to enable the Board and the brethren here to make arrangements to supply my place with an approved successor. I contemplate no change in my place of family residence, nor in my church relations. I expect to retain my standing in the Farmington church, and my post-office address will continue the same. The restoration of Jehovah's Holy Sabbath is an object that still lies near my heart; but I regard the objects of the American Bible Union as second to none now before the Christian world. To secure a perfect translation of the Holy Scriptures in the English language, appears to me an object of vast importance to the interests of truth and righteousness in the earth; and I hope the observers of the Sabbath will be among its warm and steady friends. The constitution and movements of this Society are of the most liberal and Christian character, and I have sanguine hopes of seeing it effect great good in the Christian world.

Your fellow laborer in the cause of truth in the world. S. DAVISON.

HABEAS CORPUS AND JURY TRIAL.—The Legislature of Vermont, at its recent session, passed a law, giving to persons claimed as fugitive slaves the benefit of habeas corpus and of trial by jury in the State Courts, and requiring the State's Attorneys in the several counties to act for the parties arrested as fugitives, to see that they have their rights. This movement has excited a good deal of feeling in some sections of the South, where it is denounced as treasonable. There is not much likelihood that the General Government will interfere with the action of sovereign States in protecting their own inhabitants within their own territory.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR BIBLE DISTRIBUTION.—At a meeting of the Board of the American Bible Union, held on the 9th inst., $1000 was appropriated, through the American Baptist Missionary Union, for the circulation of the Scriptures in the Karen language; $1000, through the Southern Baptist Triennial Convention, for the circulation of the Scriptures in the Chinese language; and $1000, through the English Baptist Missionary Society, for the circulation of the Scriptures in the native languages of India.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION MISSION.—I wish to say, through the Recorder, to the brethren of the Seventh-day Baptist Central Association, that I commenced my missionary labors on the 17th of September last, have been in the field ever since, and expect to continue. A full report of my labors will be presented at the semi-annual meeting of the Association at Lincklaen. ELIAS BURDICK.

THANKSGIVING AT THE "FIVE POINTS."—Under the direction of Rev. Mr. Pease, a thanksgiving supper was got up for the children connected with the mission schools at the "Five Points," New York. The scene is described by those who were present as truly cheering. About two hundred children were collected, whose smiling faces and tidy garments showed what improvement a few months can make in those who have long been familiar with beggary and want. In describing the affair, a correspondent of the Tribune says:—

> "There were no languid tastes—no sickly appetites—but, ready for the onslaught, they went into the Turkey, Goose, Chicken, Beef, Bread, Oranges, Raisins, Pies and Cakes, with a determination to enjoy, for once in their long history, something better than "cold victuals." Who that beheld those happy children, under such fine government, could refrain from envying the joy experienced by the Rev. Mr. Pease and his lady, together with the officers and teachers of the different schools, as they looked on the fruit of their arduous labors and prayers? What just cause for gratitude to God, who has in so singular a manner blessed the efforts of this mission! At the close of the Supper, addresses were made to the children, and a thanksgiving hymn was sung, composed expressly for the occasion by Mrs. Pease."

IMPRISONMENT FOR DISTRIBUTING TRACTS.—At a court held in Salem, North Carolina, on the 7th of October, Jesse McBride and Adam Crooks, two Wesleyan Methodist preachers, were tried on an indictment charging them with circulating a tract called "The Ten Commandments," with intent to excite insurrection, conspiracy, and resistance in the slaves. It was proved that McBride give such a tract to a little Sunday-school girl in the absence of Crooks, and that he had said that he would preach the truth independently—that he was not in favor of amalgamation or insurrection; was opposed to war of all kinds; would not have the slaves take swords and guns and murder their masters; he was the friend both of the slave and his master. Crooks had said that he would suffer his right arm to be cut off rather than withhold the truth. The jury acquitted Crooks, and found McBride guilty; whereupon the Court passed the following sentence:—

That Bro. McBride should stand in the pillory one hour, receive twenty stripes, and be imprisoned in the county jail one year, and that the sheriff proceed to inflict the penalty immediately.

An appeal was taken to the Supreme Court, which arrested the execution until January.

THE AMERICAN ART-UNION.—This Institution was incorporated by the Legislature of the State of New York for the promotion of the Fine Arts in the United States. Every subscriber of $5 is a member for the year, and is entitled to all its privileges. The money thus obtained (after paying necessary expenses,) is applied as follows:—1st. To the production of a large and costly Original Engraving from an American painting, together with a set of outlines, or some other similar Work of Art. 2d. To the purchase of Paintings and Sculpture, Statuettes in bronze, and Medals, by native or resident artists. 3d. To the keeping of an office and free Picture Gallery, always open, well attended, and hung with fine paintings, at 487 Broadway, New York, where the business of the Institution is transacted. The receipts of the year ending Dec. 20, 1850, were $96,492 88. The pictures, bronzes and medals purchased during the year were distributed by lot among the members last Sixth-day evening. The interest awakened by the event was very like that which would attend the drawing of any lottery.

FUGITIVE SLAVE CASE.—In Philadelphia, last Sabbath, a colored man named Gibson was arrested on the charge of being a fugitive slave, the property of Wm. Knight, of Cecil County, Maryland. The Commissioner, after examining the papers, handed him over to the Marshall, and he was at once started for Maryland. Subsequently facts came to light which rendered it probable that the whole affair was a gross outrage. The Philadelphia correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune says it is the opinion of eminent legal gentlemen, that the man is innocent; that he is not a fugitive slave. The case was hurried off, the most groundless testimony admitted against the man, and not a single lawyer defended him.

OPPRESSING THE SOUTH.—The Mobile Advertiser says that while the disunion and secession orators in the South, who are mostly lawyers, assert that the people are awfully oppressed by the general government—robbed, degraded, &c.—it is a fact, which no intelligent man will deny, that the people of the South were never more prosperous since the country was settled. "Every kind of property sells readily, and at fair prices, while cotton is selling at 14 cents, and negro fellows from eight hundred to one thousand dollars."

STEAMBOAT DISASTER AND LOSS OF LIFE.—A dispatch to the N. Y. Tribune, dated Pittsburg, Pa., Dec. 20, says that the flue of the steamboat Fashion, No. 2, collapsed that afternoon at 3 o'clock on the Monongahela river a short distance above town, causing the instant death of several of the crew and passengers, and seriously, if not mortally, scalding others. The boat is almost a total wreck. The forward part of the cabin and steps were blown overboard, and the after part of the boat shared about the same fate. The persons killed were blown overboard, and their bodies had not been recovered.

SECOND-DAY, Dec. 16.

In the SENATE, Mr. Benton introduced a bill to povide for the location and construction of a railroad and common highway from the Mississippi River, at St. Louis, to the bay of San Francisco, and to extinguish the Indian title to the lands along said highway; to establish military posts and grant land to actual settlers thereon. Mr. Benton explained, in a long speech, his bill. It embraces a railroad, plank road, good common road for wagons and horses; also, for pedestrians. The main road goes straight to the Pacific, and will be sixteen hundred miles long, with two branches, one to Santa Fé, 300 miles long, and another to Oregon, 500 miles long. The grant of land to be 100 miles wide, and the whole amount of land to be about 150 millions of acres.

The Senate then passed the bill extending the Charter of the Potomac Insurance Co., with a clause making stockholders individually liable.

[While this was under consideration, Jenny Lind came into the gallery, and caused considerable commotion, though it does not seem that the proceedings of the floor were seriously interrupted.]

A Message from the President, announcing officially the acceptance by Texas of the proposition made to her by the United States for the settlement of her State boundaries, was received, read, and ordered to be printed.

The Chair laid before the Senate the Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which was referred to the Finance Committee, and its printing ordered.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, the New York Branch Mint was made the order of the day for the second Third-day in January.

The Speaker laid before the House a Message from the President of the United States, announcing to Congress the agreement on the part of Texas to the proposition offered to that State on the 9th of Sept., in the act proposing the Northern limit and boundary, the relinquishment of certain territory, and the establishment of the Territorial Government of New Mexico.

Mr. Meade asked, but did not obtain, leave to introduce a resolution for the appointment of a Select Committee of Nine to inquire into the expediency of dividing the Public Lands among the States in proportion to population for internal improvements and educational purposes, on certain conditions.

The Cheap Postage Bill was made the order for next Fourth-day.

The affairs of the new Territories were set down for consideration on three days in the first week of February.

A resolution was adopted inquiring into the propriety of withdrawing our squadron from the Coast of Africa.

THIRD-DAY, Dec. 17.

In the SENATE, Mr. Foote presented the resolutions of the Legislature of Mississippi condemning his course on the "Peace Measures." The question of printing the President's Message in the Spanish, German, and Norwegian languages, was debated, but not acted upon. The death of Mr. Harmonson, of La., was announced, eulogies delivered, resolutions adopted, and the Senate adjourned.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, the death of John H. Harmonson, Representative from Louisiana, was announced as having taken place at New Orleans last October. The usual resolutions were adopted, and the House adjourned.

FOURTH-DAY, Dec. 18.

In the SENATE, on motion of Gen. Cass, his resolution relative to diplomatic intercourse with Austria, was laid over. Fifteen hundred extra copies of the Report on the Slave Trade were ordered to be printed. The resolution about removals from office coming up, the course of Gen. Lane and Col. Weller was discussed during the remainder of the day.

In the HOUSE, cheap postage was discussed by Messrs. Potter, Carter, Ashmun, Venable, Sackett, and Brown. The bill on which this discussion hinges, will be found in another column. Several amendments to it were proposed, but not acted upon.

FIFTH-DAY, Dec. 19.

In the SENATE, Mr. Bradbury's resolution in regard to removals from office came up, but was postponed. A large part of the day was spent in discussing the Act to Promote the Progress of the Useful Arts. An amendment was adopted, providing that every person sued for violating a patent may by legal process compel the patentee to prove the validity of his patent.

The HOUSE, in Committee of the Whole, listened to the farther discussion of the Cheap Postage Bill. No vote was taken.

SIXTH-DAY, Dec. 10.

The SENATE was not in session, having adjorned over from Fifth-day to Second-day.

The HOUSE refused to take up the Cheap Postage Bill, and spent the day on private bills. Two were passed and three laid on the table; after which the House adjourned till Second-day.

Bill to Reduce and Modify the Rates of Postage in the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That letters carried in the mail of the United States shall be charged with postage as follows:—

Upon each letter not weighing over one-half ounce, when postage is paid where such letter is mailed, three cents; and for each additional half ounce, when so prepaid, there shall be charged three cents. There shall be charged upon each unpaid letter weighing not more than one-half ounce five cents, and for each additional half-ounce, or fraction of half an ounce, when so unpaid, the sum of five cents.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, There shall be charged on each newspaper, of no greater size than nineteen hundred square inches, transmitted through the mails from the office of publication to any place out of the State where published, the sum of one cent; and for any such newspaper delivered within the State where published, the sum of one-half cent; and each newspaper of larger dimensions than above specified, shall be charged with an additional rate for each additional nineteen hundred square inches or fractions thereof. And all pamphlets, periodicals, magazines, and every other description of printed matter, (except newspapers,) which shall be unconnected with any manuscript or written matter, and which it is or may be lawful to transmit through the mails of the United States, shall be chargeable with postage at the rate of two cents for each copy sent of no greater weight than one ounce, and one cent in addition for each additional ounce or fraction of an ounce. Bound books not weighing over thirty-two ounces shall be deemed mailable matter under the foregoing provisions, any thing in the fifteenth section of the act approved March third, eighteen hundred and forty-five, to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the directors of the mints in the United States are authorized and required to coin pieces of the value of three cents, composed of three parts silver and one part alloy, which shall be a lawful tender for all debts due to the government of the United States, and to individuals, persons and corporations.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, It shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to provide and furnish to all deputy postmasters, and other persons applying and paying therefor, suitable stamps of the denomination of three cents, to facilitate the prepayment of the postages provided for in this act. And to any person who shall desire to purchase of the Postmaster General, or of any deputy postmaster, at any one time an amount of stamps to the value of fifty dollars or upwards, such stamps shall be furnished at a discount of ten per cent. upon their par value. All deputy postmasters who shall receive at any one time stamps to the amount of fifty dollars, shall be allowed a deduction of ten per cent. upon their par value.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That there is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of one million five hundred thousand dollars, to supply any deficiency that may arise in the Post Office Department.

Seven Days Later from Europe.

The British Steamer Africa, with seven days later news from Europe, arrived at New York on the night of the 22d inst. The advices brought by her are not important.

In England, there has been, perhaps, a slight abatement in the agitation of the Papal usurpation alarm; but the newspapers are still full of public meetings, leading articles, and letters on this subject.

In the Assembly of France, the principal point of interest has been the grant of money to increase the army by 40,000 men. The plan of the Government in ordering this increase is warmly opposed by the Committee to whom the subject was referred.

The trouble in Germany is at an end for the present. The danger of war—never very great—is considered as reduced to the lowest possibility, if not totally removed.

From Constantinople we have intelligence of considerable interest. Previous advices from Aleppo were to Nov. 2d. The situation in which things were then placed was such that a crisis was imminent. It has taken place, and the authority of the Sultan has been reëstablished by a vigorous blow, as will be seen by the following letter from Constantinople of the 20th Nov.:—

"I avail myself of an English boat to inform you of the terrible chastisement inflicted on the insurgents of Aleppo. On the evening of the 7th ult., Kerim Pacha invited the principal chiefs of the insurgents to come to him. They accepted his invitation, persuaded that the fear of fresh disturbances would make them respected. Kerim Pacha had them placed under arrest. The insurgents, finding their chiefs did not return, rushed to arms, and came in number about 10,000, and instantly demanded their liberation. The Ottoman General expected this, and replied to their demand by charging them at the head of 4,000 Imperial troops whom he had assembled in the inside of some barracks. The combat was desperate, and lasted more than 24 hours, but the result was favorable to the Turks. Three Mussulmen quarters, Karlek, Bab Coussa, and El Bab Neirab, which were the seat of the revolt, have been almost entirely destroyed. 1,800 of the rebels fell in the struggle, and the remainder, with the inhabitants of the above quarters, have fled from Aleppo, the Turkish cavalry pursuing them. Not a single Christian fell in this terrible affair. All the property of the rebels will be devoted by the authorities to indemnify the Christians for their losses on the 14th and 15th October, and to rebuild the three Churches which were burnt."

Fifteen Days Later from California.

The steamer Cherokee, from Chagres, arrived at New York on Sixth-day last, bring- 371 passengers, two million dollars in gold dust, and news from California to Nov. 14.

By this arrival we have sad accounts of the ravages committed by Cholera. In San Francisco, during the three weeks since its first appearance, only about 135 deaths had occurred; but in Sacramento the bill of mortality had been much greater, reaching several hundred, and perhaps one thousand. We are glad to have it to say, that when the steamer sailed, the scourge was abating, and that the deaths in either place averaged only eight or ten per day. A few cases had occurred at Nevada City, Rough and Ready, and some other towns, but in these places it was abating.

Mining operations, during the past season, have not been very productive, although the aggregate yield looks quite large. "Prospecting" for rich "gulches," and other "washings" has seen its best days, and turning rivers for the sake of washing their beds has generally proved a failure. Regular mining, or extracting the gold from the quartz rock in position, must henceforth be the main reliance, and this appears to be prosecuted with success wherever skill, capital, and proper machinery, are employed. During the approaching Winter, a much larger number of miners will remain in the mountains than ever before, and consequently more gold will be taken out than during any previous Winter season.

Indian difficulties had broken out afresh in the upper country, and several skirmishes had taken place, with the loss of a number of lives. It was thought that the matter would soon be settled.

Speaking of crops in the mountains, Alta Californian says that as fine crops have been made among the placers this year as can be produced any where. No tract of land in the Great West can show finer corn or vegetables than have been raised among the mountains between the Toulumne and the Stanislaus Rivers. Wherever the soil can be irrigated, there it produces admirably, and fruit is easily and abundantly produced.

Business has been greatly depressed, mainly in consequence of the Cholera, but was recovering at the latest dates.

Gov. Burnett recommended the 30th of November, as a day of Thanksgiving to the Supreme Ruler of the Universe.

Steamboat Disasters at New Orleans.

Since our last paper went to press, news has been received of three awful steamboat disasters in the vicinity of New Orleans. The first occurred on Sixth-day, Dec. 13, and is described as follows in telegraphic dispatches to the New York papers:—

While the tow-boat 'Anglo Norman' was on a pleasure excursion up the river, her boiler burst, and we have a fearful loss of life to record. Over 100 of our most respectable citizens, and several ladies, were on board. Junius Beebe, late President of the Tow-Boat Company, is missing. C. Perry, Reporter of the Bulletin; Alfred Stillman and Edward C. Storms of the Novelty Works, New York, and the First Engineer, were all killed, along with, it is supposed, fifteen others, whose names are as yet unknown. Many were severely scalded, and others slightly injured, including the Reporters of the Delta and Crescent.

The second disaster occurred on Fourth-day, Dec. 18, and is thus described by telegraph:—

The steamer Knoxville, bound for Nashville, while pushing from the Levee burst all her boilers, killing and wounding several persons, and also damaging other boats lying alongside. About twenty persons were killed and wounded. All four of her boilers exploded, one of which was thrown a distance of nearly a hundred yards, and another passed through the steamer Washington, and landed on the Griffin Yeatman.

The third disaster is thus announced in a dispatch dated New Orleans, Fourth-day, Dec. 18:—

Another distressing steamboat accident—the third within a week—occurred on our river last night, when the steamer South America took fire near Bayou Gava, and in less than twenty minutes was totally destroyed. Thirty or forty lives were lost by this calamity. She had on board two hundred persons, including one hundred United States soldiers, seven of whom perished, who were going to Texas. The passengers lost all their baggage. Many were compelled to jump overboard, and were drowned.

From the West Indies.

The cholera was raging in Jamaica up to the 12th inst. A local Board of Health had been organized at Kingston. The parishes were greatly distressed by the prevalence of the epidemic.

At a meeting of the Council at Kingston, the Attorney General referred to the probable condition of the estates in the Island when the Cholera shall have disappeared. He said it was well known, that the havoc that disease was making was among the laboring class of the population, and that several estates are at this present moment without laborers; the cotton cultivation will fail for want of labor—and, to instil confidence in the minds of the public, he would, at a very early day, move that a message be sent to his Excellency the Governor to make an application to the Home Government for African laborers, to supply the depopulated estates—he meant those Africans who were captured from slavers, and are at the depot in Sierra Leone.

The Trinidad papers contain a communication from the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, to David Turnbull, Esq., upon the subject of Colored Immigration from the United States of America. The Secretary transmits with this communication a memorandum explanatory of Lord Grey's views upon the subject, and mentions that should Mr. Turnbull concur in those views, his Lordship would propose forwarding copies of the memorandum to the Governors of the West India Colonies, and would also request Viscount Palmerston to send some of them to the British Consuls for circulation at those places in the United States from which emigrants would be likely to go.

Whalers at the Sandwich Islands.

The Polynesian of Oct. 19th, received by the Cherokee, has the following:—

By reference to our shipping lists of the past and present week, it will be seen that the harbors of Honolulu and Lahaina are well filled with whalers from their Summer cruise in the Northern seas in this longitude. And it is a source of sincere congratulation that such almost unprecedented success has attended them, and that most of them are full or have taken an unusual amount of oil during the season. Vessels are reported but 14 months from home, and with a six months voyage to the whaling ground, with 2,700, 2,900, 3,260, 3,300 barrels of oil, and bone in proportion; and three ships, 15 months out, with 3,200, 2,930, and 2,460 barrels, respectively. But the most successful of all are, the Vesper, 13 months, with 2,700 whale and 330 sperm; the Huntsville, 11 months, with 3,500 whale; the Sheffield, 12 months, with 3,200 whale; and the Hannibal, 13 months, with 25 sperm, and 3,500 whale. These may be called splendid voyages, and as productive as the placers of California; and attended with much less risk to the moral and physical constitution than digging gold in the Sierra Nevada. Short voyages, with a full ship bound home, are rather pleasant circumstances for the whalemen; and a greater number never left this port than will sail hence this Fall in this category.

SUPPRESSION OF GAMBLING.—We learn from the Cincinnati Chronicle, that the police of that city, instituted an investigation by which they ascertained that between 40 and 50 different houses and rooms for gambling were in full operation, and counted between 400 and 500 persons, mostly young men of the industrious laboring classes, surrounding the tables and staking their small and hard earnings on the game of "quino." The Police Officers, having made all their arrangements, fixed on Sunday night as the time for making a descent upon the gambling houses. Several of the keepers of these houses got wind of the movement in time to close their rooms before the arrival of the officers. Quite a number, however, were caught in the very act, and taken before the Mayor, and held to bail in $1,000 each to appear at Court.

THE BABES IN THE SNOW.—A correspondent of the Boston Transcript narrates a singular incident which happened in the village of Piedmont, N. H., last week. Two little children, one five and the other three years of age, strayed from home. Not returning at dark, a general search throughout the night was made by the people of the village. In the morning the children were discovered in an open field, lying upon the frozen ground and locked in each other's arms, one sleeping soundly, and the other awake. Although the night was a severe one, the little ones have shown as yet no ill effects from the exposure. It is wonderful how two such little children could pass a winter's night upon the frozen ground without perishing.

WEARING AWAY.—A few evenings since, says the Buffalo Express of Dec. 14, another mass of rock was dislodged from the brink of the precipice at Niagara Falls, and plunged into the abyss below. The portion which has gone this time was from the bed of the river, beneath where a canal-boat had been lying for the past year. The mass was some eight rods long and as many wide, and now occupies and fills up the pathway to Termination Rock. The crash of the fall was heard distinctly for more than a mile, and in the immediate vicinity of the Falls it seemed to shake old earth to her center. Thus we have daily evidences that the Falls are wearing away, and ages hence the great wonder of the world may be alongside our own goodly city.

ALLIGATOR SHOOTING.—On a recent trip of the R. C. Oglesby from New Orleans to Alexandria, in about one hour, and in a run of twenty miles, three passengers killed 55 alligators. These creatures have been driven out of the Mississippi river, but the number does not seem to diminish on Red River. Every boat plying on that river carries guns and ammunition, and the passengers and officers amuse themselves in killing these lizards. Thousands are annually destroyed; but the dismal region extending from the mouth for one hundred and fifty miles, furnishes them retreats in which their young are reared. They are as abundant now as they were fifty years ago. In Florida they are now extensively killed for their oil—the tough skin on their belly is tanned and used as saddles. An inexhaustible supply is annually produced.

LAND WARRANTS—A SINGULAR CASE.—An old soldier living at Harper's Ferry, Va., being entitled to 160 acres of land under the new Bounty Act, obtained from the Pension Office the necessary authority for locating his land. He selected it on a tract of unoccupied Government land, at Harper's Ferry, being more convenient in his estimation than traveling over the wilds of Oregon, Minnesota, or California. The old soldier has consulted able legal gentlemen, who have given it as their opinion that he can hold the land, as the Bounty Act allows the location upon any unoccupied Government land. The property thus selected is said to be worth at least $150,000.

ABORIGINAL REMAINS.—A recent flood on the river Dan, in North Carolina, by washing away the embankments, has disclosed numerous skeletons of human beings, pieces of earthern ware, Indian utensils, &c., which seem to have been suddenly buried by some catastrophe, not unlike an avalanche of earth from an eminence. Some of the skeletons are found in a sitting posture, and are nearly perfect. There seems to be no doubt that they are the bones of Indians, traces of whose encampments on the banks of the Dan are still visible; but how they came to be buried in the condition found is a mystery.

FROZEN TO DEATH.—On the 30th ult., Solomon S. Wiley of New Durham, N. H., was found dead in a field near his father's house. When found, his body was in a recumbent position, with his head resting upon a stone—his hands clasped across his heart, and his eyes open. Wiley was a young man about nineteen years of age, and had been attending a dancing party the evening before his death. Feeling unwell, he had started for home, and probably lay down to rest by the way. The night being intensely cold, he was doubtless frozen in the attitude in which his body was discovered.

FROM NEW YORK TO EGYPT IN NINETEEN DAYS.—A letter from Wm. Winthrop, Esq., United States Consul at Malta, furnishes an instance of the wonderful facility with which communication can be transmitted from one part of the world to another in these latter days. A message from New York, designed for a correspondent in Egypt, was received in London by the Atlantic steamer, and forthwith dispatched by telegraph to Trieste, and then by steam to Alexandria—the entire distance from New York having been traversed in nineteen days. [Jour. of Com.

The citizens of Calais, Me., were much pleased, and the heart of a needy woman cheered, by the receipt, recently, of a check on the bank for $500, drawn by Miss Lind in favor of Sarah W. Clark, widow of the late Joseph N. Clark, mate of the barque Sophia, of Calais, who lost his life on the 3d of September, in taking off the crew of the Swedish barque Johanna, which was in a sinking condition.

The Methodist denomination in Chicago have determined to establish a University in that city, to be styled the North Western University. It is intended not only for Illinois, but for Wisconsin and Iowa also—the conferences in each of these States having united in the undertaking.

The élite of Louisville are enjoying themselves at brilliant entertainments denominated maitinees, or day balls. These generally take place at mid-day, when the shutters are closed, gas is lighted, the company assemble, and cotillions, waltzes, polkas, and flirtations, become the order of the day, as they have heretofore been the order of the night, at fashionable assemblies.

Further accounts from Hayti, to the 1st inst., have been received. The panic on account of the ravages of Cholera at Jamaica had subsided, not a death having occurred from it at Port-au-Prince. The Emperor is to be crowned on Christmas day—the Crown and other insignia of Royalty having arrived from France. Three men had been shot at Port-au-Prince for treason.

The recent trial of Scholman vs. Boston and Worcester Railroad, in the Supreme Court, for injuries done to his wife in November, 1848, at which time six persons were killed and others wounded—after occupying the Court for nearly two weeks was closed Friday, the Jury rendering a verdict for plaintiff of $4,000 damages.

Mr. Wm. Smith, of Johnson County, N. C., who is described as a man of "miserly habits," recently took a runaway negro girl belonging to him from Wilmington jail. He carried her home, and as soon as he released her, she seized an axe, struck him on the head, and killed him.

The Sons of Temperance in New Jersey have, according to the Trenton True American, 117 Divisions, and 6,010 members. They have $28,000 securely invested, and paid during the last quarter, for benefits and funeral expenses, $1,914 85.

A report is being circulated South, that Jenny Lind contributed $1,000 to the Abolition Society. The Washington Union contains a correspondence between Ritchie and Barnum, in which the latter denies, in the name of the "Nightingale," any such contribution.

The Circassian slave markets continue at Constantinople with unabated success and activity. The slaves are sold in what is called the Circassian quarter of the city, and the prices range according to their ages and personal charms—from $500 to $1,000.

The Disaster at New Orleans.

After our paper was ready for the press, we were shown letters to T. B. Stillman from James Harvey Stillman and B. M. Norman, dated New Orleans, Dec. 14, and giving particulars of the disaster of the previous day on board the Anglo-Norman. Mr. Stillman writes:—

"At the time of the explosion, Alfred Stillman, Mr. Smith, Mr. Storms, and myself, were standing on the deck immediately over the boiler, and within two feet of each other —Alfred and Mr. Storms leaning against the rail, and Mr. Smith and myself facing them. Mr. Smith and I were thrown considerable distance into the air, and came down in the water. On rising to the surface, we supported ourselves on pieces of the wreck until picked up, about ten minutes afterward. Going on board the wreck, I found Alfred on the lower deck, nearly under where he had stood, so much disfigured that I had difficulty in recognizing him. He was lying on a matress, and a man was bathing his head. A physician on board thought he could not live. The boat was towed to the city, eight miles from where the explosion took place, and left near the Marine Hospital. We took him from the boat in a litter, and placed him in the care of the resident physician, an acquaintance. The Doctor said he could not possibly recover. Every thing that could be done for him was done. His skull was badly fractured, and one leg was broken in two places. Trepanning was advised, but he died while the operation was being performed. The explosion took place at half past two P. M., and he lived until a few minutes past seven, but did not recover his senses. . . . I have some bruises on the face, and am so lame that I can scarcely walk. Our escape is truly miraculous."

Mr. Norman writes:—

"Poor Storms was landed at the Louisiana Hotel, his bruises not being considered dangerous. He suffered but little pain, and was sensible until he died at 3½ o'clock in the morning. On examination after death, we discovered that his leg was badly fractured, and his back seriously injured. . . . The remains of Mr. Stillman are deposited in a leaden coffin, ready to send to his friends in New York by the first vessel. Those of Mr. Storms are likewise in a leaden coffin, and will be deposited in the Protestant Cemetery, that they may be removed when his friends deem it best."

BENEDICT W. ROGERS, Treasurer.

MARRIED,

In Shiloh, N. J., 12th mo. 12th, by Eld. Wm. M. Jones, Mr. THOMAS EWING to Miss LUCY ANN WEST.

DIED.

In Brookfield, N. Y., on the 2d inst., Mrs. LOIS DAVIS, widow of Rogers Davis, aged 80 years, 4 months, and 1 day. Sister Davis was born Aug. 1st, 1770, in Burlington, Conn., where, in early life, she became a subject of saving grace, and united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church at that place. She was married in Aug., 1788, and in the winter of 1790-91 removed with her husband to Galloway, Saratoga Co., N. Y.; thence, in 1802, to Brookfield, where she united with the first Seventh day Baptist Church, at its organization, and remained a firm and exemplary member until she left to join the church triumphant. She has bequeathed to her descendants, consisting of 6 children, 33 grand and 18 great-grand children, a rich legacy of Christian examples, suffering, patience, and faith, and has beautifully exemplified before the church and the world the great truths of the Christian religion. Her memory will long be cherished by all who knew her, and may her piety and virtues be emulated. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord;" for "they rest from their labors, and their works do follow them." DAVID P. CURTIS.

Central Association—Semi-Annual Meeting.

A SEMI-ANNUAL MEETING of the Seventh-day Baptist Central Association (for missionary purposes) will be held with the Church in Lincklaen, Chenango Co., N. Y., commencing on the third day of the week before the second Sabbath in January, 1851, at 10 o'clock A. M.

Missionary Society—Board Meeting.

The Illustrated Domestic Bible.

NOW PUBLISHING IN NUMBERS, on the 1st and 15th of each month. In addition to the authorized version, this edition contains Seven Hundred Engravings, Three Steel Maps, very full References, Poetical Portions in Metrical Form, Reflections, Notes, Questions on each Chapter, Dates for every day in the year, Family Record, Chronological Order, &c., &c.

The whole Bible will be completed in 25 Numbers of 56 pages each, making when finished a volume of 1,400 pages, small quarto, of very convenient size for family or private reading. It is peculiarly valuable for Sunday School Teachers. Every Sabbath School should have a copy of it, and it should be in every family where there are children. The Engravings are not introduced for show, but are real illustrations, and serve to explain the text. This feature will render it very attractive for the young, and will serve more than any other means to fix the Sacred Word permanently in the memory.

The N. Y. Recorder says: "It strikes us as better fitted to its sphere than any other similar work. We have great pleasure in commending it to our readers."

The Christian Observer (Phila.) says: "We cheerfully commend it as one of the most complete and convenient, as well as one of the cheapest Family Bibles that has appeared."

AGENTS WANTED to obtain subscribers in New York, Brooklyn, and other places. To Ministers, Theological Students, and others who would feel an interest in circulating such a work, the most liberal terms will be allowed. Address, post paid,

660 pp. Octavo; retail price, $2 50 per volume. Orders respectfully solicited.

SEARS' PICTORIAL FAMILY PUBLICATIONS

Are decidedly the best books that Agents can possibly employ their time in supplying to the people of the United States. They are valuable for reference, and should be possessed by every family in this great Republic. There is not a city or town in these United States, even those of small importance, but contains many citizens to whom these works are indispensable. They are adapted to the literary wants of the Christian, the Patriot, the Statesman, and the Domestic Circle—got up in a superior style of art and workmanship; and are not only such books as will sell, but such as an Agent of good principles will feel free to recommend, and willing to see the purchaser again, after they have been bought.

OUR PLAN.

The plan the Publisher has so successfully carried out for several years, is obtaining responsible men as Agents, who are well known in their own Counties, Towns, and Villages, and have time and disposition to circulate good and instructive books among their neighbors and friends. Any person wishing to embark in the enterprise will risk little by sending to the Publisher $25 or $50, for which he will receive an assortment as he may direct, at the wholesale cash prices.

☞ Enterprising and active men of respectability and good address, would do well to engage in the sale of the above volumes; and all Postmasters, Clergymen, Book Peddlars, and Newspaper Agents, are respectfully requested to act as our Agents. A handsome remuneration allowed to all who engage in their sale. For particulars, address, post-paid, ROBERT SEARS,
128 Nassau-st., N. Y.

To Publishers of Newspapers throughout the U. S.

 Newspapers copying this advertisement entire, well displayed, as above, without any alteration or abridgement, (including this notice,) and giving [illegible] or more insertions, shall receive a copy of any one of our $2 50 or $3 works, (subject to their order,) by sending direct to the Publisher.

☞ No letter will be taken from the office unless post-paid.

Miscellaneous.

Oregon.

To the People of the United States :—

FELLOW CITIZENS,—The object of this brief circular is to make you acquainted, in the fewest words possible, with the most extraordinary inducements held out to emigrants to Oregon, and with the several modes of reaching that country.

The cloud of obstructions so long lowering down over that Territory, was completely dispersed by Congress at its late session, and the uncertainties heretofore existing as to the removal of the Indians, and the titles to lands have been removed, by the enactment of laws for that purpose.

A law was passed at the late session, providing for the extinguishment of the Indian title to all that part of Oregon lying west of the summit of the Cascade Mountains, and for the removal of the Indians inhabiting it to some point east of those mountains. A Board of Commissioners have been appointed under that law to treat with the Indians west of those mountains, for their lands, and with the Indians east of the same mountains, for other lands, to which to remove the Indians first named. A Superintendant of Indian Affairs has been appointed, whose duty it is, under the protection of the military force stationed in the country, to occupy his whole time in attending to the duties of this department; and under him are placed three Indian agents, and three sub-agents, for the more efficient management of the affairs in this department. Heavy appropriations have been made, to be followed by still larger ones, to enable the officers appointed to procure successfully the objects of the law. All people, therefore, everywhere, may rest fully assured, that there is not the slightest danger of trouble with the Indians hereafter. I would also state that there is no danger from Indians in going to Oregon overland, nor after you have reached the country.

On the heel of this law, another one was passed, at the last session of Congress, giving to all men over eighteen years of age, arriving and settling in Oregon previous to Dec., 1850, 320 acres of land, if single, and if married, 640 acres. The bill then provides that if those single men marry in one year from the first of Dec., 1850, they shall receive 640 acres. In all cases the wife is to receive one half of the above grant in her own right. Four years residence and cultivation, to be completed either before the date of the law, or after, is required before the final title is made from the government, though the title is good, to all intents and purposes, as against every body but the government, from the moment the claim is taken. If the man or woman, or both, die after taking the claim, and before the four years expire, the same goes to the survivor and heirs, so that it cannot be lost by this casualty.

The bill next provides, that all white males over 21, emigrating to the country, and settling there, between the first day of Dec., 1850, and the first day of Dec., 1853, shall receive 160 acres of land, if a single man, and if married, then 320 acres. But there is also a provision here, that if single men marry in one year after arriving in the Territory, they then receive 320 acres. All male minors who go to the country and settle, and become 21 before Dec., 1853, will receive 160 acres of land, absolutely, and if they marry in one year after arriving at majority, they will receive 320. All foreigners, by filing their intention of becoming American citizens, are treated like native born American citizens, and they are only required to complete that naturalization before they get a final title. Of course this would have to be done in the shortest time, or they would lose their land. The same residence and cultivation are required as before, and as before, the woman receives, as her own property, one half of the land granted. In all cases the person is allowed to pick his land where he pleases, if not previously occupied.

I would wish it to be well understood, that this land is among the richest lands in the world, that it is no where surpassed in productiveness, and in all kinds of grain, no where has its equal. The climate of Oregon is no where equaled for its healthfulness, and as health is one of the greatest inducements in going to any country, I would wish to be fully understood when I say emphatically, that there is not a region of country on the North American continent, not excepting New England, so widely famed for its health, so healthy as Oregon. Aside from this, and the productiveness of its soil, it is no where surpassed for its water power, no where equaled for the goodness of its water, or for the quality of its lumber, or for the fish that swim in its streams, or for the game in its forests and prairies, or for the uniformity of its climate. Beside this, we have mines of coal, of iron, of marble, of salt, and probably mines of gold. We are so located also, that any man living in Oregon may mount his horse, and in a few days, without a dollar's expense on the way, visit the various mines in California, work as long as he pleases, and, by the same conveyance, return at his pleasure. In Oregon you will find ready employment at from five to fifteen dollars per day, according to your trade, corresponding wages by the month or year, and for all you can raise you can get, to quote from the Price Current in the Oregon Spectator, of Sept. 5, 1850, as follows: beef, 15 to 20 cts. per lb., pork, 16 to 20 cts. per lb., butter, $1 per lb., cheese, 62½, wheat, $1 50 to $2 per bushel, oats, $3 per bushel, eggs, 50 to 75 cts. per doz., lard, 40 cts. per lb. and lumber, $50 to $60 per M.

This is a country where you can raise stock to any amount, without even cutting any hay or fodder for them, or feeding them, or housing them, for the entire year. For your oxen you can get $150 per yoke, for your American horses from $150 to $250 or $300, for good cows, $50, and other stock in proportion, and these prices are likely to continue. There is comparatively no end to the money, and all a man needs to make it is industry, and to lay it up, economy. Here, too, you will find good schools, and the people alive to education; good churches, denominations and preachers, and the people moral and intelligent, and anxious to hear. Our mail routes have been established, and our mails are regularly carried. The Howland & Aspinwall line of steamers extend to Portland, in Oregon; and there is a regular semi-monthly mail between that city and other parts of the territory and New York. Beside this, we have a line of river steamers plying between Astoria and Oregon City and Cascade City, and intermediate ports, and two steamers, whose machinery has been long on the way, will soon be running on the Willametta river, above Oregon City, running up that beautiful valley from 100 to 150 miles. Here you see all things are ready and waiting for the coming emigrant. I have no hesitancy in saying, upon my responsibility as the representative of that territory, that such inducements never was offered before to emigrants since the organization of the government. Nor do I hesitate to say, that, to any industrious and economical man, five years in that country, with the inducements actually offered there, are worth as much in point of property, as twenty years east of the Rocky Mountains. The only question, then, which remains to be considered is, "How can you get there?"

There are three ways to get to Oregon, one round Cape Horn, time six months, from New York; another across the Isthmus, by steamboat, time forty to forty-five days, from New York; and the third across by the overland route, time from the Missouri river from two and a half to five months, according to the nature of your teams, and your expedition on the way.

The expense round the Horn will be from $200 to $300 for each grown up person, and boarded, with smaller prices for children, depending on age. By this route you can get any amount of freight carried you please. By the Isthmus route, there are two rates of fare. First fare, from New York to Chagres, $100; across the Isthmus, from $30 to $50, and from Panama to Portland, Oregon, $400, and found, making a sum total, say, of $550. Second fare, from New York to Chagres, $50, across the Isthmus, as before, and from Panama to Portland, $200, and found, making a sum total of $300. By this route you can purchase of Howland & Aspinwall's line through tickets to Portland, Oregon, and have the guarantee of that responsible firm against any delay by the way. As many inquiries have been made of me about these delays on the Isthmus, to persons having through tickets, I will take this occasion to say, that if you purchase your through tickets of Howland & Aspinwall's line you will meet with no detention whatever. You may rely on whatever I tell you. All persons going to Oregon by the Isthmus route, should go by this line, if they do not wish to be detained at San Francisco, as this is the only company having a through line. Their office is 54 South street, N. Y.

By the overland route, every person should be at one of the following points on the Missouri river: Independence or St. Joseph, in Missouri, or Kanesville, in Iowa, ready to leave just as soon as the grass is sufficient to drive on, which is the case from the first of April to the first of May, according to the nature of the Spring. He will choose a team of oxen, mules or horses, or, if without family, he may pack through, by riding one horse or mule, and packing his provisions, &c., on one or two more. This is the quickest mode. Mule or horse teams, with light loads, the next in point of expedition, oxen the last, but quite as sure as either. The cost by this route, in the end, will be but small, as the following calculation will show.

Persons from Ohio, Michigan or Wisconsin, and all points west of these States, usually start with their teams from home. Those farther east or south, first find their way into some State west of those named, as Illinois, Missouri or Iowa, and there purchase their teams. Any one who pleases can go to Independence, St. Joseph or Kanesville, by way of the Missouri river, and then go back into the interior, and purchase their teams. Each man should buy from three to five yokes of oxen for each wagon, according to their load, lay in provisions, a plenty to last him through, and have some to spare in case of a contingency, and start with as light a load as possible, losing no time, either Sundays or week days, unless it is absolutely necessary. Be careful not to whip or fret your teams, and you will have no trouble. The route is a healthy one, and I wish all to know and understand, that emigrants on the Oregon trail meet with none of those disasters for want of water and grass, which have been so destructive to the California emigrants. I have driven a team over the route, and this I know. Keep in small companies of not exceeding 20 wagons, and always remember to avoid sharpers toward the last end of your journey, who will meet you with all manner of stories, for the purpose of buying your cattle, horses and property for a song. Treat them with the contempt they deserve. The cost of getting to the place of rendezvous will depend on the distance from the place of starting. From this place let us count the final cost.

Suppose you to pay $50 a yoke for your oxen, a high price along the frontier. Five yokes would cost you $250. A wagon well rigged, $75, a good American mare, $75, and two cows, $25 for both, making the sum total, $450. Your provisions would be 200 pounds of flour, and 100 pounds of bacon, to every person. Then there would be coffee, tea, sugar, spices, dried fruit, lard, honey, a small quantity of Indian meal, some hard bread, rice, beans, salt, and a small stock of medicines, enough of each kind to last you through. Your cows would furnish you with milk and butter by the way. We will estimate your provisions and via-ictas to cost $100, which, added to the former sum, would make $525. After you start you will rarely have an occasion, and still more rarely a chance to spend a dollar. With prudence, you will be very likely to get through with all the stock you start with. But let us make all due allowances for losses by the way, which we will suppose to be one yoke of oxen, and then let us reckon up after you are through, without saying anything of the magnificent farm you are forthwith possessed of. Your four yoke of oxen will be worth at least $400, your wagon $100, your American mare $150, and your cows $100. These prices are low estimates upon the whole. The amount is $750. But you have paid out $525, so that you have made $225 by the journey. This may be taken as a fair illustration for all.

I have thus, fellow citizens, presented you the case fairly and without exaggeration. What do you think of it? I took my own family to the country in 1847, and by the overland route. I have never regretted it; and were I back here with my family, and know what I now know, I would neither slumber nor sleep till I had determined to go, nor would I slacken my exertions till I had reached there. The inducements are unprecedented, and the advantages certain. The country is an inviting one, in point of locality, health, fertility, richness and location. Her rich prairies and public domain, free of charge to the settler, invite you, her overflowing coffers are running over for your reception, and her wild fields urge you to enterprise. You can come among us and enjoy life and health to an unprecedented degree; you can make fortunes for yourselves and your posterity after you; and when you have finished your course, you will leave your children in a land that flows with milk and honey, in a land of education and morals, of industry and enterprise, and in the garden of the Pacific, where, looking out on her placid waters, they may inhale her breezes, and learn to measure the extent of their improvements and enterprises, by the vastness of that mighty ocean.

I here have to request, as I most earnestly do, all papers throughout the United States to do Oregon and her people the especial favor to publish this circular, and I also solicit all persons who feel an interest in that country, to request their paper to do so. And for this act of generosity on the part of the conductors of the press, and on the part of those who request it to be done, I herewith return, for myself and for that hardy and noble people I represent, our sincere thanks. Very truly your fellow citizen,

SAMUEL R. THURSTON, Del. from Oregon.

Stanzas for the Times—1850.

BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

The evil days have come; the poor
Are made a prey;
Bar up the hospitable door,
Put out the fire-lights, point no more
The wanderer's way.

For Pity now is crime: the chain
Which binds our States
Is melted at the hearth in twain,
Is rusted by her tear's soft rain:
Close up her gates.

Our Union, like a glacier stirred
By voice below,
Or bell of kine, or wing of bird,
A beggar's crust, or kindly word,
May overthrow.

Poor whispering tremblers!—yet we boast
Our blood and name;
Bursting its century bolted frost,
Each gray cairn on the Northman's coast
Cries out for shame!

Oh, for the open firmament—
The prairie free,
The desert hill-sides, cavern-rent,
The Pawnee's lodge, the Arab's tent,
The Bushman's tree!

Than web of Persian loom most rare,
Or soft divan,
Better the rough rock, bleak and bare,
Or hollow tree, which man may share
With suffering man.

I hear a voice: "Thus saith the Law,
Let Love be dumb;
Clasping her liberal hands, in awe,
Let sweet-lipped Charity withdraw
From hearth and home."

I hear another voice: "The poor
Are thine to feed;
Turn not the outcast from thy door,
Nor give to bonds and wrong once more
Whom God hath freed."

Dear Lord! between that law and Thee
No choice remains;
Yet not untrue to man's decree,
Though spurning its rewards, is he
Who bears its pains.

Not mine Sedition's trumpet blast
And threatening word;
I read the lesson of the Past,
That firm endurance wins at last
More than the sword.

Oh, clear-eyed Faith, and Patience, thou
So calm and strong,
Angels of God! be near to show
His glorious future shining through
Our night of wrong!

Scientific Hatching Machine.

A scientific hatching machine has been invented in France by M. Vallee, which is described by the Paris correspondent of the Intelligencer as follows :—

A drum inclosing a warming cylinder forms the basis of his system. He introduces warm air into the drawer in which the eggs are deposited, and by circular openings gives access to currents of cold air. It is by the distribution and vigorously rational combination of warm and cold air, that he obtains that dampish temperature in which lies the secret of incubation, from which results the development of the embryo in the egg. By this instrument artificial hatching is successfully carried on in every state of the atmosphere, and at all seasons. But after the burst of the shell, a mother must be provided for the young. M. Vallee's ingenuity thus provides for this emergency: A lamb's skin is fastened by one extremity to a plank, and made to open at the other like a pair of bellows. This affords a cover for the little ones, and keeps them as warm as would a veritable mother hen. The result of M. Vallee's experience touching the period of incubation necessary for the various species of eggs, is curious and worthy of record. Here it is: chickens, 21 days; patridges, 24 do.; pheasants, 25 do.; Guinea hens, 25 do.; common ducks, 28 do.; peafowls, 28 do.; Barbary ducks, 30 do.; geese, 30 do. The degree of heat required is from 40 to 50 degrees French or Centigrade scale, equal to from 104 to 122 Fahrenheit. A small lamp of the Rocatelli system suffices to raise the temperature of the apparatus to the proper elevation. With such a machine every farmer would have a fine supply of fowls.

American Products for the World's Fair.

The Boston Transcript, of Friday says: The Massachusetts State Committee met December 10th, to examine the applications received for space to exhibit goods; and found that full one half of the room allotted for Massachusetts has been officially applied for; and they have received verbal statements that other articles are being prepared, which will require the balance of space set off for our State. Among the articles offered, we notice machinery, such as Spinning, Sewing, Planing, Turning, and other labor-saving machines; textile fabrics, consisting of Shirtings, Sheetings, Jeans, Printing Cloths, Ginghams, De Laines, Tweeds, Pantaloon Stuffs, Woolen Shawls, Broad-cloths, Cassimeres, Doeskins, Flannels, Woolen Blankets, Carpeting, Coach Laces, Cotton Duck, &c. &c., Carriages, some very beautiful, costing as high as $4,000.

A collection of minerals has also been received, comprising all the ores and native metals in the United States, with one mass of native copper weighing between two and three tuns. Among other articles are furnaces, stoves, grates, ranges, and ventilating apparatuses; philosophical aparatuses, ornamental metalic works for household purposes, books for the blind, with raised letters, &c.

In the musical department there will be a goodly display of piano-fortes and other stringed instruments. Among them are two violins, valued one at $3,000 and the other at $10,000; and the manufacturer feels assured that there will be scientific musicians at the Fair, who can appreciate their merits, and will not think them overvalued. The Fine Arts will be represented by marble statuary, daguerreotypes, &c.

A variety of agricultural implements will be sent, showing the perfection, which this branch of workmanship has attained in New England; also specimens of wooden ware, boots, shoes, &c.

Poisonous Effects from New Earthen-ware.

A somewhat singular, though not unaccountable occurrence took place in the family of a gentleman in one of our neighboring towns, a short time since. It appears that there was a large number of the gentleman's family and connections to partake of a Thanksgiving dinner, numbering in all 23 persons. The usual variety served on such occasions covered the banquet board, and the party partook of it with the proper relish. Twenty of this party remained over night and took breakfast with their host the ensuing morning. A large chicken pie, which had not been touched the day before, was served out to them at this time. In a few hours after seventeen of them were violently attacked with severe griping pains in the bowels, accompanied with profuse diarrhœa. It appeared, from the investigation, that only those who ate of the pie were the ones who suffered. The lady of the house having made it herself partaken freely of it, and suffered alike with the rest, of course removed all suspicion of intentional poisoning. The query now is, what was there in this pie, or about it, that should produce these effects? The pie was baked in a yellow earthen dish, that never had been used before; and the conclusion necessarily is, that its contents became impregnated with portions of the enamel with which it was lined, and hence the consequences. Now the enamel used by potters varies in composition, according to the purposes for which the ware is intended. They all, we believe, contain more or less lead, cobalt, &c. Often the biscuit, as it is called, is made of clay, which contains poisonous matter in various proportions, and if, after the baking, the vessels are imperfectly glazed or protected, bad consequences may arise from using them. All such ware, to be used in cooking, when new, should first be proven, and this is best done by having it greased over with lard or tallow, and then subjected to the heat of an oven. This will generally be found a sure protection. This one instance should serve as a warning to families, and is not without interest to the physician. Had the occurrence taken place during the prevalence of cholera, the sickness might have been taken for it, and with very good reasons, its symptoms and character simulating that disease. We are pleased to state, that the parties entirely recovered, the majority of them only suffering five or six hours.

Wealth and Income or Jenny Lind.

It is said that Jenny Lind pays the English income tax of $22,500 annually, on money invested in the British funds. In these funds she has no less than £150,000, about $750,000. Her annual income, therefore, from that source alone, is about $22,000. She has given away in charity about $400,000, as nearly as it can be estimated. $125,000 of this was given in England; $25,000 in Edinburgh. In Edinburgh she gave five concerts at a guinea a ticket. On the first four she cleared $100,000; and on the fifth an additional $25,000, which was devoted to charitable purposes. The entire amount of her European wealth is estimated at $1,000,000.

Of her gains in this country we have seen various estimates. A Boston correspondent of the New York Herald, gives a statement of the receipts and expenses attending her American concerts, which produced one hundred and twelve thousand dollars. The expenses for each has averaged about $5,500, leaving as net proceeds seventy thousand dollars, which is to be equally divided between herself and Barnum. Her first concert in Boston produced a greater amount of money than any concert she ever gave anywhere. The average receipts of the seven concerts was $16,000 each. If this average should continue for 150 concerts, it will produce the enormous sum of two millions four hundred thousand dollars. Deducting expenses, the net result would be more than a million and a half of dollars. Barnum's proportion would be $778,750. But a lower calculation, there is little doubt that the 150 concerts will yield $1,000,000, and that Barnum will clear half a million dollars by this "speculation," in one year.

The Christian reader will not forget, while he justly appreciates the admirable moral qualities and noble charities of Jenny Lind, that the greatest benefactors of the world lived and died poor; and while every one praises Barnum for his money operations, great numbers are ready to accuse the ministers of the gospel of avarice and worldly spirit, who live upon four or five hundred dollars a year. A SINGULAR CASE.—Some weeks since, says the Louisville Courier, a negro named Cammack, six feet two inches in hight, made his escape from the Indiana Penitentiary at Jeffersonville. He was from Crawford Co., Ia., was sentenced for horse stealing, and had served all save sixteen months of his term of seven years. It appears Cammack came to this side of the river, went to the interior of the State, and was arrested and lodged at Cynthiana on suspicion of being a runaway negro. A few mornings since he succeeded in breaking out of the Cynthiana jail, and, immediately making his way to Frankfort, got on board the steamer Sea Gull on Sunday morning, reached here the same night, and without any delay procured a skiff, crossed the river, went to the Penitentiary, and when the prison doors were opened yesterday morning, he was there demanding admission to his old quarters. He said he had been unhappy ever since he left, and preferred remaining there to being at large and always looking behind him fearing pursuit.

MOYAMENSING, (PHILADELPHIA.)—A correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune says that the census of Moyamensing has just been completed. The District contains 2,997 inhabitants. In this District during the year ending June 1, 1850, 70,000,000 bricks were manufactured. In the early part of the present year, a German lady died in the District at the advanced age of 111 years. She retained her faculties until the last moment of her life, and could thread a needle without the aid of glasses. Moyamensing contains the United States Arsenal, and the United States Naval Asylum. In the latter edifice, old and infirm seamen, who have spent their best days in the service of the United States, find a comfortable home during their declining years, and after their death, their bodies are interred in a neat Cemetery attached to the Institution, the border of which is washed by the waters of the Schuylkill. There is at present in the Asylum, a seamen, 100 years of age, who fought under Commodore John Paul Jones.

SHELL BANKS IN ALABAMA.—Shell banks, very common in the neighborhood of Mobile, are not less singular because common. On Middle river, just above the city, says the Register, is a huge bank of shells, some twenty-five feet in depth. As far down as eighteen feet from the surface, remnants of cooking utensils, evidently of Indian origin, have been found. In another place, close by, is a bank of shells, which runs in the form of a ridge, and covers full two acres. This, by the nearest cut, is over a quarter of a mile from any water course, and at present the shells have got to be hauled at least a half a mile before reaching the barges. In Bonne Secour Bay is a huge hill of oyster-shells, over thirty feet high, and from which vast quantities of lime have been already made, yet the consumption only heretofore seemed to cut a wall-like face to the mound. But the shells found near the city are of the clam kind, varying from the largest to the smallest kind.

STATE VALUATION OF MASSACHUSETTS.—The abstract of the assessor's returns for 1850 exhibits some singular results. Since 1840 at least 800 miles of railway have been finished in the State, and many lines of stages displaced, but the horses in Massachusetts have increased from 60,030 in 1840 to 74,060 in 1850. In the same period cattle have increased from 278,737 to 299,600, while sheep have declined from 343,390 to 179,537. The produce of wheat has declined from 101,178 bushels to 28,487, and Indian corn increased from 1,775,073 bushels to 2,292,856. While cotton and woolen spindles have doubled in number, distilleries have decreased from 78 to 43.

INCIDENTS IN THE LIFE OF AN OLD SHIP.—The ship William and Ann, of London, ninety-one years old, recently cleared at St. John. The New Brunswick Courier gives the following account of her :—

"She was built on the River Thames in 1759, and was employed for upward of half a century as a bomb ship in the British Navy. She carried out General Wolfe to Quebec, and was employed in that part of the world during the troubles that followed. At the taking of Copenhagen she was also present, as well as at the siege of Gibralter, where her mainmast was shot away. After the taking of that fort, her mainmast was replaced by the venerable flag staff of the fortress, which had stood proof against so many shots. She was repaired at Leith some years since, and has been employed nearly forty years in the Greenland Whale Fishery. The present Master states that her timbers are sound even yet."

THE HOMESTEAD IN VERMONT.—The Homestead Law passed by the Vermont Legislature of 1849 went into operation on the 1st of this month. It provides that house and land, to the value of $500, with the produce of the land, shall be exempt from attachment and execution, except for taxes. In case of the decease of a husband, this amount of property shall descend to his wife and children, without being subject to his debts, unless made chargeable thereupon, and such homestead cannot be alienated or mortgaged, except by joint deed of husband and wife. The homestead is, however, liable for debts contracted before its purchase, and the husband may mortgage the same at the time of purchase without the consent of the wife.

Two men, who gave their names as James Smith and John Thomas, were taken into custody on Saturday night last by officer Wood of the Third Ward, New York, charged with the commission of a burglary in New Brunswick, N. J., and stealing clothing to the value of $200, which was recovered by the above named officer. They were sent back for trial.

The N. Y. Tribune understands that a larger part of the poor passengers taken from the steamer Helena Sloman have received temporary relief, and that a considerable number have received railroad tickets and advances sufficient to reach their friends in the interior. The most of them were respectable, intelligent mechanics, emigrating here with their tools of trade, all of which, with their clothing, were lost.

A person in Nicaragua writes that Cotton may be cultivated there to any extent, though the want of energy in the inhabitants has reduced the production to a very small quantity. In a single year as much as fifty thousand bales, of three hundred pounds each, of clean and excellent quality, have been exported.

The Springfield Republican mentions that Berkshire is the greatest manufacturing County of the Union, and Lee takes a similar rank among the towns. Of the 97 paper mills in the whole State, 32 are in Berkshire County, and of these 32, nineteen are in the town of Lee alone.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year of this Seminary, for 1850 and '51, will commence the third Wednesday in August, and continue forty-four weeks, including a short recess between the terms, and one of ten days for the winter holidays.

The year is divided into three terms:—

The first, of 14 weeks, begins Wednesday, August 21st, and ends Wednesday, November 27th.

The second, of 15 weeks, begins Monday, December 2d, and ends Friday, March 14th.

The third, of 14 weeks, begins Tuesday, March 18th and ends Tuesday, June 24th.

Board of Instruction.

GURDON EVANS, A. M., President,
And Professor of Mathematics and Natural Science.
Rev. JOSEPH W. MORTON,
Professor of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, Spanish, and Moral and Intellectual Science.
Mrs. SUSANNA M. SPICER, Preceptress.
ADOLPH ROSENHAYN,
(Late of Friedrick Wilhelm College, Berlin,)
Teacher of German, Piano Forte, and Assistant in Greek and Latin.

Other competent Teachers will be employed as occasion may demand.

TEACHERS' CLASSES will be formed, as usual, at the beginning of the Fall and middle of the Winter Terms, and continue seven weeks.

In the Common Branches, classes will be formed at the commencement of each term; but in the higher, the interest of the student, as well as the welfare of the Institution, demand that a more systematic course of study be pursued.

In the Natural Sciences, Elementary Chemistry and Philosophy will be pursued during the Fall Term Agricultural Chemistry, Astronomy, and Physiology during the Winter Term; Botany and Geology during the Summer Term.

Classes will be formed in Latin, French, and German, at the commencement of the Fall Term; in Hebrew, Greek, and Spanish, at the commencement of the Winter Term, and continue through the course of study.

In Mathematics, Geometry is studied in the Fall, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, and Astronomy, Surveying, Navigation, &c., in the Summer Term.

The course of instruction in Agriculture is thorougly scientific, embracing study and recitation in the best authors. Instruction is given in a well-furnished laboratory, in the analysis of soils, ashes of plants, manures, &c. and the modes of testing for their constituent elements. The attention of farmers who wish to give their sons a practical education is especially called to this department.

Board in private families, from $1 25 to $1 50. Many students board in clubs for 60 to 75 cents.

TUITION—to be settled upon entering school—from $3 00 to $5 00. EXTRAS—For Drawing, $1 00; Oil Painting, $5 00; Chemical Experiments, $1 00; Writing, including stationery, 50 cents; Piano Forte, $8 00; Use of Instrument, $2 00; Agricultural Chemistry, including chemicals, apparatus, and fuel, (breakage extra,) $12 00.

It is very desirable that students should enter at the beginning of the term; yet they are received into classes already formed at any time.

For farther information, address Gurdon Evans, J. W. Morton, or Rev. J. R. Irish, President of the Corporation.

MAN THE IMAGE OF GOD:

In what sense he can be so considered.

We have all heard of Simonides, the ancient philosopher, who, being asked by Dionysius the tyrant what God was, requested a day in which to consider of it before he made a reply. The day being expired, he desired two more days; and then, instead of returning his answer, demanded still double time to consider of it. This man, though preëminently wise, the more he contemplated the nature, perfections, and attributes of the Deity, found himself the more lost in an inexplicable maze of thought.

If we consider the Deity in the light by which he was pleased to reveal himself to Moses, we shall acquire, probably, the most rational and just conception of Him that it is possible for man, in his present state, to possess. When the prophet inquired of God by what name he should mention him to the children of Israel, in order that they might be disposed to obey him, God answered, "I am that I am;" and bade him tell them, "I am hath sent me unto you." It is evident from this revelation of himself, that God would not have us apprehend of him as of any particular being, bearing any particular form, or limited to any particular place; but as the Being of all beings, or, in reality, the only Being, alone self-existent, self-upheld. He did not reveal himself as the Almighty Father, the Creator, Preserver, and Governor of all things. He makes no mention of his attributes—his justice, mercy, or power; but, I am that I am, thus intimating that there were no words to be found in any language that could fully express his glory and perfections, especially so that finite minds could conceive of them; showing us, however, at the same time, what kind of ideas he would have us entertain of him. There is no doubt that, could we but apprehend what is fully meant and intended by that expression, we should have as high and exalted conceptions of God as it is possible for created beings to attain.

Let us for one moment consider what suggestions arise from this answer. It suggests that God is one Being, self-existent and self-sustained. His unity is expressed in that he saith, I; his self-existence in I am; his essence in and of himself, in that I am, or, I am in and of myself. His unity implies a pure and simple Being, that admits nothing into the manifestation of itself but spirit or essence—being itself, without mixture or mutability. Thus, under the similitude of fire, as the simplest and purest of the elements, the Deity was pleased to render his presence visible in the light, and with an appearance of fire he descended upon Mount Sinai.

With this idea of God in our minds, let us consider in what sense man can be regarded as his image. An image is a natural or artificial representation or semblance of a thing—a picture, or statue. Are we, then, to suppose that man is a visible representation of the invisible God?—that man, with a body liable to deformity, disease, and death, with a mind enslaved by sinful passions and bestial propensities, is a semblance of Him whose presence fills immensity, and in whose sight the heavens are not clean? Are we to suppose the scriptural expression, that man was made in the image of God, to be applicable to him upon all occasions, and under all circumstances? Far from it; because it is contradicted by reason, and contrary to the general tenor of Holy Writ. It is only in a very limited and particular sense, that man, in his present fallen state, can be said to resemble God. The Divine Being has in him all the perfections of the spiritual nature in an unlimited and unbounded degree; man possesses a certain share of spiritual perfection, but only in a very limited and partial manner. The Divine Being is almighty and omniscient; man is endowed with a little power and a little knowledge. The Divine Being inhabits eternity, and fills immensity; man is confined to place and time. A faculty of the creature becomes an attribute in the Creator. Man, in his state of purity and innocence, as he came from the forming hand of his Maker, doubtless assimilated, in a great degree, to the perfections of the Divine nature; and it is worthy of remark, that all references to his creation in the image of God are in the past tense. Thus, in Gen. 9: 6, we read that 'whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed, for in the image of God made he man.' We are not told that man at that time, immediately after the deluge, bore the image of God, and that the mutilation of that image would be attended by the Divine vengeance; and the whole tenor of the language leads us to suppose the following interpretation: Man having been originally created in the image of God—that is, to his mind was given the sensible impression of the Divine mind, so that he was perfectly aware of the will of God, and knew, by an intuitive perception, what would and what would not please his Maker; and, though fallen and degraded, still possessing enough of this original faculty to be fully aware of the heinous nature of the crime of murder, should, upon its commission, be punished accordingly. "He hath shewed thee, O man, what is good," saith the prophet Micah. Solomon says that God created man upright; but he sought out many inventions. The human mind, in its state of purity, reflected the Divine perfections as the crystal spring mirrors the object that stands above it; but pollute the fountain, and the image becomes dim and indistinct; increase the pollution, it finally disappears. This is precisely the case with man. Are we to suppose that those wicked persons, who hate virtue, and delight in sin and blasphemy, retain, even in the faintest degree, the image of God. Are we to suppose that those who are irretrievably and irrecoverably lost in perdition, bear the most distant similitude to Him who is purity and happiness itself. Can we for one moment imagine that those of whom Paul speaks, who did not like to retain God in their knowledge, and were given over in consequence to a reprobate mind, still preserved his likeness? They became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish hearts were darkened. Their minds were no longer amenable to the Divine impression. They lost all knowledge of his will, all thought of his presence.

Jesus Christ, in whom the fullness of the Godhead was united with all the purity of human nature in its original state, was, in a complete and unequivocal sense, the image of God. "For, being in the form of God," saith the Apostle, "he thought it not robbery to be equal with God; but made himself of no reputation, and took upon himself the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men." Here the Apostle makes an evident distinction between the form of God and the likeness of men. Christ, in the completeness of his spiritual perfections, naturally bore the one; for our redemption he assumed the physical form that constituted the other. Mankind, by believing in Him, and following the path of holiness that he has marked out, will acquire the purity of the original state, and assume, to a certain degree, the image of God. Thus says Paul, "That ye put on the new man, that after God is created in righteousness, and true holiness." And again, when speaking of the glorification of the saints, he says, "And we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is," that is, we shall bear his image of holiness, and, being fully aware of his will, shall be perfectly conformable to it.

To apply the epithet "God's image" to man, as an individual, upon ordinary occasions, is one of the greatest of improprieties; because the name of the Deity should never be mentioned in a light or irreverent manner, or in familiar connection with debased and humiliated objects. Of all people, the Jews, perhaps, enjoyed the greatest opportunities for a right understanding of the glory and majesty of the Almighty Father; and it is well known, that the pronunciation of his name was only admitted by them upon occasions of worship and adoration. The scriptural expression, that man was made in the image of God, is far from authorizing us to employ such a familiar term when speaking of the degraded objects of human suffering and wretchedness, especially when we remember that all suffering originates from sin, and that by sin man lost the purity in which his resemblance to God consisted. Had man retained the image of his Maker; or, in other words, had he preserved his original perfection, do we suppose that his physical form would have been the seat of disease and suffering, or his mind the nursery of evil passions? Had he retained that image, would war, intemperance, or slavery, ever have embarrassed and perplexed the social system. Is it not possible, that the variation in the color of the different varieties of the human race may have been permitted as a consequence of sin? May we not hope, that when the curse is removed from the earth, and man resumes the lost image of his Maker—that is, becomes perfectly conformed to the Divine Will—all these great evils will, as a natural consequence, be abolished. Meanwhile, let every one examine himself, and see whether he is traveling on towards that perfection which, acquired, will reinstate him in the image of God. Let every one look carefully into his own heart, to see how many traces of the moral image of all holiness, he can there discover. And let it be the care of every one to assimilate himself still nearer and nearer to that image by the practice of all virtue.

TAMAR DAVIS.

WONDERFUL PRESERVATION.

In the church-yard at Keyshoe, in Bedfordshire, England, is the following inscription, now almost obliterated. The event to which it relates, together with the circumstances which are known to have been connected with it, appear too remarkable to be consigned to oblivion. No alteration has been admitted in copying the inscription from the stone but in the spelling and grammar:—

"In memory of the mighty hand of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ, who preserved the life of William Dickens, April 17th, 1718, when he was pointing the Steeple, and fell from the ridge of the middle window in the spire, over the south-west pinnacle. He dropped upon the battlement, and there broke his leg and foot, and drove down the long coping stones, and so fell to the ground, with his neck upon one standard of his chair, when the other end took the ground." After the repetition of some expressions, he was heard by his brother to make, when near the ground, as 'Christ have mercy upon me! Lord Jesus Christ help me!' it is added: "Died November 29th, 1759, aged 73 years."

The height from which this person fell was no less than 132 feet, and his leg and foot were extremely fractured by striking against the battlement. But his damage in other respects was so trifling, that he not only lived more than forty years afterwards; but within seven months from the time of his fall he was capable of ascending the steeple the second time, and he then finished pointing the spire. The chair in which he sat was suspended by a strong rope, consisting of four strands or twisted cords. Yet it parted, evidently through the rocking of the spire, caused by the striking of the church clock at eight in the morning. Upon examining the rope, it appeared that three strands of the rope, out of the four which composed it, had been previously cut through with a knife.

William Dickens had been in company the evening before this event with a person of the same business; and a strong suspicion was entertained that this man had cut the rope in revenge for being disappointed of the job. Whether this suspicion was well or ill-founded must be referred to the unerring Judge of the hearts and lives of all; but one fact is as certain as it was awful. The same man, having shortly after finished building a stack of chimneys, climbed to the top of them, to give a boasting cheer to the people assembled there, when the work, not being dry, gave way, and falling with him, killed him on the spot.

The grandson of the man who was so wonderfully preserved is at this time minister of the dissenting congregation at Keyshoe; and every particular of the account here given has been confirmed by the strongest authority.

May it excite in us a lively sense of continual dependence upon the Lord for our preservation in all the hazards to which our lives are necessarily exposed. Let us call to mind the various deliverances we have severally experienced in imminent dangers; and with grateful acknowledgments of past interpositions, cast all our care on him who careth for us; making it our grand concern to live not for ourselves, but to the Lord Jesus Christ who preserves us from falling into everlasting perdition! ☞ The rejoinder of Bro. Cottrell to our strictures upon his communication in the Recorder of Nov. 14, is given below. We are not anxious to make any direct reply. "H. C. H." has taken up as much of our time, and our reply to him has occupied as much room, as we can well spare for this subject at present. We would say, in regard to our omitting Bro. C.'s "closing remarks," that we did so because, in our opinion, they added nothing to the argument. We have the same opinion of his present article; but, that he may have no occasion to complain of unfairness, we give it an insertion.

"DESTINY OF THE WICKED."

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

I thank you for publishing that part of my former letter which you did. I am satisfied with your leaving out the introduction; but I should have been pleased to have seen the closing remarks of that letter in the Recorder. It is my desire, and doubtless yours, that truth may triumph, and that we may know the truth. Error can do us no good; but the more truth we have the better.

I proceed to notice some of your "remarks," taking care that the length of my article shall be no bar to its publication.

1. Sinners choose sin, knowing its effects upon them in this life. How do we know that they will "have no opportunity for any thing else but reflection" in another life? When they are "cut off from all communication with such things" as "they can see, hear, taste, and feel," their state will be almost as dark as when the prophecy of the Psalmist is fulfilled—"Yet a little while and the wicked shall not be." Ps. 37. If space would allow, I would prove from the Book that we shall have our senses in another life—a short life, however, to the wicked.

2. You are right. You made sin the cause, and the punishment the natural and necessary effect. With regard to physical law, this holds good. Is the case the same with respect to moral law? Was the flood, and the burning of Sodom, the natural effect of the sins of the antedeluvians and Sodomites? These are examples of God's way of punishing sin.

3. If the "destiny of the wicked" were not clearly revealed in the Bible, for myself, I would never write on the subject, lest I should be wise above what is written.

4. "Read and you will know," that the earliest accounts of the doctrine of immortal souls, in any history, inform us that it was held by pagan philosophers. And in those dark ages, when "times and laws" were changed, how natural and easy it was to baptize this, and purgatory, a kindred heathen fable, (see Virgil,) as Christian, to increase the church revenue. Eccl. 12, 7—"Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was." MAN was made of dust. Was "the spirit" or "breath of life" a conscious being before it was given? If not, will it be after it returns to God? The same Preacher tells us, "That which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; as the one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they have all one breath; all are from the dust, and all turn to dust again." Ch. 3: 10, 20. "The dead know not any thing; their love, and their hatred, and their envy, is now perished." Ch. 9: 5, 6. "For there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither THOU [not thy body] goest." Verse 10.

5. I do not advocate the doctrine of annihilation, but simply, that man was made of dust, and returns to dust again. "If the dead rise not, then they who have fallen asleep in Christ are perished." 1 Cor. 15: 16, 18.

6. 2 Thess. 1: 9, means what it says. "For behold the day cometh which shall burn like an oven; and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble; and the day which cometh shall burn them up, saith Jehovah of hosts, so that it shall leave them neither root nor branch." "And ye shall tread down the wicked, for they shall be ashes under the soles of your feet." Malachi 4: 1, 3. "He will burn UP the chaff with unquenchable fire." Matt. 3: 12. The first death turns man to dust; the second, turns the sinner to ashes.

THE BURIAL OF LOVE.

BY WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT.

Two dark-eyed maids, at shut of day,
Sat, where a river rolled away,
With calm, sad brows, and raven hair,
And one was pale, and both were fair.

Bring flowers, they sang, bring flowers unblown,
Bring forest blooms of name unknown,
Bring budding sprays from wood and wild,
To strew the bier of Love, the Child.

Close softly, fondly, while we weep,
His eyes, that death may seem like sleep;
And lay his hands, in sign of rest,
His waxen hands, across his breast.

And make his grave where violets hide,
Where the star-flowers strew the rivulet's side,
And the blue-birds, in the mists of Spring,
Of cloudless skies and Summer sing.

Place near him, as ye lay him low,
His idle shafts, his loosened bow,
The silken band that oft around
His waggish eyes in mirth he wound.

But we shall mourn him long, and miss
His ready smile, his ready kiss,
The patter of his little feet,
Sweet frowns, and stammered phrases sweet;

And graver looks serene and high,
A light of heaven in that young eye;
All these will haunt us, till the heart
Shall ache—and ache—and tears shall start.

The bow, the band, shall fall to dust,
The shining arrows waste with rust,
But he whom now, from sight of men,
We hide in earth, shall live again;

Shall break these clods, a form of light,
With nobler mien and clearer sight,
And in the eternal glory stand,
With those who wait at God's right hand.

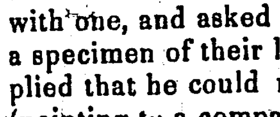
THE RECENTLY-DISCOVERED WRITTEN LANGUAGE OF AFRICA.

A great deal of interest has been excited during the present year by the singular announcement that a written language has been disovered in Western Africa, brought from a tribe in the far interior some time since, and but recently made known to Europeans. The existence of this language was first authentically communicated to the public through the columns of the Literary Gazette, by Rev. Mr. Koelle, a missionary of the English Church Missionary Society, stationed at Sierra Leone. Mr. Koelle gives the following account of the circumstances attending the discovery:—

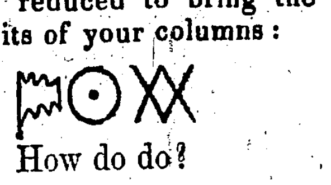
"Capt. Forbes, on the station there, being one day on the shore near Cape Mount, on or near the northern boundary of the American Colony of Liberia, saw some unknown characters on a native house. On making inquiries, he learned that these characters represented the Vy language; and he found a man of the Vy nation who possessed a book, and was able to read the characters. The man remained several days on board the vessel of Capt. Forbes, and was seen there by Mr. Koelle, who also saw the book, and heard him read it. The man stated that the art of writing was communicated to his nation by eight strangers from the interior a long time ago; that schools were instituted, and the people generally taught; but that the inroads of the Portuguese had checked education, and few could now read."

It affords me great pleasure to be able to lay before the literary public and the friends of Africa, as well as all who feel an interest in the missionary enterprise, the accompanying specimen of the language thus discovered, and possessed of what is certainly remarkable interest. I am indebted for the original to Rev. C. Colden Hoffman, of the American Episcopal Mission to Western Africa, and who is stationed at Cape Palmas. His account of the language, as obtained from the writer of the following specimen, differs from that contained in the statement of Rev. Mr. Koelle. Mr. Hoffman gave me the following facts:

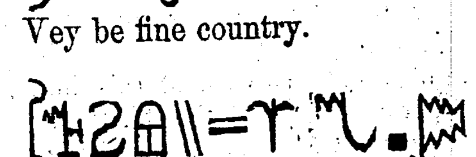
Being one day in Monrovia he saw several individuals of peculiar appearance and dress, and on inquiring who they were, he was informed that they belonged to the Vy nation, to which the public attention had just then become attracted by the reports relating to their literature. He sought an interview with one, and asked him to furnish him with a specimen of their language. The man replied that he could not write, but that "he (pointing to a companion) knew all about it." The second, on being asked to write several sentences, produced the following, which are reduced to bring the lines within the limits of your columns:



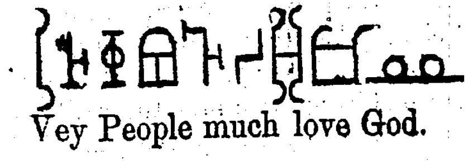
How do do?



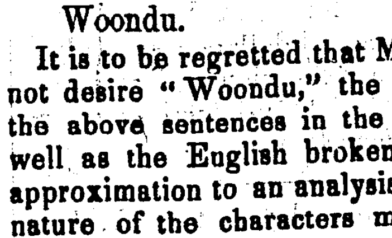
Vey be fine country.



Vey (People) love Tobacco.



Vey People much love God.



Woondu.

It is to be regretted that Mr. Hoffman did not desire "Woondu," the writer, to give the above sentences in the Vy dialect, as well as the English broken idiom. Some approximation to an analysis of the syllabic nature of the characters might then have been made. Mr. Koelle says that the alphabet consists of about one hundred letters, each representing a syllable. He gives a short specimen of the alphabet, and a list of about fifty words. There are distinct characters for bah, beigh, bih, boh, boo, and loong; and perhaps, if we had the whole alphabet, for more syllables beginning with b. It will be noticed that several of the characters above are repeated in different sentences, particularly the first, representing "Vy," nation, people, or tribe being understood.

"Woondu" informed Mr. Hoffman that the language was introduced among his people about twenty or thirty years ago, by the inventor; and further, that this modern Cadmus is still living with the tribe. As every thing connected with this subject will doubtless be of great interest, I deem it a privilege to communicate the facts in my possession for the information of the curious, the scholar, and the inquirer.

The Vyots live on and near a promontory, as Mr. Hoffman remarked, about fifty miles from Monrovia, if his information was correct. Mr. Koelle embraced an early opportunity of proceeding in a vessel to the nearest point from which the nation could be reached, and will doubtless make known the result of his discoveries at an early day.

Unquestionably the vast central plain of Africa offers a splendid field for the enterprise and explorations of the historian, the geographer, and the scientific traveler. The great discovery of August 1, 1849, by Rev. Dr. Livingston, the missionary of the London Missionary Society in South Africa, accompanied by Messrs. Oswell and Murray, who made known the existence of Lake Ngami, in lat. 19° south, is as important as interesting. The present expedition of Drs. Barth and Overweg, on the north, who had at last advices penetrated beyond Bornu into the Air country, promises still more important results. The inscriptions and characters found by these travelers give them reason to expect signal and valuable discoveries in the far interior. The researches of these learned men will be looked for with increasing interest, as they penetrate deeper into the unexplored regions of the central continent.

Yours truly, WM. OLAND BOURNE.

THE OATH OF ROMAN CATHOLIC BISHOPS.

The following translation of the oath which every Roman Catholic Bishop is required to take, shows more clearly and forcibly than any essay we have ever read, the nature and extent of their allegiance to the occupant of St. Peter's chair.

TRANSLATION.

I, N., elected to the church of N., will be from this time forward faithful and obedient to the blessed Apostle Peter, and to the holy Roman Church, and to our Lord, Lord N., the N. Pope of that name, and to his successors, canonically entering upon that office. I will not, by counsel, or consent, or act, cause them to lose life or limb, or to be deprived of their liberty, or that violent hands should be laid on them in any manner, or any injuries be brought upon them under any pretext whatsoever. I will knowingly disclose to no person, to their injury, the counsel with which they may intrust me, by themselves, their messengers or letters. I will assist them in retaining and defending, against all men, the Roman Papacy, and the royalties of St. Peter, saving my order, (meaning the duty he owes to the monastic order to which he belongs.) I will honorably treat the legate of the Apostolic See in going and returning, and assist him in his necessities. The rights, honors, privileges, and authority of the holy Roman Church of our Lord the Pope and his successors aforesaid, I will take care to increase and promote. I will not be concerned with plan, or deed, or discussion, in which anything injurious or prejudicial is plotted against our said Lord, or the said Roman Church, as to their persons, rights, honor, state and power. And if I shall know that such things are discussing and forwarding by any persons, I will prevent them to the utmost of my power, and, as soon as I can, make it known to our said Lord, or to some other by whom it may come to his knowledge. The rules of the holy fathers, their decrees, ordinances, arrangements, I will with all my strength observe and cause to be observed by others Heretics, schismatics, and rebels to our said Lord, or his successors aforesaid, I will to the utmost of my power persecute and fight against. When summoned to a synod I will come, unless prevented by a canonical hindrance. I will, in my own individual person, visit the threshold of the Apostles every three years; and I will render an account to our Lord and his successors aforesaid, of my whole pastoral office, and of all things in any way pertaining to the state of my church, to the discipline of the clergy and people, and finally to the salvation of the souls committed to my trust; and in turn I will humbly receive, and with the utmost diligence fulfil, the apostolic mandates. But, if I shall be detained by any lawful impediment, I will fulfil all the things here inbefore stated by a trusty messenger, having a special mission for this purpose, a member of my chapter, or one holding an ecclesiastical dignity, or otherwise holding the function of parson, or, if all these fail, by a priest of the diocese, or, if such clerical deputation altogether fail me, then by some other secular or regular presbyter, of approved probity and religion, fully instructed concerning all the aforesaid matters. With respect to such impediment, I will acquaint the Holy See, by lawful proofs, to be transmitted by the aforesaid messenger to the Cardinal proponant, in the congregation of the Sacred Council of the Holy Roman Church. Moreover, I will never sell, nor give away, nor pledge, the possessions belonging to my title, neither will I renew a life-interest, or alienate them in any way, even with the consent of the chapter of my church, without consulting the Roman Pontiff. And if I shall chance to incur any alienation of such property, I am willing to suffer thereupon the penalties contained in any constitution passed on the subject. So help me God, and these Holy Gospels of God.

THE HIGHER LAW.

As our Creator has organized man to be controlled by his own will, so he has instituted national government as a divinely authorized controller of a nation's actions. "The powers that" legitimately "be," the Apostle assures us, "are ordained of God;" and resistance to their authority, is not only political, but moral treason. The apostle does not assume to prescribe any single form; nor even to lay down any decisive test, as to what legitimately constitutes "the powers that be;" but when that is an admitted point, that a rightful and legitimate government does exist, obedience is a divine law. And as the national government has not, like the individual, a legal magistracy over and above itself, to protect its rights, and arbitrate its disputes, so it must, responsibly to the Almighty Ruler of all, possess the power to protect itself, and secure justice in international dealing. Hence, the magistrate is armed with the "sword," to execute even capital penalty upon the domestic foe, or prosecute war upon a foreign aggressor. These two exercises of the power of the "SWORD," stand upon precisely the same basis; a power not always or often necessary to be used, but always to be used when necessary. If either or both can be abolished, (a question which circumstances must decide,) a step, a grand step, has been made in a millennial march. Nevertheless, beyond this power of the magistracy to wield the sword of self-preservation and justice, a nation and a government are bound, as an individual, by the laws of God. The obligation of obedience to a Government, apostolical example has taught us, does not authorize us to obey man rather than God. If "the powers that be," whose legitimacy even the right of revolution does not allow me to question, should require me to abjure Christianity, I must neither obey nor resist, but suffer. If a government should require me, as a military officer, to fight in an unjust war, I must send in at once my moral protest and my resignation. If a Government require me, beyond its right of securing self-preservation and justice, to violate eternal right, or the law of God, such a requirement is null, and I must disregard it. If I have ever taken any oath to support the Constitution, regardless of God's law, my conscience has been entrapped, and that oath is so far null. If called to repeat that oath, to support an unrighteous Constitution, audibly and firmly, I must utter the reserve, "except it reverse the law of God," and the Government which would make that reserve a ban of ostracism upon me, is a Government of blasphemy.

THE THREE BEST BOOKS.

BY MRS. ST. SIMON.

A devout old man, who lived in a poor and solitary hut, possessed so much prudence and wisdom that he knew how to impart good counsel and salutary instruction to each one who came to him.

A learned man, who visited him, wondered at his wise sayings, and said to him—"Whence hast thou all this wisdom? I see no books in thy hut, from which thou couldst have acquired so much knowledge."

The old man answered—"And still I possess the three best books in the world, and I read daily in them. These books are: The Works of God above me and around me; the Conscience in my bosom; and the Holy Scriptures.

"The Works of God, the Heavens and the Earth, are opened like a vast book before us; they proclaim to us the Omnipotence, wisdom, and goodness of the heavenly Father.

"My Consciense tells me what I have to do, and what to leave undone.

"The Holy Scriptures, that book of all books, teaches us how God from the creation of the world, has revealed himself to man, and how the Son of God, our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, came into this world, and what he has promised and proffered, done and suffered, to make us holy and happy."

DON'T WORRY.—When Buistrode Whitelocke was embarking as Cromwell's envoy to Sweden, in 1653, he was much disturbed in mind as he rested in Harwich on the preceding night, which was very stormy, while he reflected on the distracted state of the nation. It happened that a confidential servant slept in an adjacent bed, who, finding that his master could not sleep, at length said, "Pray sir, will you give me leave to ask you a question?" "Certainly." "Pray, sir, don't you think that God governed the world very well before you came into it?" "Undoubtedly." "And pray, sir, don't you think he will govern it quite as well when you are gone out of it?" "Certainly." "Then, sir, pray excuse me, but don't you think you may trust him to govern it quite as well as long as you live?" To this question Whitelocke had nothing to reply; but turning himself about, soon fell fast asleep till he was summoned to embark.

CHOICE SAYINGS OF NEWTON.—My principal method of defeating heresy, is by establishing the truth. One proposes to fill a bushel with tares; now if I can fill it first with wheat, I defy his attempts.

Many have puzzled themselves about the origin of evil; I observe that there is an evil, and that there is a way to escape it, and with this I begin and end.

I can conceive a living man without an arm or a leg, but not without a head or heart; so there are some truths essential to vital religion, and which all awakened souls are taught.

We should take care we do not make our profession of religion a receipt in full for all other obligations.

A man truly illuminated will no more despise others, than Bartimeus, after his own eyes were opened, would take a stick and beat every blind man he met.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, January 2, 1851.

"CHURCH ACTION ON SABBATH DESECRATION."

In our paper of last week appeared an article, purporting to be the action of one of our western churches upon Sabbath Desecration. It is due to our readers to say, that the article was not sent to us, so far as we know, by the authority of the church. It appears to have been sent by one of the "Acting Committee," upon his own responsibility. What particular object he had in view, we are not informed; and we had, at first, some scruples about publishing it. But, upon farther reflection, we judged that the church would not take any action upon such a subject, which they would be ashamed to have known to the world; and as the article in question discussed some points which ought to be taken into serious consideration by all Sabbath-keepers, we concluded to spread it before our readers.

We scarcely know what to say in regard to the practice of making cheese on the Sabbath. Once we should have denounced it, without hesitation, as a wicked violation of God's law. But in conversation with a brother, some time ago, who was somewhat acquainted with the process, we learned that it was actually less labor "to set the milk for the curd"—we think that was the expression—than it was to strain it, and set it aside for other purposes. For our own part, we are not skilled in the mystery of cheese-making; but, supposing that our informant was correct, we did not know but our former impressions might have been somewhat uncharitable. We suppose that if a man keeps forty or fifty cows, the labor of milking them must be attended to on the Sabbath, as on other days. That is necessary for the prevention of distress. But what disposition should be made of the milk afterwards, in order that the Sabbath may not be broken, we confess that we are not exactly prepared to say. There may be, for aught we know, a real difficulty in settling this question; but perhaps there is another one, which ought first to be considered. Is it right for a Christian to undertake the dairy business at all? We shall not say, till we have more light, whether it is, or is not; but we have no hesitation in saying, that a Christain has no right to engage in a business which compels him, week after week, to violate the Sabbath. If cheese-making is of this nature, it is not proper business for him, and the sooner he has done with it the better.

But what justifiable apology can be made for hay-making and sugar-making on the Sabbath-day? A sugar-maker may have his trough, or receiving vessel, made large enough to hold all the "sap" that flows from the tree in twenty-four hours, instead of having it so small as to require to be emptied two or three times a day; in which case he need not visit his "bush" during the Sabbath at all. A conscientious Sabbath-keeper would have it made so. As to the work of boiling down, and granulating or "sugaring off," there is no necessity of attending to it on the Sabbath. He who keeps constantly in mind, that a Sabbath-day is coming, will make such arrangements as will obviate the necessity of any such profanation. We have lived in the woods, and claim to have been somewhat initiated into the mystery of sugar-making.

As for hay-making, in ordinary cases there is no excuse for it. But when a cloud arises, and the heavens grow black, threatening a deluge of rain, what then? Must not the hay be secured? Shall farmers be so superstitious as to let it lie, and run the risk of losing it altogether, rather than do a little work on the Sabbath? Perhaps no argument, that we can offer, will appear convincing to those who love their own interest better than the cause of God; but we cannot help saying, that were we a farmer, and had hay lying out, we should feel bound to let it lie, rather than fly in the face of a precept which says, "In it [the Sabbath] thou shalt not do any work." It might rain before the Sabbath was over, it is true; or it might rain on First-day, so that we could not work then. But we are sure, that He who sends the rain would not send it unless He had good reasons for doing so; and if He saw it best that it should rain, we should conclude that He saw it best that we should lose our hay. What right have we to gain, or save, any more property than we can by keeping the Sabbath-day holy? Men sometimes pretend that such circumstances of risk are a providential call to dispense with a strict obedience to the commandment, and piously plead that it would be tempting Providence to neglect the opportunity of securing the bounty which he offers them. But this talk about being providentially called to break God's law savors a little too much of the wisdom that is earthy. God's providence never calls to disobedience; otherwise God would be arrayed against himself. We believe, that God sometimes places a person in circumstances of strong temptation, on purpose to prove him, whether he will walk in his commandments, or no; and blessed is he that overcometh his natural cupidity, under such circumstances. There are circumstances which try the faith of the Christian. They put him to the test, whether he can rely upon God's word or not. The promises, "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee"—"Seek first the kingdom of God, and all these things shall be added unto you"—"Trust in the Lord, and do good; so shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed"—"No good thing will He withhold from them that walk uprightly—were given to be believed—trusted to—acted upon. It is very evident that the great majority of professors do not believe these promises. If God threaten to take away their hay-crop, or their wheat crop, and they, by some act of disobedience to His law, can save it, they very quickly show how little they rely upon them. If there is one out of a hundred, or a thousand, that resolves to risk his all, and leave the result to Him who has said that man liveth not by bread alone," how quickly is he denounced as fanatical, or superstitious. Strong faith is a rare grace on the earth. When the son of man cometh, will he find it at all?

Upon traveling and common newspaper reading on the Sabbath, two other practices adverted to in the Committee's Report, we have heretofore offered our views. Upon the business of cheese-making we want a little more light. Perhaps some of our correspondents can give it. We are firm in the conviction, however, that the Sabbath is too holy an institution to be made a matter of barter and sale. He who would sell its sanctity for a few pieces of silver, would not scruple, we fear, to sell the Lord of the Sabbath for the same.

SOURCES OF THE COMMON ENGLISH BIBLE.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Much excitement has existed of late relative to a new translation of the Scriptures; and it is probable that the excitability manifested, arises to a considerable extent from an undue respect for the present translation. A due regard to the present version ought to be had; but when such regard amounts to idolatry, it is reprehensible. To aid in properly appreciating our present version, I send you an extract from a letter of Rev. Dr. Homer to the Editor of the Comprehensive Commentary, which will show, that this version is not more of a translation from the original text than a transcribing of former translations. The Rev. Doctor, after mentioning the facilities he had of investigating the subject, says:—

"Thus, so far as the common New Testament goes, I found, by collating its text with that of Bibles of an earlier date, that the term new translation could only be applied to one eighty-fourth part, not including words and passages strictly synonymous For some years, as permitted, I have gone through each book of the Old Testament, and found that only one twenty-eighth part of its text varies from the old English text. Thus has been confirmed, by my own examination, the acknowledgment of the translators themselves, in their preface to their first Bible of 1611, that they had never thought, from the beginning, of the need of making a new translation; but, out of the many good translations (English and foreign) to make a good one not justly to be excepted against. Yet I have believed, that the translators did not wholly neglect the Hebrew and Greek originals, but did often compare the English and foreign versions, which they consulted with the originals; and they did probably examine lexicons, Hebrew and Greek, yet not enough to aid their judgments in determining their choice of the texts. Let it be remembered, too, that King James and his Primate, Archbishop Bancroft, were known to be very hostile to the Geneva Bible, for reasons well understood, and that the Bishop's text was to be principally followed by them as their standard, so far as the originals would admit. Ample evidence appears in a work of Dr. Gill, chaplain to the Archbishop (Geo. Abbott,) one of the translators, that some of the principal scholars in that body did repeatedly suggest new and various translations; but they were as often checked in their progress, by being reminded that their course would go to the making of a new translation, which was not the object of those who had brought them together, viz. King James and the Primate, who had reluctantly consented to a substitute for the Church or Bishop's Bible. Dr. Marsh says: 'To judge of our authorized version, we should have some knowledge of those English Bibles out of which the Bible of King James, according to his view, had been compiled.' The influence of King James, of his stern, self-willed and worldly Primate, and of a few other dignitaries, made our last translation, in many parts, less than it would have been, had the best scholars of the body (probably about twelve prime Hebrew and Greek) scholars been permitted and encouraged to proceed to a new translation. Shall we, then, the people of a free republic, English in our origin and language—as a nation, shall we, I say, who are independent of Great Britain, in both Church and State, hold our Bible at the will of a despotic James, a king noted for pedantry, passion, self-will, and wanton abuse of speech before others, and of his cringing Primate? Shall we be under the forbidding frown of imperious Elizabeth, directed against the first man in the church—I mean Bishop Coverdale the holy, who furnished the first complete English Bible in 1535? Shall we still encourage James and Bancroft in their jealousies of the Geneva text? Shall we, in this age of fast advancing biblical knowledge, decline or refuse to consult the text of the received version at the side of the sister Bibles, and their respective authorities at the side of the pure original text, and withhold that correction of text and interpretation in which the mass of the learned and liberal have an agreement?"

Thus far from Dr. Homer's letter, as published by the Editor of the Comprehensive Commentary. On which I remark, that the extract presents our version of the Scriptures, in regard to its being a translation, in a light not very generally received. It shows, that that body of divines, convoked by King James, did not intend, or, if they did intend, were not permitted to give a faithful translation. It shows, also, that our version can lay but small claim to being a translation made by them, and that our present version, to a large extent, is but a compilation from former translations. If such be the fact, much of the veneration for the received translation is uncalled for; and it is not without cause, that many expressions in our version are objected to as not conveying the exact mind of the Holy Spirit as dictated in the originals. Baptists have raised their objections to the word baptize, as not being a translation of the Greek term representing the Christian rite. But Baptists are not the only class who have a right to take exceptions to the authorized version. The Sabbatarian, also, may justly take exceptions; for where, in the original, is the expression corresponding to "first day of the week," which occurs frequently in the present version? If the Baptist has reason to think that the present version has a tendency to lead the reader astray on the subject of baptism, much more has the Sabbatarian reason to think that it has a tendency to lead astray on the subject of the Sabbath. What is demanded, is a true and faithful translation. And if we are to have another translation, as I suppose we are, God grant that it may be a translation, and not a transcription, nor a commentary. S. S. Griswold.

ATTEMPT TO ENSLAVE A FREEMAN.

In our last we gave some account of the arrest, in Philadelphia, of a colored man named Adam Gibson, charged with being a fugitive from slavery. He was examined before Mr. Ingraham, the United States Commissioner, who pronounced him a slave, and delivered him over to the proper officers. But alas for the hopes of gain which the slave-catchers had entertained. Adam was taken to Maryland, and shown to Wm. Knight, the reputed master, who denied ever having owned him. Accordingly, the alledged slave, whom a United States officer had doomed to perpetual bondage, was discharged from custody, and returned to his wife and children in the vicinity of Philadelphia. The fact seems to be, (as was testified by a colored man on the examination,) that Gibson was owned many years ago by a Maryland citizen, named Davis, but about 1843 was released from slavery, and ever since has resided in the North, a free man.

This case, proving as it does that under the Fugitive Slave Law a free citizen may be arrested on a false pretense, and without legal warrant dragged before a U. S. Commissioner, his liberty sworn away, and he hurried off into slavery—all not merely without any credible testimony, but in defiance of positive evidence of his freedom—is making a deep impression, and will do more to bring the law into disrepute than all the essays that have ever been written on the subject. The New York Commercial Advertiser, a paper which may be ranked among the moderate supporters of the fugitive act, after recapitulating the leading facts connected with Gibson's arrest, says:—

"We beg to say, that Mr. Commissioner Ingraham, of Philadelphia, has struck a deadlier blow at the Fugitive Slave Law, as it is, than all its opponents put together. He has proved that it can be perverted to injustice. He has made its enemies to rejoice, and has convinced us of the propriety of a reservation we have repeatedly made when speaking of this enactment—made by Washington Hunt in his letter to Mr. Granger, and made by many others who have desired that the act should be entitled to the respect of a law of the land, and be universally recognized as obligatory, and entitled to popular obedience and support—to wit: that it was capable of amendment, and might safely be made less rigorous."

BRITISH ENCOURAGEMENT OF HOME INDUSTRY.

A recently-published correspondence between Mr. Robert Kerr and the Lords Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, shows what kind of encouragement is afforded to home ingenuity and industry by the British Government. It seems that Mr. Kerr, who is an extensive shawl manufacturer at Paisley, Scotland, was desirous of entering the list of competitors at the approaching Industrial Exhibition. He found, however, that he could not do so upon equal terms with foreign manufacturers; that while, on the one hand, French and German shawls were admitted into Great Britain by the payment of a duty of ten per cent., and even this duty was to be remitted for the occasion of the Exhibition, on the other hand, British shawls were entirely excluded from France and Germany, and the British manufacturer was compelled to pay a duty of not less than twenty per cent. on the paper used in designs. Hence the correspondence; in the course of which Mr. Kerr says, that one of the designs he had it in "contemplation to prepare for the Exhibition, would cost, before a single shawl could be produced, £470, of which the sum of £92 15s. would be duty to Government, or a tax of not less than twenty per cent. on the mere preparation and fitting up of the design." In view of this, he asked the Commissioners of the Treasury to authorize a removal or drawback of the particular duty he had specified, "and of all duties on card paper used in designs for the Exhibition of 1851, by the Shawl Manufacturers of Great Britain, so that they may be placed on a somewhat equal footing of competition with foreign manufacturers." To this application a direct negative was given, the answer being, "I have to inform you that my Lords must decline to comply with your request." Of course Scotch ardor in the advancement of manufactures will not be cooled by such a reply. We expect to hear that the shawl for which designs alone cost over two thousand dollars, was ready at the opening of the Exhibition, and compared favorably with the best productions of the French and German loom.

In New York, one day last week, there was a rumor that Jenny Lind, Barnum, and suite, had been lost on the passage from Wilmington to Charleston. It made sale for numerous "extras," but was soon contradicted "by authority."

☞ We have received two numbers of a paper published at Paris, Maine, called the Second Advent Review and Sabbath Herald. The general character of its contents is indicated by its title. It advocates the Seventh-day or Bible Sabbath in connection with the doctrine of the speedy second advent of our Lord. Of the correctness of its teachings in relation to the time of the second advent, we are not prepared to speak, for our Bible is not very definite on that point—perhaps because there was no special necessity for definiteness. But in relation to the Sabbath, we do not hesitate to certify to the general correctness of the teaching of the paper in question. As a specimen of its manner of treating that subject, we copy an article by one of its Publishing Committee.

THOUGHTS ON THE SABBATH.

Those who observe the Sabbath of the Bible, may plead as their foundation, a divine institution. "GOD BLESSED THE SEVENTH DAY AND SANCTIFIED IT." In this consists the sabbatic institution itself. As God has never taken this blessing from the seventh day, the original institution still exists. As God has never sanctified another day of the week, much less enjoined another day as a weekly Sabbath, it is the only sabbatic institution.

Jehovah was the first who rested on the seventh day. His example was followed by the Son of God, and by the church universal, so far as the record of inspiration extends. How absurd to believe that the Great Creator observed a "carnal ordinance!"

As the seventh day was here sanctified by God, its observance is henceforward a moral duty. But, like the other precepts of the Decalogue, it was not first expressly enjoined in the written word.

When God enjoined the Sabbath on Israel, [Ex. 16,] he pointed out the true seventh day, by a threefold weekly miracle, which continued for the space of forty years. Thenceforward the history of the Sabbath is given in the records of inspiration so that a knowledge of the true seventh day has been preserved to the church.

When the law was given by the voice of the Almighty, we find the observance of the Sabbath enforced by the fourth commandment. The reason for its observance, as well as the date of its sanctification, is also clearly given.

The Lord made heaven and earth in six days and rested the seventh, "wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath day and hallowed it." The Sabbath, then, is a standing memorial of God's act of creation. By its observance men would have kept in memory the knowledge of the true God.

We have now considered three important points in the history of the Sabbath; first, its institution, [Gen. 2,] second, the fact that the true seventh day was pointed out to Israel, [Ex. 16; Neh. 9,] and third, the grand law of the Sabbath, [Ex. 20.]

As we proceed in this examination, we notice three different sabbaths. First, the Sabbath of the Lord—the seventh day, [See Ex. 20,] second, the sabbaths of the Jews, the first and eighth day of their feasts, &c., [Lev. 23,] and third, the sabbath of the land, the seventh year, [Lev. 25.]

As the Sabbath of the Lord had a real existence before "the law of commandments contained in ordinances" was appended, therefore, when that law was nailed to the cross, the Sabbath remained in full force. Not so with the sabbaths of the Jews, and the Sabbath of the land. That law gave them their only force; and when that ceased they were abolished.

The most precious blessings are promised to those who keep God's Sabbath. See Isa. 61 and 63. And it is worthy of note, that this prophecy pertains to a period when God's salvation is near to be revealed. The blessing is promised to "the son of the stranger," (the Gentile,) as well as to Israel.

Mark the distinction between God's Sabbath, and those of the Jews as presented in the prophets. Of the perpetuity of the first, let us judge after reading Isa. 24, where we are informed of its existence in the new earth. But God assures us by the prophet, that the latter shall "cease." See Hosea 2: 11. The fulfillment of this prophecy may be read in Col. 2. Please compare Isa. 64: 4, Ex. 20: 10, with Hosea 2, and Lev. 23, and note the language, "my sabbaths," and "her sabbaths."

Though the Scriptures nowhere teach or authorize a change of the Sabbath, yet they contain an accurate prophecy of the power that should do this thing. Let the reader compare Dan. 7, with the history of the Papal Church, and note its acts of changing "times and laws."

We have seen the grand law of the Sabbath embodied in the Decalogue. We come now to the New Testament. That our Lord did not destroy that law, or lessen our obligation to obey it, he clearly teaches in Matt. 5: 17—19. And we may with the utmost safety affirm, that "the apostles did not disturb, what their Lord left untouched." See Rom. 3: 31; James 2. We say, therefore, that the New Testament teaches the perpetuity of God's law, and FOR THAT REASON DOES NOT RE-ENACT IT. Brevity forbids a more lengthy notice of this important point.

Our Lord came to "magnify the law and make it honorable." He kept his Father's commandments; but he brushed aside the traditions of men by which they were made void. "The Sabbath," says he, "was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath;" by which he rebuked the pharisaic observance of the Sabbath on one hand, and on the other the views of those who teach that the Lord's Sabbath is one of the things against us, which were taken out of the way at Christ's death. [Col. 2.]

The fact that those who had been with Jesus during his ministry "rested the Sabbath day according to the commandment," after his crucifixion, and resumed labor on the first day of the week, shows clearly that they knew nothing of its change from the seventh to the first day.

The fact that God has never sanctified the first day of the week, shows plainly, that it is not sacred time—is not a divinely instituted Sabbath.

The fact that he has never required us to rest on that day; shows that its observance in the place of the Sabbath, is a clear instance of making void the commandments of God to keep the traditions of men.

That sanctified time exists in the gospel dispensation, or in other words, that there is a day which belongs to God, is clear from Rev. 1: 10. That "the Lord's day," is the Sabbath day, is plain from Isa. 58: 13.

As the SABBATH WAS MADE FOR MAN, we find it under all dispensations, and in every part of the Bible. Those, therefore, who profane the Sabbath, sin against God and wound their own souls. J. N. Andrews.

THE USE OF WEALTH.

At the late anniversary of the Historical Society, says the N. Y. Recorder, Dr. Bethune made the following beautiful and truthful remarks on the use of wealth. It is time that such sentiments were read and pondered by all who are in the possession of wealth. The time is fast coming when the mere possession of wealth, without either the taste or the disposition to use it for the elevation and improvement of society, will be a disgrace rather than an honor. The man of wealth has a vastly greater interest at stake in the stability and order of society than the poor, and his obligations to society are proportionably greater:—

"A feeling pervades this community that it is not the possession of wealth, but the use of it, that dignifies and renders its possessor worthy of respect. It is not the exhibition of splendor and fashionable pride which entitles man to honor. If he shows me only his wealth and his elaborate furniture, he only reminds me of his wealth and my poverty, and I thank him not for it. But if he shows me upon his walls pictures from the pencils of the native genius of my land—if he pleases my eye with the evidence of present success and promises of still higher future triumphs—if he has brought from some nook of obscurity a suffering child of genius, and has enabled him to glorify and serve his country—if he shows me he has laid the corner-stone of some institution for the instruction of the young—then I thank him. I thank God who made him rich, and that he has used his riches for such noble ends. There is no envy of such a man—all men honor and respect him, and he receives, as he deserves, their eulogies. But the man who lives only to accumulate and hoard, and who leaves no record of his usefulness in arts, or letters, or morals, or religion, or charity, goes "'To the vile dust from whence he sprung, Unwept, unhonored, and unsung.'"

FRENCH BAPTIST MISSION IN CANADA.

The American Baptist Home Mission Society reports from twelve to fifteen stations in the neighborhood of St. John's, Lower Canada, and most of them in a flourishing condition. The missionaries have been instrumental in winning many converts from Romanism. Indeed, several hundred have been converted from that dreadful apostacy to the truth as it is in Jesus. The field is an extensive one. There are in that country about four hundred thousand Romanists. The Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society have proposed to survey that field, with the view of establishing a mission there. As a denomination we are abundantly able to establish another foreign mission, as well as reinforce the one in China. This would be working in the home field as well as in the foreign. It is hoped that the contributions of the churches this winter will warrant the Board in carrying out their wishes in respect to the Canada Mission the coming Spring. Brethren, it is time that we lengthen the cords and strengthen the stakes. The field is the world. The harvest truly is plenteous, and the laborers are few. How necessary to pray, to give, and to take hold of this glorious work in earnest. In the language of Carey, "Let us attempt great things for God, and expect great things from God."

POETRY OF A MILLIONAIRE.

The last item in the will of John McDonough, lately deceased in Louisiana, is as follows:—

"And (I was near forgetting that) I have still one small request to make, one little favor still to ask, and it shall be the last. It is, that it may be permitted, annually, to the children of the free schools, situate nearest to the place of my interment, to plant and water a few flowers around my grave. This little act will have a double tendency; it will open their young and susceptible hearts to gratitude and love to their divine Creator, for having raised up, as the humble instrument of his bounty to them, a poor, frail worm of earth like me, and teach them, at the same time, what they are, whence they came, and whither they must return."

The man who wrote the above, says the Boston Journal, has been accused of being hard of heart, and wanting in kindly sympathies for his fellow-beings. Can this charge be credited? There is much in the character of Mr. McDonough which the world cannot fathom. His munificent posthumous charities, so carefully and wisely bestowed, taken in connection with the undoubted fact, that for many long years the accumulation of his great wealth, for these very ends, was the object of his unceasing toil, all seem to contradict the charge which we have noticed.

Methodist Publications.—One of our exchanges says that the Methodist Episcopal Church now issues about 175,000 copies of periodicals in a year; half of this number is made up of large weekly journals, and the other half of semi-monthly, monthly, and quarterly papers. Though they sell less books than formerly, the amount of reading sent out by that church, never was so great as at the present time.

A Fugitive Case in New York.—On Second-day of last week, a man who was waiting on dinner at the Pacific Hotel, was violently seized and dragged out of the room, and carried before Commissioner Charles M. Hall, and an immediate disposal demanded by one Parker, who professed to be an agent for some body in Virginia. The Commissioner, however, postponed the examination till the following day. That gave an opportunity to put the case into the hands of lawyers, who are still contending over it.

The Sabbath-School Paper.—We send out, this week, the first number of "The Sabbath-School Visitor," a monthly paper devoted to the interests of Sabbath-Schools and Bible-Classes. It is neatly printed, and comes at twenty-five cents a year for a single copy—five copies to one address for one dollar, twelve copies for two dollars, twenty copies for three dollars, twenty-eight copies for four dollars, and forty copies for five dollars—payable invariably in advance. Two copies are printed on one sheet, and cost but one postage. Our friends are requested to examine the paper, copies of which are sent to individuals in each church of the denomination, and, if they approve the object and this way of promoting it, to make such exertion in its behalf as their time and circumstances will allow.

Free Methodists.—A meeting, calling itself the First Annual Conference of the Free Methodist Protestant Church, was held in the town of Trenton, Dodge County, Wisconsin, on the 7th day of November, 1850. After attending to the regular business of the Conference, the following resolutions, among others, were adopted:—

Resolved, That we, as members of the First Annual Conference of the Free Methodist Protestant Church in Wisconsin, do absolve ourselves from all connection with all those professing to be Christians who hold in oppression their fellow-men, believing it to be a great moral evil, a sin against God, and a great hindrance to the upbuilding of the cause of Christ and the extension of religious liberty; and we also declare ourselves to be a Free Methodist Protestant Church.

Resolved, That we, as a Free Methodist Protestant Church, disapprove and protest against the Fugitive Slave Law, and recommend its repeal, and avow ourselves not bound by any principle of right to carry out its provisions.

Resolved, That intemperance is a growing evil in our land, and no brother shall make, buy, or sell, or use as a beverage, or in any way, except for medical or mechanical purposes, any spirituous or malt liquors.

The Danger of Disunion.—On the evening of Dec. 23d, the New England Society in New York held their anniversary festival at the Astor House. Among the speakers on the occasion was Hon. Daniel Webster, who closed a lengthy speech by the following allusion to the recent secession movements:—

"Gentlemen, the day-spring from on high has visited us. There is no longer any danger of disunion in these United States. The time for that has gone by, not to return. And those who supposed they could sever us, whether by talk of secession or by metaphysics, will find themselves mistaken. Let the mind of the sober American people remain sober. The surest course to satisfy those who meditate disunion is just to leave them to themselves, and see what they can make of it. North and South there has been some veneration of sentiment. We see and feel that we should gain nothing by being separated. For, what should we be then? We should be New-York men, Ohio men, Rhode Island men. But we know that it is infinitely better that we should remain hand-in-hand Americans, united now, and united for ever? In my judgment, all opposition is dissipated, and we shall henceforth march forward, together with one heart, under the banner of one country!"

Confiscated Bibles.—A correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune, writing from Havana, under date of Dec. 17, says that a few days previously a package of Bibles, brought there with the baggage of Rev. Mr. Parsons, and intended for use under the "Bethel Flag," among the American shipping, was seized as contraband goods by the Custom-House officials, and they will probably be put to "the stake," as Mr. P. will decline paying duties and a fine for the permission proffered to permit him to return them to the United States. Mr. Parsons has intended no fraud upon the revenue or the religious prejudices of the people, but under the auspices of the "Seamen's Friend Society," in the cause of an enlightened benevolence, with the main implement of his professsion in various languages, to meet the comprehension of his audience—believing the basis important to aid in the faithful performance of his obligations to those who are humble employees, under the flag of the Union. He has, however, been forbid the distribution of Bibles in the English language, on board of American or other vessels in the harbor, and cautioned from high authority that the command must be respected.

Baptists of Tennessee.—The General Association, at its late meeting, voted to support two missionaries in China, and recommended to the Southern Baptist Biennial Convention, the organization of a Southern Home and Foreign Bible Society, at its next session. Perhaps they will next want a "Southern" Bible and a "Southern" Christianity, with a full suite of historical records, all in favor of slavery. So says the Independent.

Wm. L. Chaplin has been released from the jail of Montgomery County, Maryland, on bail of $19,000 for his appearance at the Howard District Court to stand trial on the charge of attempting to kill the slave-catchers and officers by whom he was arrested. He had previously given bail in the sum of $6,000 to appear for trial in the District of Columbia, on charge of aiding in the escape of slaves.

A dispatch dated Peterboro, Madison Co., N. Y. Dec. 24, says:—Wm. L. Chaplin, who was recently held to bail in Maryland, for running off negroes, is stopping with his friend Gerrit Smith, for a few days, before his tour through the State.

Near Mystic Bridge, Ct., on the 20th of Dec., a dwelling house was burned, and on the following morning a barn with its contents. A man and boy were arrested, who acknowledge they set fire to the buildings. Both were bound over for trial.

General Intelligence.

Proceedings in Congress Last Week.

SECOND-DAY, Dec. 23.

In the SENATE, Mr. Clay presented a memorial in favor of a modification of the present Tariff, and gave his views on the subject, favoring the prayer of the petitioners.

Mr. Benton introduced the bill to relinquish the collection of tolls on the U. S. stock on the Louisville and Portland Canal, and to provide for the free navigation of the same. He explained the bill at great length, and it was then referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Notices were given of several bills, and several unimportant resolutions of inquiry were offered and agreed to.

Mr. Gwin introduced a substitute for Col. Fremont's bill for the settlement of land titles and claims in California, which was agreed to. The substitute, in substance, is as follows :—

SEC. 1 Provides for the appointment of three Commissioners, to be appointed by the President and Senate.

SEC. 2. That all persons claiming land in California, by virtue of any Mexican or Spanish grants previous to July 7, 1846, shall present the same and they decide whether it be valid or invalid. The District Attorney to represent the United States, a Deputy Marshall to be appointed for the Board when it is in session.

SEC. 3. The Commissioners, in deciding, shall be governed by the treaty of Hidalgo, the laws of nations, the usages and customs of the Government from which the claim is derived, the decisions of the Supreme Court and laws of prescription.

SEC. 4. Testimony to be in writing and to be preserved.

SEC. 5. Commissioners to be allowed $6,000 each, and 20 cents a mile.

SEC. 6. A Secretary to be appointed; salary $3,000.

SEC. 7. Provides for appeals to the Supreme Court.

SEC. 8, 9, and 10, prescribes the duties of the Surveyer after the final decision by the Board.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Mr. Haymond introduced a bill, giving lands to Virginia to aid in the construction of certain railroads therein. The bill prescribing the mode of taking testimony in regard to contested elections, was passed, and the Senate adjourned over till the day after Christmas.

FIFTH-DAY, Dec. 26.

In the SENATE, a bill was introduced, providing for a survey of the Ohio River, with a view to improve its navigation. A bill to change the time for holding the District Court in Alabama, was read a third time and passed. The bill to settle private land claims in California was taken up, but the attendance being small, the subject was postponed, and the Senate adjourned over to Second-day.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES bills were introduced granting certain public lands to the State of Pennsylvania, to aid in the construction of certain Railroads therein, making grants of land to the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad, and to reörganize and improve the efficiency of the State Department. Some time was spent in debating a bill, subsequently passed, authorizing the suit of the heirs of Gen. Kosciusko, now pending in the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, to be removed to the U. S. Court for the District of Maryland. Adjourned till Second-day.

Burning of a Steamboat.

The New Orleans Picayune, of Dec. 18, gives the particulars of the burning of the steamboat South America, fifteen miles above Bayou Sara, on the 16th.

The boat was from Cincinnati, commanded by Capt. Logan. She started with a large number of passengers and a heavy cargo. Many of the passengers and much of the freight were put out on the way down. The boat left Natchez at 5 o'clock on Monday morning, and arrived at Morgan's Bend, having on board 400 tons of freight and thirty cabin passengers, of whom four were ladies, all destined to this city. When at the head of the Bend, and near the left bank of the river, the boat took fire in the boiler deck, directly over the middle boiler. The order was immediately given to run the boat ashore to the left bank which was done. In about two minutes the boat touched the bank and was made fast. The engines were continued working to keep the boat steady in her position.

At the first alarm the passengers rushed forward, a few of them having time to secure their trunks. The first clerk, Mr. Hayman, entered the office and secured half the money, but left the rest, and books and papers, to run aft and bring the ladies forward. He succeeded in doing so, the flames spreading so rapidly that one moment more and the ladies would have been lost. All the gentlemen passengers got ashore safe, after assisting in every way possible to extinguish the flames. That, however, was impossible; in five minutes after she took fire, the boat was in flames from stem to stern, and from the main to the hurricane deck. The rapidity with which the flames spread may be imagined from the fact that by the time that Mr. Hayman had run to the ladies' cabin and hurried its inmates forward and out of the social hall to the steps, the fire was within two feet of him. He, however, escaped uninjured.

The loss of life amounts to twenty-seven persons. Mrs. White, the wife of the carpenter of the boat, was not able to get forward from the ladies' cabin as its other inmates did. Her husband seeing no escape from the flames, then fast approaching him, threw her into the river and jumped in after her. He was unable to save her from drowning. She was the only cabin passenger lost.

The chief cook, Jackson Noles, a white man, and three firemen, were last seen on on the main deck, just aft of the boilers, with their clothes on fire.

The porter of the boat, a white man, named Wm. Sheppard, from Evansville, Ia., was last seen at the wash house in front of the wheelhouse. He was either drowned or burned.

A young man, name unknown, part owner of a large lot of poultry on board, was last seen in the water, holding on to the wheel-house. He became exhausted, however, let go his hold, and sank to rise no more. He was from Elizabethtown, Illinois.

There were 100 soldiers on board, recruits for the Third Regiment of Infantry, on their way to join their various companies in Texas and New Mexico. All had to jump overboard to save their lives, and swim ashore. Seventeen were drowned. One soldier's wife jumped overboard and was drowned. Another threw her little child over first and sprang after it. Both were drowned.

Disaster to the Steamship Ohio.

Much anxiety was felt in New York, last week, on account of the non-arrival of the steamship Ohio, with the California mails, and a large number of passengers. The following telegraphic dispatch to the N. Y. Tribune, from Norfolk, Va., Dec. 27, explained the matter :—

The Ohio put in here yesterday, Thursday afternoon. She has 400 passengers—250 from California. She started from Havana first on the 18th. Her first evolution blew out the head of a cylinder, and uncoupled the engines. She started again on the 19th, with one engine, and made good headway until the 22d, when she was struck by a heavy gale, the boat was heavily strained and damaged, and laid to until Monday evening. She then got under way again, and sprung a leak at 2 o'clock on Tuesday morning. The crew were unable to keep the water down, and the fires were extinguished. Ten feet of water was then in the hold, and all the pumps were put in requisition, and bailing was resorted to, which was continued until Wednesday at noon, without cessation, when the water was low enough to build fires. Steam was then put on, and constant bailing was requisite to keep the fires from being extinguished until they reached the wharf at Norfolk. Her furniture is all broken, with three of the iron braces, and the damage is not less than $30,000.

A dispatch to the Philadelphia Bulletin gives the following account of the disaster :

On the passage from New Orleans to Havana, the Ohio broke one of her engines. Not being able to make the necessary repairs at Havana, she sailed thence with the other engine. She encountered the terrible gale of Sunday at its hight, and on Sunday night, when 40 miles south of Cape Hatteras, her other and last engine became disabled, and she was left at the mercy of the storm. She thus lay in the trough of the sea from Sunday night until Wednesday, and during this time the terrible weather she encountered caused her to leak, and there were great apprehensions that she would sink. All hands, both passengers and crew, were compelled to work at the pumps. At length, the wind subsiding, they were enabled to get the ship under way with sails, and after several days of agonizing anxiety on the part of the passengers, she reached Norfolk. The scene is described as frightful in the extreme. There was no one injured during the gale except one man, who had his arm broken. Hon. Reverdy Johnson, who came passenger in the Ohio, labored, with the rest, at the pumps. Toward the last, Captain Schenck told him privately, that if the storm did not subside the ship must sink in two hours.

The Overland Emigration.

A letter dated "Emigrant Road, west termination of the Desert, Sept. 28th," says: I have just returned to this post from a ten days' journey up Humboldt river, during which time I have witnessed almost every degree of human suffering, from half starved women and children, toiling along on foot thro' the deep sands to the poor sick man dying in the scorching sun, by the road side, without an acquaintance or friend to give him a cup of water. I have heard of other cases where men were found wrapped in blankets or wagon sheets, where they had given up, lain down and died, far from wife, mother or friends at home, fortunate, perhaps, that their fate may never be known. I have divided my own scanty allowance of provisions, for my backward journey, with some who were so weak that they would reel as they walked, who would weep like children, and thank me with as much heartfelt gratitude as the criminal who had been reprieved from an ignominious death. These are the things to try men's souls. A large portion of the emigration have gone to Oregon, and many have stopped at Salt Lake. There are yet on the road to California between one and two thousand persons, among them probably one hundred families, who are scattered along a distance between three and five hundred miles from the settlements, without teams, provisions, and many without clothing. Three days ago the snow fell four inches deep on the mountains. Should the wet season set in by the 15th October, the snow may fall five feet deep in the course of a day and night, in which case I fear many must perish, as there is not a sufficiency of provisions, on this side of the mountains to sustain five hundred people for twenty days.

Seven Days Later from Europe.

The steamer Baltic, with seven days later news from Europe, put into Provincetown, last Sabbath, being short of coal, whence the news was sent overland to New York.

The news from England is not important. There has been a slight improvement in cotton. The Queen has spoken out on the papal question, to the entire satisfaction of all good Protestants.

On the Continent, things remain quiet, and markets of all kinds have improved since the subsidence of political apprehension.

DESPERATE RENCOUNTER.—The Planters' Advocate, published at Macon, Noxubee county, Miss., says that Mr. Jonathan Henkle and Mr. Adams, of that county were reclining upon the side of a hill, basking in the genial rays of the sun, when suddenly a large Eagle made a swoop and fastened its talons in the breast of Mr. Henkle. A fight immediately ensued between the two young men and the eagle, and after a considerable scuffle, they succeeded in capturing it alive and carried it home. No damage was done, except that Mr. H. received a slight wound in the breast.

A FATAL FIGHT.—The San Antonio Western Texan contains information of an affray between Parker H. French, the famous forging draft-drawer on Howland & Aspinwall, and a portion of those composing his party, at Carlites, a small mining town in Mexico, about 200 miles from El Paso. At that point some of French's party determined on separating from him, and proceeded to take possession of some of the mules claimed by French, the opposite party supposing their right to be as good or better than French's, and they being, for aught we know to the contrary, correct in their views. French refused to yield up the animals; the others seized them, when French and some of his friends fired upon them. A grand row then ensued, in which French's right arm was completely shattered, and one of his adherents, a Mr. Harris, who formerly carried expresses from San Antonio to El Paso, was killed. Mr. Shepherdson, formerly a schoolteacher in San Antonio, was killed on the side of the party opposed to French. Several were wounded on both sides, whose names were not learned. On the termination of the row, French remained in possession of the spoils.

SEVERE WEATHER IN VERMONT.—The Lowell Courier of Friday, Dec. 27, says: We learn from a traveler who came from Burlington and reached Groton Junction last evening, that the train of cars in which he left Burlington, Monday morning, did not reach Rutland, 67 miles, until 12 o'clock Wednesday night. They were three days and a half on the road. The engine on Monday night froze up, having exhausted its wood and water, near the Middlebury station. While unscrewing the hose between the tender and engine, to prevent its bursting from frost, the driver was noticed to lean back, as if to rest, which rest was the lethargy of death, for it was ascertained that he was freezing. He was with great exertion carried to the nearest house, put into cold water and thawed out. During the night the ladies stayed in the cars without a fire, wrapped up in mats and such apparelling as could be found. The storm on the west side of the Green Mountains is represented as being tremendous, as well in the effects of the wind as the perfect avalanche of snow which fell and the chilling frost that followed.

THE NORTH-WESTERN INDIANS.—Hon. Rich'd. Wm. Thompson has been associated with Gov. Ramsey, of Minnesota, to negotiate for a sale of the Sioux lands west of the Mississippi. Dr. Foster has been appointed Secretary of the Commission. After effecting a treaty with the Sioux, the commission will proceed with an escort, overland, about one thousand miles across the plains, northwest to the Selkirk settlement, at Pembina, on the Red River of the North. They are, besides, to negotiate with the Chippewa half-breeds for the extinguishment of their title of occupancy and the acquisition of fee-simple titles to their lands.

When this is accomplished, it is expected that the most valuable part of the Chippewa half-breeds will abandon the Hudson Bay possessions entirely, and remove entirely within the boundary of Minnesota. They number about ten thousand souls, and as they are a hardy, brave people, and dreaded by the North-Western Indians, they will make an efficient frontier guard in a war with the British or hostile Indian tribes. [Wash. Republic.

LAND WARRANTS vs. LAND SALES.—During the whole term set apart for the land sales at Fairfield, last month, says the Burlington (Iowa) Hawkeye, not a single bidder appeared. All the entries are now made with Land Warrants. Some of the speculators find no difficulty in getting rid of their warrants. They do it in this way: They enter a quarter section for a farmer with one of their warrants, and then give him a bond for a deed, the deed to be executed in one year from date, on the payment of two hundred dollars on each. The farmer feels satisfied, because he gets a year's credit, and pays no more for his land at the end of that time than the Government asks for it. The speculator is satisfied, because he makes sixty or seventy per cent. by the transaction. Nobody seems dissatisfied but the Land Officers, who have to do ten times more work, and receive less than a tittle of the pay that was formerly received before Land Warrants became a legal tender in the purchase of land.

STOPPAGE OF COTTON FACTORIES.—The Boston Transcript of Friday contains a statement of the number of spindles in five of the New England States which have ceased operations during the last three months in consequence of the depression of this class of Manufactures. The aggregates are as follows :—

States.	Whole No. Spindles.	Now stopped.
Maine	142,700	112,500
New Hampshire	373,000	135,000
Massachusetts	1,220,000	202,000
Rhode Island	500,000	212,800
Connecticut	250,000	50,000
Total	2,485,700	715,300

Beside those enumerated, many mills are working on short time. At Fall River, 110,000 spindles have stopped in consequence of a strike among a portion of the operatives. Adding to the number previously stopped and those running short time, and there are not far from One Million less spindles now in operation than a year since. [Tribune.

BREACH OF PROMISE CASE.—A novel breach of promise case, says the Boston Mail, was tried in the Supreme Court at Cambridge on Thursday, before Judge Fletcher, in which Hannah Hathen, a widow lady, 40 years of age, in the millinery business at Lowell, sought to recover damages of a Mr. John Hopkins, a clerk in Faneuil Hall market, of about the same age as the lady, for a breach of promise of marriage. Physical infirmity on the part of the lady was set up in defense. The Jury returned a verdict of $1,000 damages for the plaintiff.

John P. Wellington, a clerk in the Post Office at Bangor, Maine, as we learn from the Whig and Courier, has been detected in breaking open letters and stealing money therefrom. He is a young man, about 19 years of age, and had always been attentive to his duties in the office and borne a good character for integrity. About $1,200 which he is supposed to have stolen was found in his trunk.

WILD CAT AND THE ARKANSAS SLAVES.—This Seminole Chief having failed to persuade his own people to emigrate with him to the Rio Grande, induced a large party of slaves to run away, with a view of seeking freedom under his protection. The Creeks and Seminoles followed the band, fought them, with a loss of one killed on each side, took their women and children, to the number of sixty, and carried them back. Their masters came forwaad and reclaimed their property, by paying the rewards offered, and disposed of such as were considered unprofitable stock to them. After this piece of ill luck, Wild Cat went back to the Rio Grande again. [Tribune.

CONFESSION OF ROBBERY AND MURDER.—The Hagerstown News has received a pamphlet, purporting to be the confession of one Charles Wallace, which gives an account of the robbery of Mr. Joseph Funk, at Hagerstown, several years ago, committed by himself and accomplice, named Snelling. This confession was written by Wallace, as he says, from memory, and given by him to Rev. Henry Tracey, at the stake where he was burned alive by a mob on the banks of the Mississippi, on the 11th of August, 1850. He confessed to the murder of Miss Mary Rogers, the beautiful cigar girl of New York, and a number of robberies and other crimes.

RUNNING AWAY WITH A STEAMBOAT.—The Indiana, a large New Orleans boat, was taken away from Cincinnati to Madison, by order of Mr. White, one of her owners, on Sunday night week. Mr. White, who is a wealthy pork dealer, at Madison, had a very heavy interest in the boat, and the other owners refusing to pay their shares or come to terms, he paid one of the Madison packets to slip up to her wharf during the night, cut her cables, and tow her to Madison. He then paid her bills at Cincinnati, and kept the boat.

SUMMARY.

The Attorney General of New York has discontinued the suits he brought against Hon. Geo. Clark, to test his title to the lands in the Oriskany patent. The witnesses have all been summoned several times, at a heavy expense to the State, but the Attorney came to the conclusion that the title of Mr. Clark was good. The lands are now for sale, and the present tenants will doubtless become purchasers, as many have already.

The schr. Argus, Capt. Crockett, of Frankfort, Me., bound for Philadelphia, went ashore on Plum Island, on the night of the 23d ult. All lost but one, (the Captain,) who saved himself by swimming ashore and crawling to a barn, where he remained until morning. One poor fellow sufferer was washed ashore, and dragged himself to a sand bank and perished, being unable to proceed farther.

The Catholic Hierarchy in England and Scotland numbers 680 chapels, besides other stations where service is performed, 898 priests, 11 colleges, 134 convents. Fifty-one of the priests employed in England are Doctors of Divinity, and seventeen English priests are residents in various seminaries abroad. This is a much larger force than was supposed. In England and Wales the chapels are 587, Scotland 93.

The Jonesville (Mich.) Telegraph says that the "rapping spirits" have made their appearance at Litchfield in Hillsdale County, and are creating quite a disturbance among the usually peaceable inhabitants of that town. The scene of operations is the residence of Deacon Stevens, and the Deacon and family have left the Congregational Church because the spirits have declared it not orthodox.

A dispatch dated Albany, Dec. 23d, says that Judge Wright has delivered his opinion in the suit brought by the late Attorney-General against Livingston, to test the validity of the title to the Livingston Manor, and which was tried in Columbia County last spring, by giving judgment in favor of the defendant.

Some of the New York ship-builders say that black-walnut is a better timber for ship-building than the live oak, and that its high price is the only reason why it is not largely used. An Ohio paper says that there is enough of this valuable timber split into fence rails every year in Ohio to build the entire national marine of the Union.

A forgery was detected on the Phœnix Bank of this city, says the Hartford (Ct.) Times, a few days since. The paper amounted to over $10,000. It was indorsed in good faith by Mr. Arnold of Middletown, who must be the sufferer. He probably purchased the paper, which had proved bad. The notes originated in New York, we believe.

"An Appeal to the Medical Society of Rhode Island in behalf of Woman to be restored to her natural right of Midwife, and elevated by education to be the Physician of her own sex," is a very small, but very forcible and truthful pamphlet, just published at Newport, R. I.

Jack Wade, Charles Southwick, and Brooks are kept in jail in Massachusetts in default of $30,000 bonds each, to answer for the robbery of the Dorchester and Milton Bank. The first-named pleads guilty. About $11,000 of the stolen money has been recovered, and $15,000 in the unsigned bills taken have also been found.

On the 24th of December an accident occurred on the Charlotte, N. C. railroad, by which a train with twenty passengers was precipitated some thirty feet. Three lives were lost, and all the passengers were more or less injured.

A Philadelphia letter of last Sunday, says: William McGinley was yesterday arrested, charged with conspiracy and committing an assault and battery upon the colored man, Adam Gibson, arrested as a fugitive slave. McGinley was held to bail for a further hearing. George T. Price has also been arrested and held to bail on the same charge.

George Hayward, the depot master at Lincoln, Mass., caught a robber breaking into the depot, and laid hold of him; the robber, however, got away, and as Mr. Hayward was pursuing him he turned and shot him in the groin and made his escape. Mr. H. died. The name of the robber is Justin Carey.

The Sheriffs, Clerks, Treasurers, Auditors, &c., of counties in Michigan, whose terms expired on the 31st Dec., have found a provision in the new Constitution of that State, which, they claim, authorizes them to hold their places for two or three years longer.

The telegraph advises us, says the N. Y. Tribune, that two of our most eminent "lights of other days" in New Hampshire, are at last numbered with the dead. Ex-Gov. William Plumer died at his home in Epping, Rockingham Co., Dec. 23, at the advanced age of 93, and Ex-Gov. Samuel Bell, died at his home in Chester, (same county) on the same day. His age could not have been less than 80.

The Easton (Pa.) Whig states that corn is in great demand at fair prices, owing to the large consumption of that grain by the distilleries, there being 25 within the circuit of 16 miles of that place. The annual consumption of corn and rye for that purpose is estimated at 1,400,000 bushels.

The St. Petersburg contributions in Malachite to the Great London Fair are truly magnificent. They consist of a large pair of folding doors, a mantlepiece, three tables, twelve chairs, three arm chairs, and two large urns. Their furniture is of peach colored velvet.

Rev. T. N. Mullen, a Catholic Clergyman, recently purchased some 25,000 acres in Iowa, where he intends to bring a large number of his countrymen to settle, as soon as preparations can be made in Ireland for their departure to America.

The Burlington (N. J.) Gazette notices a monstrous hog, weighing about 800 pounds, which is to be disposed of in New York on New-Year's day, by being guessed for—that is, whoever guesses nearest his actual weight, having first paid $1, will take him.

His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias has engaged the Star and Garter, at Richmond, for himself and suite of 70 persons, who will come over to the exhibition of 1851. The French President has taken Dotesio's, at Slough. This is merely a beginning.

The Indiana Convention passed a section prohibiting the Legislature from granting divorces. Also prohibiting Lotteries or the sale of Lottery Tickets in the State.

Dates from Texas to the 13th ult., state that the Indians were committing great depredations. A train had been robbed, and seven Americans killed. A great number of emigrants were arriving.

The New London Chronicle states that the whale ships of that city are returning with rich cargoes. All vessels which have made trips to the Northern Seas have been very successful, and have made not only profitable but short voyages.

A schooner supposed from Philadelphia loaded with coal, was driven on shore on No Man's Land, near Holmes Hole, on Monday of last week, and broke to pieces, all her crew being drowned. Five bodies have been washed on shore.

We learn from the Belvidere Intelligencer that, during the year ending June 1, there were raised in Warren county, N. J., 198,410 bushels wheat, 223,780 bushels rye, 586,400 bushels corn, and 242,000 bushels oats.

According to the Farmer's Almanac for 1851, there are fifty-three newspapers and periodicals in Tennessee, of which 24 are Whig, 13 Democratic, 9 Religious, 3 Neutral, 1 Agricultural, 1 Educational, and 2 Temperance.

Railroads are running steamboats off the track in many cases, and so diminish their value. The Hartford Times says that the splendid steamer Connecticut, only two or three years old, which cost $160,000, has been sold for $80,000.

Gen. Scott, in his report on the army, recommends the enrollment of two additional regiments of dragoons or mounted riflemen, and also the increase of the infantry, as indispensible for the protection of our frontiers.

A new paper styled the Dakota Friend has been established by the missionaries in Minnesota, as a means of civilizing the Dakota Indians, in whose dialect it is printed.

Specimens of African manufacture have been already sent from the king of Dahomey for exhibition at the World's fair.

A certain Miss Harnell of Philadelphia, is said to have been a prominent person in a nest of gamblers captured lately by the Police of Paris.

Henry Bibb, the fugitive slave, is going to start a newspaper at Sandwich, Canada West, to be called the "Voice of the Fugitives."

The Illustrated Domestic Bible.

NOW PUBLISHING IN NUMBERS, on the 1st and 15th of each month. In addition to the authorized version, this edition contains Seven Hundred Engravings, Three Steel Maps, very full References, Poetical Portions in Metrical Form, Reflections, Notes, Questions on each Chapter, Dates for every day in the year, Family Record, Chronological Order, &c., &c.

The whole Bible will be completed in 25 Numbers of 56 pages each, making when finished a volume of 1,400 pages, small quarto, of very convenient size for family or private reading. It is peculiarly valuable for Sunday School Teachers. Every Sabbath School should have a copy of it, and it should be in every family where there are children. The Engravings are not introduced for show, but are real illustrations, and serve to explain the text. This feature will render it very attractive for the young, and will serve more than any other means to fix the Sacred Word permanently in the memory.

The N. Y. Recorder says: "It strikes us as better fitted to its sphere than any other similar work. We have great pleasure in commending it to our readers."

The Christian Observer (Phila.) says: "We cheerfully commend it as one of the most complete and convenient, as well as one of the cheapest Family Bibles that has appeared."

SEARS' PICTORIAL FAMILY PUBLICATIONS

Are decidedly the best books that Agents can possibly employ their time in supplying to the people of the United States. They are valuable for reference, and should be possessed by every family in this great Republic. There is not a city or town in these United States, even those of small importance, but contains many citizens to whom these works are indispensable. They are adapted to the literary wants of the Christian, the Patriot, the Statesman, and the Domestic Circle—got up in a superior style of art and workmanship; and are not only such books as will sell, but such as an Agent of good principles will feel free to recommend, and willing to see the purchaser again, after they have been bought.

OUR PLAN.

The plan the Publisher has so successfully carried out for several years, is obtaining responsible men as Agents, who are well known in their own Counties, Towns, and Villages, and have time and disposition to circulate good and instructive books among their neighbors and friends. Any person wishing to embark in the enterprise will risk little by sending to the Publisher $25 or $50, for which he will receive an assortment as he may direct, at the wholesale cash prices.

☞ Enterprising and active men of respectability and good address, would do well to engage in the sale of the above volumes; and all Postmasters, Clergymen, Book Peddlars, and Newspaper Agents, are respectfully requested to act as our Agents. A handsome remuneration allowed to all who engage in their sale. For particulars, address, post-paid,

ROBERT SEARS,
128 Nassau-st., N. Y.

To Publishers of Newspapers throughout the U. S.:

* * Newspapers copying this advertisement entire, well displayed, as above, without any alteration or abridgement, (including this notice,) and giving it one or more insertions, shall receive a copy of any one of our $2 50 or $3 works, (subject to their order,) by sending direct to the Publisher.

☞ No letter will be taken from the office unless post-paid.

Miscellaneous.

Explosion of the Anglo-Norman.

We have already announced the explosion of this boat at New Orleans on the 13th ult. Mr. Lumsden, one of the editors of the N. O. Picayune, was on board at the time of the explosion, and publishes an interesting account of the disaster, from which we make the following extracts :—

At about 1 o'clock P. M., a portion of the guests, among whom were five ladies and a little girl, sat down to a sumptuous collation in the cabin. Fortunately the number of ladies and children on board was so small. Everything passed off merrily. A second table was arranged for those who had not been able to obtain a place at the first, and, as the company became more and more socially disposed, a number of those who had already lunched crowded into the cabin to partake of the general enjoyment. This saved a great many from the effects of the explosion.

At $2\frac{1}{2}$ o'clock, while this festivity was at its hight, and the boat was coming down stream under full headway, at the rate of ten or twelve miles an hour, when opposite the lower line of Carrollton, the explosion took place. We were standing at the moment on the boiler deck, near the front door of the cabin. We noticed a shower of water falling on the deck around the small escape pipe, which in low-pressure boats runs up by the smoke-pipe. In a second or two a sharp, crashing noise followed, and the whole deck forward, within a few feet of us, rose in the air.

A thick, blinding, impenetrable cloud of hot smoke and cinders enveloped the whole scene in an instant, and for a short space of time the darkness around was like night. We will not speak of our own feelings at the moment. The smoke cleared away, and the awful character of the terrible accident was revealed. The cries and groans of the wounded, the screams of affrighted women, the confused mass of ruins in the front of the boat, the surface of the river covered with jagged timber and human beings struggling for life, and the next instant the alarming cry of "fire" in the hold, presented a swift succession of incidents sufficient to appal the stoutest heart. For a moment or two it was not known whether the boat would float or be saved from fire. The flames were quickly extinguished, however, by the crew; it was ascertained that the hull was uninjured, and then all on board went coolly and quickly to work to rescue such of the sufferers as were entangled in the fallen and broken beams and planks, to soothe the agonies of the dying, or to give all possible aid to those who were more or less bruised, scalded or burned. Of the ladies, among whom were Mrs. Junius Beebe, Miss Beebe, a cousin of Mr. Junius Beebe, and a little girl, none were injured.

At the moment of the explosion, the steamboat Naniope, Capt. Costello, a coast packet, was on her way up, and was about 200 yards from the Anglo-Norman, abreast of her. She instantly rounded to, sent her yawls out, and by untiring exertion on the part of her officers and crew, some eighteen or twenty persons, most of them scalded or otherwise injured, who had been blown overboard, were picked up and taken into her cabin. There every attention that the kindest and most generous hearted impulses could dictate were unceasingly afforded to the sufferers.

We state positively, that, to our personal knowledge, not more than 125 invited guests were on board, if indeed as many. Several others were invited, and were heard during the day to express their regret that they had been unable to get to the boat in time before she started, or were prevented by other causes from joining the pleasure party.

The single, monstrous boiler, perhaps the largest ever constructed in this country, the immense smoke-pipe, the two small engines, the "doctor" and the "blower," were blown clear out of the boat, and no traces left of their whereabouts. The entire forward deck, as far aft as the cylinder, was blown to atoms. The vessel forward is a complete wreck. The cabin is a picture of ruin and desolation.

Life on the Turning of a Card.

A friend narrated to us a day or two since an anecdote of early times in West Tennessee, which we will attempt to repeat, even at the risk of losing the graphic simplicity of his conversational narrative.

Some eighteen or twenty years since, a well-known resident of Tipton county was put on his trial, charged with the murder of his wife. As usual in such cases, popular feeling was largely against him, and all the eloquence and ingenuity of his counsel were required to make any impression in his favor upon a jury, which, however impartial it might desire to be in the consciousness of sworn duty, could not but see the waves of popular prejudice surging in upon it.

The case was ably argued. The counsel for the defense made most vigorous and impassioned appeals. The case was submitted to the jury; and they retired, to make up their verdict. Time passed, and as the setting sun warned all of the approaching night, the large throng in attendance, the judge, counsel, etc., retired, all anxious, the accused not the least so, to learn the verdict of the jury, and some wondering that the jury hesitated for one moment to bring in a verdict of guilty. In the mean time the jury had come to a point beyond which they could progress no farther. The appeals of the counsel of the defense had not been without their influence, and the jury stood unchangeably six for conviction and six for acquittal. Something had to be done. In those days twelve good fellows could not be got together for a night, and sleep. Cards appeared mysteriously from the depth of sundry large pockets, and exercises in seven up and poker were commenced.

About midnight one of their number, Col. P., proposed that they should play a game of seven up, the result to decide the verdict. The proposition was heartily and unanimously agreed to, in all seriousness, and the whole crowd collected around Col. P. and his opponent, who proceeded to play the game on which was staked a human life. Col. P. played to save the accused. His opponent played, and quite as zealously, to secure the conviction. The backers, five and five, stood behind them, encouraging the champions, and watching the game, dimly seen by the light of two tallow candles, with the most intense interest.

The game proceeded with very equal fortune, till both parties stood at six and six, It was Col. P.'s deal; he dealt, and TURNED JACK. The prisoner was acquitted, and every man of the jury joined in a shout which startled the whole village, even the revelers in the "grocery." Next morning the jury went into court, and gave, to the astonishment of many, the verdict of "not guilty." The juryman who played an unsuccessful game for human life, still lives, a much respected citizen of this district. One of the counsel is a very distinguished member of the Memphis bar, and the accused has, as we believe, gone to a higher court; but neither of them, nor any of the assemblage, nor the court, who marveled at the verdict eighteen years ago, have ever known that a human life was saved by turning Jack! There are some curious episodes in the history of our early settlements; but who would think of venturing life upon turning Jack. Punishment of Crime among the Chinese.

The laws of the Chinese are embodied in a code entitled the leu-lee, which consists of six great heads, forming an epitome of the whole system of the government. The fifth of these heads comprises all matters relative to crimes and their punishment. Treason, which comprehends, besides rebellion, nine other species of crime, among which are parricide, impiety, and desertion to a foreign power, is invariably punished with death,—in some cases with the most lingering torture. All the male relations of such offenders are beheaded, the females sold into slavery, and their connections put to death; so that it frequently happens, that the inhabitants of whole villages, and even districts, are made to suffer for the offense of one individual. To intrude into the line of the Emperor's traveling retinue, subjects the trespasser to death. If the Emperor's physician is discovered compounding any medicine in a manner not sanctioned by established usage, he is punished with an hundred blows of the bamboo. If any dirt is found in his Majesty's food, the cook receives eighty blows; and if he concocts any new dish or sauce, which proves offensive to the Imperial palate, he receives one hundred blows, besides being forced to swallow the article himself. All cases of deliberate murder are punishable by death. The penalty of death is also awarded against a slave who shall strike his master; a son who shall strike his father or mother; a grandson who shall strike his grandfather or grandmother; a wife who shall strike her husband's father, mother, grandfather or grandmother. But if a father kill a son, grandson, or slave, even designedly, the punishment is no more than sixty blows of the bamboo, and a year's imprisonment. Even this lenient punishment is frequently remitted for a fine, as the law presumes the cause of the act to be disobedience upon the part of the child; and disobedience is considered a crime of the deepest dye, as affecting the principle of the whole system of government. The jealousy of the Chinese law on this important point, is further illustrated by the following decree—"That a child or grandchild, who is guilty of addressing abusive language to his or her father or mother, paternal grandfather or grandmother; a wife, who is guilty of the same to her husband's father or mother, paternal grandfather or grandmother—shall, in every case, suffer death by being strangled!"

Growth of Nails and Hair in Men.

The following interesting observations have been made by Berthold, of Gottingen. He found that nails which were cut off, reformed quicker in children than in adults, and in these than in old people; that they re-formed quicker in summer than in winter (a nail which in summer would be repaired in 116 days, in winter is repaired in 152;) that the nails of the right hand re-formed quicker than those of the left; that the nails of different fingers re-formed in different times; on both hands, the nail of the middle finger was most quickly re-formed; then those of the ring and little finger took a much longer time, and the little finger rather the longest, particularly on the left hand.

As regards the hair, Berthold found, that in persons from 16 to 24 years old, whose hair had been cut off for fevers, &c., the length had reached, in two years, from 12 to 16 inches, giving an average of seven lines per month. By cutting off the hairs of the beard (wetted with rain-water only) with a very sharp knife, every 12, 24, or 36 hours, measuring them with the micrometer, and weighing them, Berthold arrived at the following results :—

1. The growth is increased the oftener the hair is cut; thus, the beard cut every 12 hours, grows at the rate of from $5\frac{1}{2}$ to 12 inches a-year; cut every 24 hours, it grows at the rate of from 5 to $7\frac{1}{2}$ inches per year; cut every 36 hours, it grows at the rate of from 4 to $6\frac{3}{4}$ inches per year. The weights correspond with these measurements; cut every 12 hours, the yearly weight of the experimenter's beard would be 313 grains; cut every 24 hours, it would be only 280 grains.

2. The hair grows more quickly during the day than at night, and this rule seems quite invariable. About $\frac{1}{16}$ more seems to be formed during the day.

3. The growth is quicker in warm weather than in cold, but this rule is less constant on account of the variability of the weather.

How to get to Sleep.—How to get to sleep is, to many persons, a matter of high importance. Nervous persons, who are troubled with wakefulness and excitability, usually have a strong tendency of blood to the brain, with cold extremities. The pressure of blood on the brain keeps it in a stimulated or wakeful state, and the pulsations in the head are often painful. Let such rise and chafe the body and extremities with a rough towel, or rub smartly with the hands, to promote circulation, and withdraw the excessive amount of blood from the brain, and they will fall asleep in a few moments. A cold bath, or sponge bath, and rubbing, or a good run, or a rapid walk in the open air, or going up and down stairs a few times, just before retiring, will aid in equalizing circulation and promoting sleep. These rules are simple, and easy of application in castle or cabin, and may minister to the comfort of thousands who would freely expend money for an anodyne to promote "nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep."

The City of Venice.

A foreign correspondent of the N. Y. Commercial Advertiser, gives the following sketch of this famous city :—

Venice is a labyrinth. There is no city like it in the world. It always was an unintelligible place, and is still unintelligible. It contains a population of 115,000 inhabitants, located in 27,918 houses. There are 112 religious establishments; though at one period there were no less than 228. Of bridges, chiefly of marble, there are 306, and small communicating streets no less than 2,108. The city is seven miles in circumference. The grand canal is nearly 300 feet wide; and other canals are wide enough, but the widest street is not more than 10 or 12 feet from house to house, and the majority do not exceed 8. Horses are unknown, and the largest animal to be seen is a dog.

The foundation of this city commenced in 402, when the Venetians fled to the Lagunes, before the invading army of Alaric, the Goth. The city is built upon 72 small islands, with pile and stone foundations for the buildings. The church of "Santa Maria de la Salute" was constructed in 1531, as a monument of thanksgiving for the cessation of a great pestilence, and rests upon one million two hundred thousand piles. This church contains 125 statues. It is said that in Venice there are thousands who never saw a hill, or a wood, or an ear of corn growing, or a vineyard, or a green field, or even a horse and carriage. The canals are traversed by gondolas, a species of canoe, twenty-five feet long, with a little cabin in the center, sufficiently spacious for the accommodation of from five to ten persons. These gondolas and their furniture and equipage are all black, and when they move upon the water they have the appearance of floating hearses. The black cloth which is thrown over the cabin top is fringed with tassels, and exactly resembles a funeral pall.

Report on the Public Lands.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office, in his annual report, presents a clear view of the whole land system of the United States. The business of surveying has been pressed as rapidly as possible, in order to enable the hardy pioneer settlers to avail themselves of the provisions of the pre-emption law, which are confined to surveyed lands. The combination of the geodetic with the rectangular system of surveying is shown to be highly conducive to the desired accuracy. The quantity of land disposed of in 1845, both by sale and by the location of military bounty warrants and State selections, was 4,933,000 acres, which, at $1 25, amount to $6,428,435. In 1849, the quantity was 5,184,410; and in the first three quarters of 1850, it was 2,815,366 acres.

The whole area of public lands is set down at 424,108,750 acres, of which about one-fourth have been sold, producing to the Treasury $135,330,091. The cost to the government is set at $74,957,879, showing a profit of $60,381,213, equal to about a million and a quarter annually for fifty years. Nearly another quarter has been granted for public objects. The bounty land operations materially diminish the sales, and have led to great frauds.

It is recommended to apply the land system to the Pacific section, and to sell all the mineral lands, lead, iron, coal, copper and gold, to avoid the great evils which seem inseparable from any system of leasing such lands. In regard to the success of mining operations in California, the Commissioner says :—

"I am inclined to think that those engaged in the mining operations there, do not probably realize as much as the same number employed in agriculture or other branches of industry in that or other sections of our Union; and that but comparatively few of the many thus engaged, acquire more than sufficient to pay expenses, or to enable them to return to the old States." Dutch Method of Making Butter.

After having milked their cows, the Dutch leave the milk to get quite cold before they put it in the pans. When placed therein, they do not permit it to stand for the cream to rise more than four hours. Then they stir it together more intimately, to combine the milk and cream, and continue thus to do at least two or three times a day. If it be agitated in this manner, as occasionally happens, till the whole be quite thick, the butter thus obtained is the most highly esteemed. As soon as it acquires the usual consistency, it is churned, commonly about an hour, till the butter begins to form; cold water is then added, proportioned to the quantity of milk, for the purpose of facilitating the separation of the buttermilk. The butter being properly come, it is taken from the churn, and repeatedly washed and kneaded in fresh water, till the buttermilk is all expressed, and it no longer retains any tinge of white. By this simple method, not only far more butter is made from the same quantity of milk than in any other way, but the butter itself is firmer, sweeter, and continues longer fresh, than the generality of butter; while the buttermilk is infinitely more agreeable to the palate. [Blake's Book for Farm.

File Your Newspapers.—A sexagenarian, regretting that he did not begin in early life to file away his newspapers, says :—

"How interesting it would be to an old man to look into the paper which he read when he was twelve or fourteen years old! How many events would this call to mind which he had entirely forgotten! How many interesting associations and feelings would it revive! What a view it would give one of past years! What a knowledge it would preserve by assisting the memory! And how many valuable purposes of a literary kind even might it be rendered subservient to!"

Carrots for Horses.—It is admitted by every one who is at all acquainted with the great nutritive qualities of the carrot, that as a winter food for horses, to use in small quantities daily—say half a peck to each horse—with their dry food, and especially in the absence of green provender—it is of the utmost value. It not only possesses fattening properties equal to oats—taking bushel for bushel—but it secures to the horse in the winter season, fine health, a loose skin, and a glossy coat of hair, which it is impossible to produce except by the use of the carrot.

Bird Song.

SUNG BY MADEMOISELLE JENNY LIND.

"Birdling! why sing in the forest wide?
Say why? Say why?
Call'st thou the Bridegroom or the Bride?
And why? And why?"
"I call no Bridegroom—call no Bride,
Although I sing in forest wide—
Nor know why I am singing."

"Birdling! why is thy heart so blest?
Oh, say? Oh, say?
Music o'erflowing from thy breast?
Oh, say? Oh, say?"
"My heart is full, and yet is light;
My heart is glad in day or night,
Nor know I why I'm singing."

"Birdling? why sing you all the day?
Oh, tell? Oh, tell?
Do any listen to thy lay?
Oh, tell? Oh, tell?"
"I care not what my song may be;
Now this, now that—I warble free,
Nor know, yet must be singing." [Chron.

Mammoth Cave in Indiana.—A great mammoth cave has been discovered seven miles north of Leavenworth, Indiana. A party of men at first discovered a cavern or room large enough for a man to enter, and determined to explore it. The New Albany Ledger says :—

They found that this room opened into others, and these into still others, and that apparently there was no termination to the cave. They followed the main passage some four or five miles, according to their best calculations, when they were admonished by their lights that they must return. On their way back they visited some of the rooms which they had passed, in which were found large beds of epsom salts in nearly a pure state. We are also informed that the cave contains fine specimens of saltpetre, plaster of paris, alabaster, &c., of which the party procured many fine specimens. We can now say to our sister State, Kentucky, that Indiana has a cavern which far surpasses the Great Mammoth, as the last discovery, in connection with the great Indiana cave, will make it one of the largest in the United States.

The London Porter Breweries.—The European Times says, that twice the quantity of porter brewed in London, in a year, would be something like equivalent to the estuary of the Mersey opposite the Pierhead, at spring tide. When one of Meux's vats burst, it swept away a whole street, houses, inhabitants, and all—like an overflow of the Scheldt; and that was in 1814, when vats were mere pipkins to what they are now. At Whitbread's, which ranks but third in the trade, there is one of such prodigious dimensions that its twenty-five hoops weigh from one to three tons each, and its contents are 20,000 barrels, being some twenty times the capacity of the tun of Heidelberg. Barclay's brewery is already half the size of Paxton's Plate Glass Palace, and covers upwards of ten acres; so, if the produce of porter be regulated by superficial extent of premises, and that there is to be double produce next year, the building ought to be fully equal to the Aladdin-like structure in Hyde Park. The firm brew about half a million of barrels a year at present, being at the rate of some ten gallons per head, per month, for every man, woman, and child, in London, saying nothing of what the six other great houses turn out.

Boys who have always had their own Way.—On Saturday last, says the Vermont Chronicle, the sheriff of Washington Co., J. W. Howes, Esq., brought to our State Prison a father and three sons by the name of Shillinglaw, another son being already in the Prison. The three sons were convicted of stealing, and the father of secreting the property. In 1834, the father was sentenced to the State Prison for five years for counterfeiting, or passing counterfeit money—served almost four years, and was pardoned. In 1844, two of the sons were sent to the Prison four years for burglary. One served out his time; the other escaped in 1847, and was retaken in September last—having in the meantime been imprisoned in New York for crime, broke jail, and returned to Vermont. The father is a Scotchman—came to this country when 23 years old—married in Barnet, and has lived in Jay, Wolcott and Worcester. "The oldest sons," he states, "were brought up principally by their grandfather, who suffered them to have too much their own way, and they had led away the younger brothers."

Philosophical Fact.—A surgeon in the U. S. Army recently desired to know the most common cause of enlistments. By permission of the captain of the company, containing fifty-five, in a pledge never to disclose the name of any officer or private except as a physical or metaphysical fact, the true history was obtained of every man. On investigation it appeared that nine-tenths enlisted on account of some female difficulty; thirteen of them had changed their names, and forty-three were either drunk, or partially so, at the time of their enlistment. Most of them were men of fine talents and learning, and about one-third had once been in elevated stations in life. Four had been lawyers, three doctors, and two ministers.

The Rose among Thorns.—A pious man was one day pacing sorrowfully up and down his garden, and doubting the care of Providence. At length he stood before a rose bush, and the spirit of the rose spoke to him thus :—"Do I not animate a beautiful plant; a cup of thanksgiving full of fragrance to the Lord, in the name of all flowers, and an offering of sweetest incense to Him? And where do you find me? Among thorns! But they do not sting me; they protect and give me sap. This, thine enemies do for thee; and should not thy spirit be firmer than that of a frail flower?" Strengthened, the man went thence. His soul became a cup of thanksgiving to his enemies.

An Affecting Scene.—At the last interview between a condemned criminal and his wife, their child—a bonny wee thing, just beginning to prattle—was playing about the cell. Her eye was caught by the glitter of the bolts which confined her father's legs, and she cried out, in blissful ignorance of their use, "Oh, daddy, daddy, what pretty things! You never wore these at home." "Many a sad thing have I seen," said the honest jailor who tells the story, "and many a bitter cry have I heard within those walls, but never one which made me blubber like a child till then. The mother, Sir, and the poor fellow himself—oh, Sir, it was terrible."

Variety.

Senor Montemayer, a Spaniard, who has for many months been preparing a balloon, is confident that he can give it a motive power of its own, so as to ascend and descend, and steer it in any direction at his pleasure. It will not be ready for experiment for a year yet. It is to be in the form of a bird, 150 feet wide between the tips of the wings, and 80 feet long from head to tail, the latter being moveable and acting as a rudder. It will be propelled by a steam engine of 28 horse power, and sustain a weight of 15,000 lbs.

The London Morning Chronicle announces the discovery of a mode whereby flax may be so prepared as to be capable of being spun and woven by ordinary cotton machinery. The steeping process is dispensed with, and thus the fibre of the flax is preserved uninjured; the new agent or process operates by giving flexibility and softness. If the discovery be really at last made, says the Chronotype, and be available at a paying cost, it will commence one of the most important eras in the history of textile manufactures.

In Ceylon there may be heard at night, upon the shores of certain lakes, loud musical sounds, like those of an accordeon or eolian harp, and pitched in different keys, proceeding from the bottom of the water. These sounds, it is said by a late traveler, are emitted by a species of shell-fish, which inhabit these lakes in great numbers. A snail, abundant in Corfu, if irritated by a touch with a piece of straw, will emit a distinctly audible sound in a querulous tone.

The Records of the French Police mention the case of a lady who came unexpectedly into a large fortune, and immediately fell into profound melancholy. She expected to be robbed every moment, and at length locked her doors, and received food through a small window. She soon become afraid of being poisoned, dismissed her cook, and starved herself to death.

A singular instance of resuscitation occurred lately at the British Museum. A certain snail, a native of Egypt, which had been glued down to a card, and confined in a close glass case, actually came to life the other day, and was found by the astonished "custos" promenading about in his narrow domain.

We learn that a new description of food —the Dari—is being introduced into England. It is a grain, or pulse, something between the lentil and Indian corn, and is described as excellently adapted for mixing with the lower descriptions of meal and flour, which it improves both in taste and color. It has already been imported into Ireland.

The herring is a delicate fish. Whenever it is taken out of the water, even though it seems to have received no hurt, it gives a squeak and immediately expires; and though it be thrown instantly back into the water, it never recovers. Hence the proverb, "dead as a herring."

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year of this Seminary, for 1850 and '51, will commence the third Wednesday in August, and continue forty-four weeks, including a short recess between the terms, and one of ten days for the winter holidays.

The year is divided into three terms:—

The first, of 14 weeks, begins Wednesday, August 21st, and ends Wednesday, November 27th.

The second, of 15 weeks, begins Monday, December 2d, and ends Friday, March 14th.

The third, of 14 weeks, begins Tuesday, March 18th and ends Tuesday, June 24th.

Board of Instruction.

GURDON EVANS, A. M., President,
And Professor of Mathematics and Natural Science.
Rev. JOSEPH W. MORTON,
Professor of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, Spanish, and Moral and Intellectual Science.
Mrs. SUSANNA M. SPICER, Preceptress.
ADOLPH ROSENHAYN,
(Late of Friedrick Wilhelm College, Berlin,)
Teacher of German, Piano Forte, and Assistant in Greek and Latin.

Other competent Teachers will be employed as occasion may demand.

TEACHERS' CLASSES will be formed, as usual, at the beginning of the Fall and middle of the Winter Terms, and continue seven weeks.

In the Common Branches, classes will be formed at the commencement of each term; but in the higher, the interest of the student, as well as the welfare of the Institution, demand that a more systematic course of study be pursued.

In the Natural Sciences, Elementary Chemistry and Philosophy will be pursued during the Fall Term Agricultural Chemistry, Astronomy, and Physiology during the Winter Term; Botany and Geology during the Summer Term.

Classes will be formed in Latin, French, and German, at the commencement of the Fall Term; in Hebrew, Greek, and Spanish, at the commencement of the Winter Term, and continue through the course of study.

In Mathematics, Geometry is studied in the Fall, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, and Astronomy, Surveying, Navigation, &c., in the Summer Term.

The course of instruction in Agriculture is thorougly scientific, embracing study and recitation in the best authors. Instruction is given in a well-furnished laboratory, in the analysis of soils, ashes of plants, manures, &c. and the modes of testing for their constituent elements. The attention of farmers who wish to give their sons a practical education is especially called to this department.

Board in private families, from $1 25 to $1 50. Many students board in clubs for 60 to 75 cents.

Tuition—to be settled upon entering school—from $3 00 to $5 00. Extras—For Drawing, $1 00; Oil Painting, $5 00; Chemical Experiments, $1 00; Writing, including stationery, 50 cents; Piano Forte, $8 00; Use of Instrument, $2 00; Agricultural Chemistry, including chemicals, apparatus, and fuel, (breakage extra,) $12 00.

It is very desirable that students should enter at the beginning of the term; yet they are received into classes already formed at any time.

For farther information, address Gurdon Evans, J. W. Morton, or Rev. J. R. Irish, President of the Corporation.

EQUALITY AMONG THE RACES.

It is not my purpose to enter into any further discussion of the merits or demerits of the Fugitive Slave Law—not that the subject is exhausted, or the theme uninviting, but because the continuation of the controversy would probably be profitless, as it might be endless. I willingly waive that subject for the consideration of another, equally interesting, and quite as susceptible of elucidation.

My friend, in an article published in the Sabbath Recorder, asserts in the most positive manner that Euclid, the great mathematician, was a negro. Will he refer me to his authority for that assertion? According to Proclus, Euclid flourished 277 years before Christ; but when he was born, or what was his nation or his country, we have no distinct account. Will he likewise inform me where he learned that Æsop was a negro. According to St. Jerome, Æsop was a Phrygian, the contemporary of Solon, and Crœsus, the last king of Lydia. I should also be happy to learn what distinguished fathers of the church are known to have been negroes. Those portions of Africa where Christianity formerly flourished have never been inhabited by negroes, with the exception of Nubia. But, admitting that Euclid, Æsop, and fifty fathers of the church, were negroes, could not establish the equality of that branch of the Ethopian with the Caucasian race. Despicable indeed must be the mental qualifications of any people that, in so many ages, could not produce a few solitary examples of intellectual greatness.

My friend also claims, and summons the history of mankind to prove, that the Negro is equal in every respect to the Caucasian. To history, then, be the decision referred. The Caucasian race, as its name indicates, originated in the high mountainous region of northern Asia, and thence subdivided into branches, of which the Pelasgic produced the ancient nations of Greece and Rome, with those of modern Europe. The Syrian branch produced the Assyrians, Chaldeans, and, extending into northern Africa, the ancient Theban, Egyptian, Numidian, and Carthagenian empires. From the Scythiac branch sprung the Tartars, Arabs, and Abyssinians; and the Indian branch, reaching southward, produced the civilized nations of India. Where are the pages of history that record a succession of great civilized nations, ancient and modern, that have originated from the negro race? Where are the pages that record their discoveries and conquests, their classic languages, their laws, their inventions, their institutions of literature and art? Tell me not of negroes who, in continual contact with, and probably amalgamated with, the Caucasian, have discovered traces of great mental capability; but point me out a negro nation that for ages has produced a succession of poets, artists, philosophers and statesmen. The question of the equality of the races must be tried by generalities; and point me out one nation of negroes that has progressed like the Caucasian in civilization and art. It was not the operation of slave laws that kept the negro in barbarism when the Caucasian mind was so rapidly expanding with the growth of empire upon the plains of Mesopotamia. It was not the operation of slave laws that kept him in degradation when the Caucasian mind was developing its mighty powers in Italy and Greece. It was not the operation of slave laws that prevented them from making any approximation to civilization during the many ages that elapsed from the time that the Carthagenian voyagers explored their harbors till the first slave ship visited their coasts. In fact, the slave system has been productive to the negro of all the civilization he ever possessed. Brought into immediate contact with and subjected to the authority of Europeans, he has learned to practice their arts and imitate their manners in a limited degree. The Colonization Society, in the emancipated slaves of Liberia, has given to Africa the first civilized negro nation she ever possessed. Yet even here their capability of mental self-support is a problem that remains to be solved, since the presence and influence of Caucasian teachers and ministers of religion is considered necessary. Let these facts be disproved.

Never, within the memory of man, has the negro race been equal with the Caucasian. I summon the record of ages past to witness his inferiority. I call the world to-day to testify the fact. To assert that he is equal, is to dispute the evidence of our own senses. To assert that he is equal, is to contradict facts of every day occurrence. To assert his equality, while admitting his degradation and immorality, looks something like a contradiction. And to assert his equality, while considering his servile condition, and the laws that have thence originated, is a little singular, to say no worse. That mind will find its level as certainly as water, is a proverb that applies with equal force to nations and races as to individuals. If the negro indeed possesses the Caucasian activity of intellect, the same susceptibility of mental improvement, the same capacity for an indefinite progression in civilization and art, it is truly remarkable that three thousand years have not been sufficient to produce their development. It is one of the greatest of wonders, if he has been so long the victim of extraneous agencies. An inhabitant of Africa before a stone was laid in the walls of Rome, or the marble for the first temple of Diana had been hewn from the quarry; an inhabitant of Africa before the voyage of Jason, or the siege of Troy; we hear nothing of his cities, his leaders, or his ships.

It is not remarkable, that those who are so ready to become the champions of a race that has never been capable of vindicating its own honor, either by acts or deeds, should assert its equality with their own; but it is remarkable, that any one possessing an acquaintance with human physiology, should fall into such an egregious mistake as to assert that the only distinction or difference between the races "is cutaneous." Could any thing relating to the skin produce such a great dissimilarity as exists in the bones of the leg, the foot, the face, the cranium, and the spine? In all these parts, the difference between the Caucasian and the negro is manifest to every beholder. It is questionable how far cutaneous causes have operated to produce the woolly hair of the negro, since some branches of the Caucasian family are nearly or quite as dark, though their hair is straight, and their forms and features are the same as ours, with the exception of the eyes, which exhibit something of the Mongolian shape and aspect. Whether or not the color of the skin affects the mental qualifications, is not for me to say. Could we ascertain what causes have operated to produce the one, we might form some conjecture whence the disparity in the other originated. With that part of the question, I have, at present, nothing to do.

In my opinion, to make the races equal, or to cause that the only difference between them should be cutaneous, would be a greater task than the seven labors of the Grecian Hercules, and what the slow unfolding of centurial years would fail to accomplish; for, great as might be the progress of the negroes in that period, were they in immediate contact with and surrounded by the influences of the superior race, the Caucasian mind, still more rapidly expanding, with its characteristic energies, would leave them far behind. It is admitted, that the future is to be judged from the past. How nobly have the modern Caucasian nations sustained the ancient renown of their race for intellectual greatness. In all that relates to intellectuality, they are, as they have ever been, decidedly preeminent. Can this be attributed to local and physical causes. The Abyssinian, for many years a resident of Africa, in immediate proximity with the negro territories, still retains the Caucasian features, complexion, and characteristics; and in arts, and arms, and literature, and agriculture, in short, in all that exhibits intelligence and mental capability, he is immeasurably superior. Let the slave laws be abolished; let the negro be raised to every political privilege; but even then he will not be equal with the Caucasian. There is a disparity which human laws have never caused, and consequently which they can never remedy. The negro, freed, and enfranchised, would still be dependent upon the Caucasian. Mentally and intellectually he would still constitute the inferior race; for Japhet shall be enlarged, and Cainan shall be his servant. The word of prophecy is sure.

TAMAR DAVIS.

SAVED BY A WORD.

In the gracious revival which we attended at Hartsville, last week, there was a most interesting little girl, daughter of John Seay, and granddaughter of S. Debrow, Esq., converted and added to the church, whose salvation may, so far as the instrumental cause is regarded, be attributed mainly to one sentence from the pen of her dying mother. A few minutes before the mother breathed her last, she called for paper, pen and ink; and with her tremulous, dying hand, wrote the following solemn request:—

"My daughter, remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth."

How thoughtful the departing mother! And with what power does she yet speak! Though the daughter was, at the death of her mother, but a few days old, yet these solemn words were carefully preserved; and as soon as the child could appreciate them, were shown her, by her pious grandmother; and as might have been expected, had the desired effect on her tender heart; her eyes ran full of tears, as her young heart ran over with filial emotion. She obeyed the instruction, written by the pale, bloodless hand of her mother; she remembered her Creator in the days of her early youth, (she is, probably, about twelve years old;) and we saw her, with a countenance beaming with light and love, approach the sacred altar, in connection with nearly a score of others, mostly young persons; and, by receiving the ordinance of baptism, dedicate herself to God. Yes, she remembered God—sought early, and found him, even "in the days of her youth."

How emphatically may it be said of this sainted mother, that she, "being dead, yet speaketh." This was all she could do towards "training up her child in the way it should go." But God requires no more of us than we can do; this done—done in good faith—and we may die satisfied that God will be "faithful to his promises."

Oh, what a lesson to mothers! Mothers, whether you live to see your children saved or not, you may be the means of saving them. If they cannot appreciate your faltering words, you may, with your trembling pen, leave to them, in the hands of some faithful friend, a salutary word. Every mother, whether living or dying, should think of her children; and if she can think at all, she will think of them; but every mother may not be able, in the last moments of dissolving nature, to pen her wishes in reference to her child. Then might it not be a happy precaution in a pious mother, to place a copy of the Bible, or of some valuable book, in the hands of each of her children, or some friend as a keepsake, with some such admonition as the one recorded above, to be read when she is gone?

SECRET SOCIETIES IN COLLEGES:

Some Opinions Concerning Them.

[Published by request.]

The object of this article is to give to the community some idea of the real character and moral tendency of Secret Societies in College. The following extract is from a "Narrative of Revivals of Religion in William's College," published in the American Quarterly Register of May, 1841, by Professor Albert Hopkins, whose long experience as a College Officer is known to most who are familiar with the history of Literary Institutions in our country. After speaking of a Revival there in College, and the hindrances it met with from these societes, he adds:—

"I shall now give some account of Secret Societies, in order that their precise position and moral bearing may be understood.

So far as I have been able to obtain information, the origin of these societies among us does not date back beyond the year 1824. At that time, there was in town a Masonic Lodge. The students being as a body older than ~~now~~, were most of them candidates for admission. St. John's day was celebrated about this time, with all the imposing rites and ceremonies which belonged to that order. The Bible was carried in front of the procession, and a clergyman procured to deliver the oration. A degree of sanctity was by these means thrown around the subject, and the institution appeared invested not merely in that charm which belongs to whatever is shrouded in a mystery, but also in a kind of religious sacredness. With the captivating helps, having also the authority of great men to support it, it is not to be wondered that young men were attracted, and that the Lodge should have become popular. At that time, there sprang up as the fruit, perhaps, of the Masonic Spirit which was then rife, a Secret Society in College, several members of which were also members of the Lodge. Whether drinking was at that time one of the secrets of the Lodge, I am not sure; certainly it was one of the little feeders which sprang up in the institution.

The meetings of the Lodge, meanwhile, went on: the ceremonies connected with the initiation, furnishing a constant source of amusement to the initiated, till the revival broke out in 1825. That work seemed to operate as a death blow to the Lodge, being an uncommonly deep and heart-searching work, both in town and College. The young converts, taking the badge of discipleship under one "who ever speaks openly," and declared, "in secret have I said nothing," renounced both the principle and practice of the system, anti-gospel at once in its spirit and tendencies. The conscience of one, at least, could not be satisfied without an open recantation in the public prints. The Lodge was broken up, or meetings since that period, if held, have been kept secret.

Of Secret Associations afterwards, I knew nothing till 1834. At that time I went abroad and spent several months. On my return, almost if not quite the first moment of entering my room, I perceived that a new element had found its way into the atmosphere of the place. I could scarcely compare College to any thing but a bee-hive. Little collections were gathered about; some in College, and some out before the buildings, engaged in earnest disputation, and apparently angry conversation. Among them I was surprised to notice some for whose Christian character I had great charity; and whose uniform sobriety and good temper formerly, led me to suppose that something very uncommon must have occurred. My doubts, but not my anxieties, were soon removed, by information that certain societies termed secret, had been introduced since my absence, and it was ill-feeling arising out of this circumstance, which gave rise to the excitement I had witnessed. I say, not my anxieties, for I readily perceived, that the ground of the excitement was not ephemeral; that the dissocial element, embodied in a regular organization, would be likely to incorporate itself into the very bone of our system; and become, if the fruits then witnessed were any criterion to judge by, a perpetual source of gangrene. Some it appeared had been elected members of these associations, others not. Some Christians had been elected, others not. Distinctions were thus created, which gave rise to jealousies, and hard feelings sprang up both between those who were professedly Christians, and those who were not so. An embodied influence soon collected against the new system, and for aught I know, at the time I speak of, had already concentrated itself in a counter association. These associations were at war with each other in principle, and not less in practice; and what went to enhance the evil, was the fact that animosities sprung up between the secret societies themselves, these societies becoming in a sense rival to each other.

It is not necessary, probably, to proceed further into detail, to show the influence of all this in its moral and religious bearings. Alienation of feeling grew up so bitter, that for a long time before the revival, it is understood that individuals of the same class, and some of them professors of religion, were not on speaking terms with one another. Under such circumstances, there was no room to urge the apostolic exhortation, 'Let brotherly love continue.' Nor was it possible to bring about anything like concentrated religious effort. This will serve, in part, to account for the otherwise inexplicable fact, that amidst all the religious helps here enjoyed, things sunk down into a state so low as that which preceded the revival. Nor will the remark made above now appear strange, that many in the height of the revival, felt that the giant cause of dissension among the brethren must be approached, or all efforts at radical reformation would amount to nothing more than a sickly attempt to cover up a wound, ~~festering and~~ ready to break out afresh after a partial check, perhaps with greater virulence. There is no question, had the work been as vital and thorough as that of 1825, that a system so obviously injurious in its tendencies, would have been at once exploded, as freemasonry was at that time. But alas! all that we could do, and probably all that prudence allowed, was to hush the tendency to restlessness which became manifest when a system seemed likely to be endangered, in which the feelings of individuals had been so deeply enlisted.

As a chronicler of religious events, I am not called upon to speak of the social tendencies of this system, which are sufficiently obvious from the nature of the case. A regard for truth, however, has made it proper and necessary to speak thus far; and this I have been the more willing to do, as the evil complained of exists in sister institutions, from one of which also it was introduced here, and is creeping more or less into them all. Some conscientious and Christian men, not having examined this system and all its bearings, have given their influence to it, and in the review have had occasion to regret this, and have expressed their regrets. It is but right that those who wish to live godly in Christ should be cautioned. Parents too have been informed that this system is of no injurious tendency. It is but right that such should know the opinion of those who may be reasonably supposed to know more than their children can of tendencies and results.

The community by whom our institutions are fostered, and for whom they exist, are concerned to know the whole truth; to have presented before them the dark ground of the picture as well as its bright lights. There are in our Literary Institutions tendencies to evil, and evils absolute, of a very alarming character, to which every thing noble in humanity, and dear in the hope of a better life, has often fallen a quick and easy victim.

One obvious reason why we have thought fit to expose the tendencies of things here, and through these, the exposures to which the young are subject, is that the information may operate in the way of caution. Those who have children, set a dearer estimate on their moral life than on their natural, and that justly, for the one is immortal and the other transient."

To those who asked the opinion of Dr. Nott, President of Union College, relative to the influence of Secret Societies, he said, without hesitation, "They are the greatest curse that ever rested on this or any other Literary Institution."

Dr. Todd, Author of "Student's Manual" and other works, says, "Secret Societies, in College especially, are the sources of immense evils, and hot-beds of many vices: speed the time when they shall be done away. I think that the testimony of the last half century in our Colleges, would be, that no pious young man may hope to join such a Society, without bringing suspicion over his piety, and really depressing if not destroying it, and that they have not unfrequently been the slaughtering houses of moral character, and hopes."

Ex-President Day, of Yale College, in speaking of the influence of these societies, adds, "If they have done good, it has not been by means of the injunction of secrecy, but in spite of it. They might have done more good without it."

Rev. Albert Barnes says, "Any good cause, I think, can be promoted openly; any secret association is liable, at least, to abuse and danger."

Ex-President Humphrey, of Amherst College, says, "I could not consistently advise any pious young man to become a member of one of these Societies; and give it as my deliberate judgment, that it would prevent much evil, and be a great gain, if all these Secret Societies in our Colleges were dissolved."

D. T. Stoddard, Esq., of Northampton, formerly a member of the Alpha-Delta-Phi, says, "I should never join a secret institution of this kind, were I to go through College again."

President Frelinghuysen, of Rutgers College, says, "Not only in this, but in other Colleges, their influenee is only evil. They may have some friendly aspects; but in the very nature of thiogs, where Literary Societies exist, they must be evil."

The following is an extract of a letter from Prof. Morgan, of Oberlin College:—"President Mahan is opposed to Secret Societies, and believes their influence on a college must, sooner or later, prove disastrous. In this opinion all the members of the faculty concur with him."

During the present collegiate year, the President and Faculty of Amherst College expressed to the students, in a written document, which was read by the President before them, their decided disapprobation of Secret Literary Societies, such as exist in this and in many other colleges in the land. They believed the evil growing out of them to far more than counterbalance the good. In the University of Michigan, Secret Societies had grown to be such an evil, that it was found necessary to expel nearly the whole of the Senior Class, because of their connection with them.

To such sentiments and facts may be added the testimony of Dr. Hopkins, President of Williams College; Dr. Wayland, of Brown University; prominent officers in other Colleges, and many other distinguished men, of experience and wisdom, besides graduated members of Secret Societies.

Three reasons are added why their influence is evil:

1st. The great expenditure of money. Each Society must have its room, badge, suppers, &c.; thus there is a continual demand from its members for money to meet their expenses, which must all be paid to keep up appearances; and the student must often deny himself, in order that he may have the amount in readiness; which is no inconsiderable sum, and might be spent far more profitably.

2d. The partiality in choosing members. It seems to be the prevailing idea, that if one dresses well, he is therefore proficient in every thing else, which is seldom the case; and too often those who appear to be gentlemen, are destitute of the good qualities of those upon whom they seem to look with disdain. But after uniting with one of these societies, you must support it on all occasions; its members you are expected to love as brethren; and, in short, "Go for your Society, right or wrong." And furthermore, by associating with a few, to the exclusion of all others, the mind becomes contracted, and no enlarged efforts will be made for the accomplishment of good.

3d. Their religious effect. In comparison with this, the others are but little. The majority who belong to these associations, are irreligious, and often immoral young men; and by close intimacy with these, growth in grace is hindered, and vital godliness in a great measure ceases. If professors of religion unite with these societies, they do not manifest the freedom towards other Christians which should ever characterize the disciples of Christ. There is something behind the curtain.

In view, then, of these considerations, let parents be cautious how they allow their sons to join these associations. They may do some good, but they certainly will a great deal of harm, and the one cannot counterbalance the other. And let professed Christians no longer remain connected with them, but obey the divine command, "Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins."

UNION COLLEGE, 1850.

DEALING WITH RELIGIOUS DESPONDENCY.

In Dr. Wardlaw's Memoir of Dr. McAll, late of Manchester, England, occurs the following narrative, supplied by a friend who derived it immediately from McAll.

"One circumstance he related to me, connected with his own ministrations among the sick, which awakened considerable interest in the neighborhood. A pious person, residing at some distance from Macclesfield, where McAll began his pastoral life, had suffered many years under the influence of religious despondency, particularly resembling the melancholy case of Cowper. As he was held in much esteem, his mental sufferings created much sympathy. Many Christian friends, and eminent ministers of different religious persuasions, visited him, endeavoring to kindle anew the spark of life in his bosom, and restore to his mind those religious consolations which he formerly possessed. These efforts proved wholly in vain; as he possessed, like many others in similar circumstances, that kind of preternatural acuteness which led him to convert all the arguments and topics of consolation into the occasion of deeper discouragement and gloom. It was natural for me to inquire, Did you go?

"'Yes!' he said, 'I did, though without any hope of a beneficial result. But I went to express my sympathy with a disciple of Christ under one of the severest afflictions which could befall a good man, and to deepen my own impressions of the importance of spiritual things. You may suppose,' he added, 'I was not very forward to speak; but I listened, with unwearied attention, to the sad details of his doubts, his difficulties, his gloomy temptations, and his utterly desponding forebodings and fears. Meantime, my eye was not silent, and I noticed every circumstance, however minute, which might assist me to place myself in his state of feeling, and to go along with the processes of his mind; and I was exceedingly anxious to detect any little discrepancy which might arise between the facts he advanced and the conclusions to which he came. At last, looking toward the head of the bed, I observed upon the curtains several pieces of paper carefully pinned here and there, and apparently written upon. Though I suspected what might be the nature of their contents, I said, with apparent surprise and abruptness, 'What are these papers?' 'Oh, Sir,' said the burdened man, 'they are texts of Scripture!' 'But what texts?' I quickly rejoined. 'Sir,' he added, with a slow and faltering voice, 'they are promises.' 'Promises! but what business have they here? You say, you are a cast-away from God's favor, an utter alien from his friendship, that all your religion was a delusion, that you have no interest in one of the promises, and can look for nothing but to be an eternal monument of the Divine displeasure. Why, then, should you have these texts and promises of Scripture perpetually around you, when you have no sort of interest in the religion they represent, or in the Savior they reveal? The two things do not agree together. Either your despondency is excessive and undue, or those promises have no business there. Let me take them away.' 'No, Sir! no, Sir!' said the sufferer; 'do not take them away, I love to see them. I had an interest in them once, and they are still precious. The memorial of them is sweet, though the enjoyment of them is wholly gone.'

"Upon this," said Mr. McAll, "I altered my tone, and said, with the tenderness I really felt, But, my dear friend, are you not aware that the truths are the same as ever, and your mind clings as tenaciously as ever to those truths, and the Author of those truths is the same, yesterday, to-day, and forever? All the difference, therefore, arises from your diseased apprehension of things; and you are confounding the decay of consolation with the decay of piety. Recollect, that while these truths are precious to you, the emotions with which you still cherish the remembrance of them are precious in God's sight; and whilst you have your memorials of the past, God has his memorials too! He says, 'Yea, I have graven you on the palms of my hands; thy walls are continually before me. The mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed; but my loving kindness shall never depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord that hath mercy on thee.' It pleased God to bless this conversation (which has been too briefly and imperfectly sketched) to the afflicted man. His mind recovered its trust and consolation, and he shortly afterward died in peace."

NO ONE PRAYS FOR ME.

Whilst a meeting of much interest was going on in a certain country town in Virginia, Mr. K., a pious young man, selected a young lawyer who was a noted scorner, and made him the subject of special prayer. About two days afterwards, the young lawyer came to the house where the pastor was. I myself was in the house at the time, but being particularly engaged, I requested the pastor to speak to him. "Oh," says he, "he is not serious." "Yes," I replied, "he must be, or he would not come here." "I know him better than you do," said the pastor, "he is a scorner. There is no hope of him." The young lawyer was permitted to depart, I believe, without a single religious remark having been made to him. My conjectures were true. He was then under awakening influences, and a few days afterwards he professed conversion.

Perhaps two weeks after that, this young lawyer was riding along the road on his way to a protracted meeting about to be held in an adjacent county. Before he reached the place, he fell in with another man, Mr. P., going to the same meeting. Religious conversation was introduced, the hopefully converted sinner spoke quite freely of the change of views or feelings which he had experienced, and ascribed them, under God, to the prayers of his friend, Mr. K., who selected him as the subject of special prayer. "Ah," said Mr. P., "I had friends once who used to pray for me; but I have been so careless, so wicked, they don't think it worth while to pray for me; they have all given me up. There is not one, I suppose, on earth, who remembers me in prayer."

"O, yes," replied the young lawyer, "there is one I know." "Who is it?" quickly inquired Mr. P. "The very same who prayed for me has made you the subject of special prayer." "Is it possible!" said Mr. P., and throwing himself back, he had well nigh fallen from the horse upon which he was riding. From that moment he waked up to the claims of his undying soul. A few days after, with great joy, he was telling to all around what a dear Saviour he had found! Blessed be God, the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much. [Evang.

THE JEWS OF THE PRESENT DAY.

Whether it be in pecuniary ability and financial tact, or in the higher walks of learning, or in military prowess, or in political or diplomatic skill, the Jews are not wanting in men thoroughly furnished for every emergency. The Minister of Finance in Russia is a Jew. The Minister, Senor Mendizabel, of Spain, is a Jew. The late President of the French council, Marshal Soult, was a Jew. The first Jesuits were Jews. No great intellectual movement in Europe has taken place in which Jews have not greatly participated. So it has been in the late revolutionary struggles in Europe. Indeed, not a small share of human activity is this day kept in motion by Jews. The mighty reformation now preparing in Germany is developing itself under the auspices of Jews.

The daily political press of Europe is very much under the dominion of Jews. As literary contributors, they influence almost every leading continental paper. In Germany alone, they have the exclusive control of fifteen public journals. An intelligent writer speaks of the "magic power" of their present intellectual influence in Europe.

"For better or for worse they are on the move. Every month brings tidings of change. Old chains are being severed. Old opinions, associations, and observances are being broken up. The harbor of Rabinnical Judaism is left. They must now either be piloted to the haven of truth, or, borne along for the time by every wind that blows, be at length stranded on the shores of Infidelity."

THE DIVINE AND THE DOCTOR.

A devout minister was once asked by a sceptic, if he preached to save souls; and on replying that he did, the caviler rejoined, "Did you ever see a soul?" "No." "Did you ever hear a soul?" "No." "Did you ever taste a soul?" "No." "Did you ever smell a soul?" "No." "Did you ever feel a soul?" "Yes, thank God," said the preacher. "Well," said the caviling doctor, "there are four out of five senses against one that there is no soul." So the matter might have dropped, but the preacher, as subtle in understanding as he was pious in heart, turned the table upon the caviling doctor, and being informed that he was a doctor of medicine, asked, "Did you ever see a pain?" "No," was the reply. "Did you ever hear a pain?" "No." "Did you ever taste a pain?" "No." "Did you ever smell a pain?" "No." "Did you ever feel a pain?" "Yes," said the doctor. "Well, then," rejoined the preacher, "there are, you see, also four senses against one to prove that there is no such thing as a pain."

"OUR PHILADELPHIA MAYOR."

Under the above head, the Christian Chronicle of the 25th ult. has the following:—

"We learn with much regret that our Mayor holds his courts every Sabbath morning, for trying cases of offenders who fall under his jurisdiction. This is an innovation on the sacredness of that holy day, which ought not to receive the least countenance in a Christian community. We see that quite a number of pens are very busy in upholding this profane practice, but they all show that they have no regard for the Sabbath, or any of the precepts of the Decalogue. We have just been reading a writer who has his doubts on the validity of the Sabbath, and says, in their support, that the whole Jewish law has been abrogated. He does not distinguish at all between what was ceremonial and what was moral law, and thus would make a clean sweep of the whole at once and without reserve. Christ, our great teacher, declared in so many words, that he came not to destroy the law, but to fulfill, i. e., extend and illustrate, as what follows most conclusively shows. No law concerning our relations to God as our Creator, and our fellow men as his accountable creatures, has ever been abrogated. All this is in full force, and will be while the world stands.

"The first Sabbath was to commemorate the completion of the world; the Jewish Sabbath was to commemorate the deliverance of the Hebrews from Egyptian bondage; the Christian Sabbath was to commemorate the resurrection of Christ from the dead, when the work of human redemption was finished, and a new spiritual world was ushered into being. It was both a deliverance and a creation, and thus would take the place of both the former Sabbaths, but in a far higher sense, because spiritual. A change was made by our Lord himself after his resurrection, by his own example. While on earth for forty days, he met the disciples and held worship with them on the first day of the week. As we follow the example of the Apostles from this time, as their history in the book of Acts, and in other places that are alluded to afterward, shows, we find, that their Sabbath was the first day of the week.

"The example of our Lord and his inspired Apostles are [is] authority enough for the Christian church of that and every age, and for all who would observe it in a spiritual and holy manner. It cannot be abolished as a Jewish ordinance, without abolishing the whole moral law; it cannot be set aside as a Christian institution, without setting aside the whole New Testament, for it is a part of that very testament. And if we have any respect for Christ and his Apostles, we must conform to their example in this particular, a usage of the Christian church from that to the present time.

"We sincerely pity the man who has any disposition in this Christian land and this Christian city to trample on this time-honored and Bible-honored institution. We hope the churches of this city will remonstrate against the desecration of the Sabbath by our Mayor, while holding his Sunday courts, [illegible] necessity, and out of which no good comes, but much evil."

Remarks.

We have no disposition to uphold the Mayor of Philadelphia in his practice of holding courts every Sunday morning; but, as "where no law is, there is no transgression," we cannot find it in our hearts to denounce him as a sinner against God. If he honestly thinks, as many people profess to think, that the first day of the week is the Sabbath by divine authority, his practice of holding court is no very good proof of his respect for it; and we very much fear that he would treat the true Sabbath no better, if he understood its claims. But this is a point with which we do not care to intermeddle. Let him and his accusers settle it between them.

There is one point, however, upon which a little light would be very acceptable to us, who are so often commiserated as sitting in darkness; and that is, whether the Mayor's practice of holding courts on Sunday is not almost as much a violation of the civil law as the quiet labor of some German Seventh-day Baptists upon their farms was, for which, some four or five years ago, they were arraigned and fined by the Court of Common Pleas—a judgment, which was afterwards affirmed by the Supreme Court? Judge Bell decided, that the Sunday Sabbath was a civil institution. Surely, the Mayor ought to respect it as such, if he cannot respect it as a divine ordinance.

And there is yet another point upon which we want light; will the Chronicle please to shine? It is this: How can a Baptist object to the application of the law of circumcision to the institution of baptism, while he so pertinaciously insists on applying the law of the Sabbath to the first day of the week? Why not use the sliding-rule in both cases? The Fourth Commandment as pointedly enjoins the observance of the seventh day of the week, as it is in the power of language to do. Of course, it excludes every other day, as clearly as the law of baptism, by enjoining the institution upon believers, excludes unconscious babes.

Again, what authority has the Chronicle for three different Sabbaths—one "to commemorate the completion of the world," another "to commemorate the deliverance of the Hebrews from Egyptian bondage," and a third "to commemorate the resurrection of Christ from the dead?" Do the Scriptures speak of more than one weekly Sabbath? The Sabbath is frequently spoken of in the New Testament, after the resurrection of Christ as well as before it. (See Acts 13: 14, 42, 44; 16: 13; 18: 4. Compare Matt. 24: 20.) Is it not the same Sabbath which had before been in use among the Jews? Is it a different Sabbath from that which is alluded to in the Old Testament?

Again, what authority has the Chronicle for saying, that "the work of human redemption was finished" by the resurrection of Christ? By redemption he does not mean the actual delivery of men from the power of sin; that is a work which is still going on, and will not be finished till the last one of God's elect is brought home to glory. He must mean the means of redemption, or atonement. But what proof is there, that even this was finished by the resurrection of Christ? If we understand our Bible, the High Priest under the law was never considered to have finished making an atonement for the sins of the people, till he had gone into the most holy place, and sprinkled the blood upon the mercy-seat. (See Lev. 15.) And as "whatsoever things were written aforetime, were written for our learning," we conclude that Jesus Christ, "if he were on earth, should not be a priest"—that it was necessary for him, not only to die and rise from the dead, but also to enter into the holy of holies, even heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us"—and that any thing short of this would leave the work of atonement incomplete.

And what does the Chronicle mean by saying, that "a new spiritual world was ushered into being" at Christ's resurrection? Does he mean the new creation? If so, it is a work which is not yet finished, and will not be till the great day of the Lord. (See 2 Pet. 2: 13.) It is in progress, and has been from the time that souls were first made the subjects of renewal by grace. (2 Cor. 5: 17.) When it is completed, we shall behold a world "wherein dwelleth righteousness;" "and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain." (Rom. 21: 4.) Then, if the Almighty sees fit to institute a new Sabbath, his people will all keep it. But we are very much inclined to think, that then the weekly Sabbath will be merged into that eternal one, of which it is a type. (Heb. 4: 9.)

And what authority has the Chronicle for saying, that "a change was made by our Lord himself after his resurrection?" That Christ gave any command for such a change, is not pretended; but, by an expressive italicising, we are pointed to the force of his example. If he gave an example of changing the Sabbath, we suppose that he must have done so by resting from labor on the day to which he changed it, just as, at the original institution of the Sabbath, God gave the example of resting from all his works. But we should like to see the proof, that Christ rested from labor on the first day of the week. We have many times asked for it, but nobody has thought it worth while to give it to us.

"While on earth for forty days, he met [illegible] the first day of the week."

One would suppose, from an assertion put forth with such boldness, that every Sunday, during the forty days preceding his ascension, Christ met his assembled disciples, and that the proof of this was ample. But what are the facts? Two solitary instances are all that are recorded; and, to make out one of them, it must be taken for granted, that the phrase "after eight days" means nothing more nor less than the next first day of the week! But neither of these instances show, that Christ rested from labor on that day—the very thing most necessary to be proved. These instances prove simply this, that Christ took the earliest opportunity to convince his disciples that he was actually risen from the dead. He met them on the first day of the week for that purpose, and it cannot be proved that he had any other object in view. That his design was to sanctify the day as a Sabbath, is wholly imaginary.

"As we follow the example of the Apostles from this time, as their history in the book of Acts, and in other places that are alluded to afterward, shows, we find that their Sabbath was the first day of the week."

Another bold assertion, and wholly destitute of proof. So far is it from being true, that the first day of the week comes into notice "from this time," there is not the least mention made of it in "the book of Acts" till nearly thirty years afterward. And how does it come into notice then? As a Sabbath? Not at all. But in the evening of that day—whether the evening which followed, or the one which preceded the light part of the day, is not certain, but for argument's sake we admit that it was the former—the disciples at Troas, Paul being with them, "came together to break bread." The Apostle preached to them, restored a young man who had been killed to life, broke bread and ate with them, talked on till break of day, and then started on his journey. Acts 20: 7. In all this account there is not one word of the disciples' observing the day as a Sabbath; and we have as good reason to infer that they had spent the light part of the day in labor, as the Chronicle, or any body else, has to infer that they had spent it sabbatizing. That they had been in the habit of coming together before on the first day of the week, or that they ever did afterwards, is not in the record.

If the Chronicle should undertake any notice of these remarks—we have offered them in no spirit of unkindness—we hope he will stick to his text. Our readers will take notice, that he maintains the validity of the Decalogue, and of the Sabbath which the Decalogue enjoins—that "Christ came not to destroy the law, but to fulfill, i. e., extend and illustrate"—that "no law concerning our relations to God as our Creator, and our fellow men as his accountable creatures, has ever been abrogated"—that "all this is in full force, and will be while the world stands."

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 23.

The Sunday in France and England—Papal Matters.

GLASGOW, December 13, 1850.

It has been proposed this week, in the French Assembly, to require a stricter observance in that country of Sunday and the fete days. Montalembert has brought in a report having this recommendation. It proposes to require suspension of labor on both, but with such exceptions, and such power on the part of authorities to dispense with these obligations, as, although the festivals were omitted, would render it unacceptable to Sunday sanctifiers in this land. It remains to be shown whether the proposal will be entertained.

In the Court of Queen's Bench, London, it was last month decided, by Lord Campbell, in the case of a man who plead that he had not been lawfully enlisted because he received the bounty on a Sunday, that a soldier employed in enlisting is not engaged in his ordinary occupation, and that enlisting on a Sunday is therefore lawful—just as a farmer's hiring a man on Sunday "is a valid hiring." The soldier's work, or ordinary occupation, his Lordship coolly remarked, "is to attend drill, and to fight the battles of his country."

Another case was decided at the Police Court, Lalford, Manchester, against a Jew for Sunday trading. He was prosecuted by the Chief Constable, under an old act of Charles the Second's time. Contrary to the usual practice of Sunday traders in the place, who seem to be numerous, the Jew kept all his shutters off, while others prosecute their calling less openly. He sold cigars in this manner during divine service, as well as at other hours. He was fined five shillings, but the Chief Constable informed him, that if he called at the office they were likely to make the same allowance to him as to others—meaning, I presume, that he must desist from selling at church hours.

The agitation arising out of the Papal appointment of English Bishops has scarcely subsided. Meetings of all classes, and in all places, have continued to be held; and addresses to the Queen and Prime Minister have numerously been presented. Both appear disposed to do something manifesting displeasure; but the difficulty felt is probably what that something should be. Some indication of its character was expected to have been made on Tuesday last. Ancient privilege authorizes the civic dignitaries of London and the representatives of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, to state their grievances and desires to Her Majesty personally. And in the exercise of this privilege these parties laid their addresses at the foot of the throne at Windsor, expressing to Her Majesty their apprehension and displeasure at the "aggression." Like Queen's speeches in general, however, the Royal replies gave no intimation of what should be done, although couched in terms which implied concurrence with the tenor of the address. In that to the Chancellor, Masters and Scholars of the University of Oxford, Her Majesty almost seems ironically to point to Tractarian departures from Scripture verity, when she says, "Your earnest endeavor, in the discharge of your important duties, to train up the youth entrusted to your care in faithful attachment to the truths of Holy Scripture, cannot fail, under God's blessing, to have a powerful effect in strengthening the defenses of our Protestant faith, and in preserving inviolate the privileges which are justly dear to the people of this country."

The bestowed titles will be of very little moment, if there be no temporal power to sustain them. We should attach more importance to Government's withdrawment of their large grant to the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth, Ireland, than to any other measure that has been suggested. There, their priests are taught the immoralities, the idolatry, and the insolence, with which they are charged. It is not a little remarkable, that Lord Beaumont and the Duke of Norfolk, two of the prominent adherents to Rome in England, have denounced the Papal rescript on this occasion. Their patriotism, as Englishmen, outweighs their devotedness to the cause of the church to which they are attached. Some weight, however, may be due in the case of the noble Duke to the alledged fact of his being in possession of twenty-four livings of the church of England; the value of which might be seriously affected should Popery prevail in England over her daughter, bearing so much her own image.

Those who, meanwhile, are feeling most the influence of the storm, undoubtedly are the Pusseyites or Tractarians. Dr. Pussey, himself, has lately intimated that he means to die in the church of England; but some of those who have been led forward by him will probably be required to leave their offices at least during their lifetime. Urged by the pressure of Government and people, the Bishop of London has felt constrained to require the resignation of the notorious Mr. Bennett, of St. Barnabas chapel, in the parish of St. Paul's. Here was the most perfect exhibition of Church of England Popery; so perfect, indeed, was the resemblance, that it required an eye experienced in the respective superstitions to detect the difference. Mr. Bennett has not, however, resigned without having first exposed the countenance given to his "mummeries," both by the Bishop and the Prime Minister. Lord John had been a member of his church for seven years, and left only last year—probably, when the approximation to Rome was becoming very transparent. His Lordship now attends the ministrations of the Presbyterian Dr. Cumming, who has, on this occasion, proved one of the sorest thorns in the new "Cardinal's" side, not only exhibiting the unchanging persecuting tenets of the apostacy, but also supplying a very damaging instance of the personal untrustworthiness of the Cardinal himself in regard to the oaths taken by him as Archbishop of Westminster. This exposure was made most opportunely and effectually. Another instance of suppression of the truth, for the purpose and with the effect of causing a falsehood for a time to be believed, has farther tended to show the unscrupulousness with which heretics can be treated. A person wrote the Cardinal about a rumor of an old gentleman having died, disinheriting his family, to leave his property to the Cardinal and Church of Rome. Wiseman replied as if there had been no foundation whatever for the rumor. The son, in the Times of yesterday, however, states that it is perfectly true that his father, when above eighty years of age, and in a very infirm state of health, was induced to set aside a settlement of his property among his children, which had been made four years before, and to make a new one, giving only a life-interest in his property, and leaving it afterwards to the then Vicar Apostolic of London, and his successor, (whom Wiseman now is.) The circumstances are very discreditable, not only to those who primarily exercised the influence, but to the Cardinal, who, by disingenuousness so sought to conceal it.

CIRCULAR.

To the Churches of the Western S. D. B. Association.

DEAR BRETHREN:—The undersigned was directed by the Executive Board, at a meeting recently held, to lay before you the present condition of our Associational Mission, and ask your early attention to the same.

On account of the sickness of your missionary, Elder Hiram P. Burdick, no services were rendered by him in the early part of the season; but for some time past he has been enabled successfully to prosecute his labors. Up to Dec. 25th, he has spent in your service eighty days. The fields of labor occupied by him are Corning, Caton and Troupsburgh in Steuben Co., N. Y.; Westfield and Brookfield in Tioga Co., Pa., and Hebron, Potter Co., Pa. A good measure of success seems to have attended the labors of your missionary in the several places mentioned above, where time was allowed to do any thing besides exploring the ground. In some of the places referred to, no labor had been at any previous time expended. Several Sabbath-keepers were found in Brookfield and Westfield, Tioga Co., Pa., who had embraced the Sabbath without any other light than that gained from reading the Bible. They had not so much as heard one word on the subject from any quarter. The Church in Hebron has been revived, and some that were "aliens from the commonwealth of Israel," have become "fellow citizens with the saints," and are now enjoying the blessing of a "hope in Christ." Six persons are reported as having embraced the Bible Sabbath. On the whole, the prosperity of the mission is such as to greatly encourage the Board.

The Board is now considerably in debt to Bro. Burdick, who needs his pay; and as we have no other means of discharging the debt than the contributions of the churches, you are respectfully but earnestly urged to send at your earliest possible convenience to the Treasurer, D. R. Stillman, Alfred Center.

ALFRED CENTER, Dec. 31, 1850.

LOTTERY OPERATIONS IN NEW YORK.

The Association for the Suppression of Gambling, which was organized in New York a few months ago, has done a good deal in the way of opening the eyes of the people to the various forms of gambling carried on in this city. Few persons had any idea of the extent to which gambling is carried, until the work of ferreting out and exposing was undertaken in earnest. Lottery operations, especially, were supposed to be quite limited. But that this is a mistaken supposition, appears from a petition which the Association for the Suppression of Gambling has recently forwarded to the Convention now in session at Annapolis, for revising and amending the Constitution of the State of Maryland. We copy the petition, because it embodies important facts, in which all are interested.

Petition.

"We, the undersigned, citizens of the city of New York, respectfully represent, that the drawing of Lotteries and the vending of Lottery Tickets in the State of New York, is prohibited by our State Constitution, but that, in defiance of law, hundreds of persons in this and neighboring cities are constantly employed in the clandestine sale of lottery tickets and policies, predicated upon the lotteries daily drawn in Maryland and elsewhere, to the serious injury of every community in which such tickets and policies are sold.

"And we would further represent, that in the city of New York alone, there are about 70 lottery offices, besides some 350 places especially kept for vending lottery policies; that they are located in every part of the city, so as to accommodate all classes of our citizens, from the most wealthy and respectable to the most degraded and vicious; and that, in addition to the stationary venders, there are a large number of male and female traveling agents, who penetrate our workshops, counting-houses, and even the family circle, for the purpose of secretly vending lottery tickets and policies, and that at least five thousand dollars are daily expended by the people of this city for lottery tickets and policies, thereby annually ruining hundreds of families, and greatly increasing our almshouse expenditures and the cost of the administration of criminal justice, thus affording the most conclusive testimony that lottery and policy gambling are fruitful sources of poverty, wretchedness, and crime; and we therefore earnestly solicit your honorable body to incorporate in the organic law of your State, a provision entirely and forever prohibiting the drawing of lotteries within the State of Maryland, that the citizens of your own commonwealth, as well as those of neighboring States, may be protected against the consequences of a vice which has already wrought so much ruin in the world."

THE REVIVAL IN HOPKINTON, R. I.—A letter from Eld. Charles M. Lewis, dated January 1, 1851, says:—"The series of religious meetings in which I have been engaged at Temperance Valley and Potter Hill, is now closed, though occasional appointments are continued. The meetings were held evenings for about eleven weeks, and were characterized by no extraordinary excitement, but solemnity and a deep religious interest. I trust that much lasting good has been done for the cause of Christ in the vicinity where this revival has been enjoyed. I have baptized seventy-three persons in the two neighborhoods, most of whom have recently professed to find forgiveness of sins through the merits of our divine Redeemer."

MORE ABOUT THE "DECLINE OF POPERY."—"Kirwan," alias Rev. Dr. Murray, of New Jersey, is advertised to deliver a discourse at the Tabernacle in New York, January 15, on the "Decline of Popery and its causes." Of course Bishop Hughes is to be again overhauled. Never did a single stroke of policy do better execution than that of Bishop Hughes in lecturing upon the "Decline of Protestantism" just before he started for Rome. That lecture furnished texts from which he has ever since been preached throughout the country, oftener than "from Sabbath to Sabbath." If he is not the most noted man in the country when he returns, it will not be because his Protestant opponents have failed to use the means at their command to make him such.

BAPTIST MISSIONS IN FRANCE.—A letter from Dr. Devan, dated at Lyons, Nov. 19, and published in the Baptist Missionary Magazine, announces that it has been thought discreet, on account of the violent opposition they encountered, to remove the meetings from the quarter where they had formerly been held, and to hold them in another place, under an authorization from the prefect. Alluding to their trials, Dr. Devan says:—

"The little church are by no means cast down; they meet me privately every Lord's day, when we break bread in our little upper chamber, in memory of Him who gave us the legacy of persecutions, and who has told us that the servant shall not be better treated than his master."

SCENES OF STEAMBOAT EXPLOSIONS.—How few of those who read the almost daily reports of steamboat explosions, have any adequate idea of the scenes which they present. As an illustration, we copy the following paragraph from a letter of James Harvey Stillman, who was on board the Anglo-Norman at the time of her explosion, near New Orleans, and who was himself thrown high into the air and alighted in the water, whence he was taken without serious injury:

"I hope I may not live to see another such a scene as I saw on reaching the wreck. There were men with broken limbs—some badly burnt, and imploring those around them to put an end to their sufferings—one man with his head split open—firemen, scalded from head to foot, horribly disfigured, dancing around in excrutiating agony. It was appalling beyond description."

MORALS AND RELIGION IN TEXAS.—A correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune, writing from Houston, Texas, under date of Dec. 14, says that there is a very general and increasing interest in that State on the subject of the mental and moral improvement of the masses of the population, and especially in regard to the rising race. The demand for books of a valuable character is fast increasing. The number of bookstores in the State has been augmented four-fold within a year, and all seem to be doing a prosperous business. The agents of the various benevolent publishing associations are succeeding well, and putting into circulation, by sale and donation, a large amount of valuable publications. There are about forty newspapers now published in the State, and the two having the largest circulation are devoted to the cause of Religion, Morality and Education. The Texas Literary Institute has established a series of popular lectures for the season at Houston.

LIBERALITY.—Erastus Corning, of Albany, says the Springfield Daily Republican, gave Watson G. Haynes, during the time that philanthropist was engaged in advocating the abolition of flogging and spirit rations in the Navy, an aggregate sum of fourteen hundred dollars. Such liberality for such a cause is truly praiseworthy.

THE REMAINS OF ALFRED STILLMAN, who was killed by the explosion of the steamer Anglo-Norman, near New Orleans, were shipped from that city on the 19th of December, and their arrival at New York is daily expected. After funeral services in this city, they will be taken to Plainfield, N. J., for interment.

Mr. Holmes, in speaking of the effect of the distribution of tracts, says: "Every printed page that leaves the depot under his charge, he considers as an arrow that tells. A single tract that enters a village is often a little matter that kindles a great fire."

INDIAN LITERATURE AND MISSIONS.—The Minnesota Pioneer says that a new paper for the Sioux Indians, called the Dakota Tawaxitku Kin, (the Dakota Friend,) is just issued, to be published monthly at twenty-five cents per annum, under the superintendence of the Rev. Gideon H. Pond, of the Dakota Mission; printed in the Dakota language, done into our alphabet very imperfectly, but as well, probably, as our alphabet can be made to represent the hissing, spattering, hawking, grunting, clucking gutturals and unutterals of the Dakota language, composed as it is of words which fall upon the tympanum less like soft snow flakes than like a mingled tempest of tomahawks, hedgehogs, and wild cats.

After the missionaries have labored faithfully with the Sioux Indians, now for more than sixteen years, always treating them with the utmost kindness, they seem to have made but little impression upon them, and are looked upon with distrust; for the Indians suppose that the missionaries, in some way or another, must be making something out of them, or they would not stay. They call them white mice.

THE FUGITIVE SLAVE CASE IN NEW YORK.—The case of Henry Long, of which we gave some account last week, is still undecided. It was continued from day to day for more than a week before Commissioner Hall. But the counsel for the claimant becoming convinced that he could not succeed in that Court, abandoned it, and commenced a new process in the United States District Court. The struggle here is likely to be a long one, and, as influential friends of freedom are enlisted in it, we hope it will be a fair one. Those who have aided Long thus far, have issued an earnest appeal to the public for funds to meet the expenses unavoidably attending the defense. They intend, if necessary, to carry the case to the Supreme Court of the United States. They say in their appeal:—

"The course marked out may involve the expenditure of several thousand dollars. Should more be contributed than may be necessary in the case of Long, the balance will be sacredly kept as a Fund, to be used in similar cases, should they occur. Money may be sent to Horace Greeley, Esq., Editor of the Tribune."

NEW YORK STATE GOVERNMENT.—On the first of January, the new Governor of New York, and other State Officers, took the oath of office, with the usual formalities on such occasions. The Legislature assembles on Third-day, Jan. 7, when the Governor delivers his Message, and the machinery of government begins to move.

Proceedings in Congress Last Week.

SECOND-DAY, Dec. 30.

In the SENATE, a petition was presented from Mr. Wise, of Lancaster, Pa., Professor of Aerostatics, setting forth that he has brought that science to such perfection as to make it useful in the transportation of the mails, also in time of war as an engine of destruction, and asking Congress to appropriate $20,000 to enable him to make experiments as to his project; referred to the Naval Committee. Mr. Benton introduced and explained his bill to pay the public debt, to extinguish the Federal title to the Public Land within the States, to grant donations and preemption rights to actual settlers, and to give lands to States within which they lie; referred to the Committee on Public Lands. A message from the President, enclosing the correspondence between the State Department and the Austrian Chargé concerning the appointment of an American Agent to Hungary during her struggle, was received, read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The joint resolution from the House, authorizing the sale or transfer of Bounty Land Warrants, was referred.

The HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES adopted a Joint Resolution that nothing in the Bounty Land-Act of last September shall be so construed as to prevent the sale or transfer of any certificates or warrants prior to the location of the same or the issue of the patent thereon. The remainder of the day was occupied in the discussion of bills granting Public Lands in Louisiana, Mississippi, Indiana, Illinois, and Ohio, for railroad purposes.

THIRD-DAY, Dec. 31.

The SENATE passed a resolution about the registry of vessels, another about the Coast Survey, ordered 5,000 extra copies of the Correspondence with the Austrian Chargé, and adjourned to Sixth-day.

The HOUSE debated the Cheap Postage bill, and adjourned to Sixth day.

SIXTH-DAY, Jan. 3.

In the SENATE, after some unimportant business, and the passage of a bill to relieve a mail contractor, in Vermont, the bill to ascertain and settle private land claims in California came up, and Mr. Benton made a speech upon it which lasted till the Senate adjourned over to Second-day.

The HOUSE spent most of the day on private bills, of which it passed twenty-four.

SABBATH-DAY, Jan. 4.

The SENATE was not in session.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, a bill to refund to Michigan the money she advanced for the transportion of volunteers to Mexico, and a bill granting certain lands for a railroad from Terre Haute to Illinois Town, were referred. The Postage Reduction Bill was then taken up, and remarks were made by Featherston of Mississippi, Gerry of Maine, Watkins of Tennessee, and Sweetzer and Root of Ohio, mainly upon the franking privilege. A resolution was adopted, that the debate on this bill shall close in two hours after the House shall again go into Committee on it.

General Intelligence.

Two Weeks Later from California.

The Steamship Georgia, from Chagres, arrived at New York on Second-day, Jan. 6, with the California mails, 555 passengers, and a small amount of treasure. The bulk of the treasure, and a large number of passengers, were to come by the Crescent City.

The Georgia stopped at Havana, where everything was quiet, the new Captain General acting with great energy in putting a stop to gambling and other improprieties. Five or six Californians were left in prison for violating Spanish laws, drawing their bowie knives and revolvers, and committing other indecencies too numerous to mention. The Captain General has determined to make an example of such characters, who have too long been permitted to disgrace the name of America. Americans were permitted to go on shore freely, and treated with respect whenever they merited it.

The news from California by this arrival is not important. The cholera had almost entirely disappeared from Sacramento City. In San Francisco the mortality has not been as great as was feared, and it was rapidly diminishing when the steamer sailed.

Mayor Bigelow, of Sacramento City, died at San Francisco, on the 28th of November. He was a branch of the Massachusetts family of the same name, and has been in active business on the Pacific coast for the past fifteen years. His late misfortunes in the Sacramento troubles, his long confinement, and his sufferings consequent upon his wounds, materially weakened his constitution, and the pecuniary losses sustained in the interim, had a most depressing effect upon his spirits. In this state he was attacked by cholera, and a few hours put an end to his chequered career. He leaves no wife, but a family of children in Massachusetts.

Mining operations do not seem to be as prosperous as they have at some times been represented. One of our California exchanges says that a faithful miner may reasonably expect to make eight hundred dollars a year, and thinks he ought to be satisfied with that.

European News.

The Steamship Niagara, with seven days later news from Europe, arrived at Boston on Sunday last.

In England, no-popery meetings are becoming less frequent, and the tone and temper of the majority of such demonstrations appear to be more mild and forbearing.

Cotton has advanced from ½ to ¼ of a penny The Flour Market is dull at previous rates. American Provisions are scarce and prices consequently remain firm. Lard has slightly advanced. The state of trade at Manchester and other manufacturing districts was exceedingly good.

President Fillmore's Message to Congress attracted more than usual attention from the English press. Nearly every paper of note printed the document entire.

The German question begins to assume a new aspect, inasmuch as it is now suspected that the Conferences to be held at Dresden on the 23d of this month, between Austria and Prussia, bode no good to the smaller German States, which it is said are now using energetic measures to form a league of their own.

Accounts from Australia say that Smith O'Brien had made an unsuccessful attempt to escape to California.

Louis Napoleon, it is said, is involved in debt to the amount of near two millions of francs. His application to the Assembly for relief will, it is reported, be obstinately, but unsuccessfully, contested.

The American Protestant Chapel at Rome has been closed by order of the Government. This want of tolerance has caused much irritation at Rome.

From Turkey it is stated that the province of Aleppo is perfectly tranquil. The rebels in Bosnia have been defeated at all points.

Burning Fluid.

An article in the last number of the "London Mechanics' Magazine," gives an account of a new process of manufacturing burning fluid, which cannot fail to interest the American public. The discovery was made by a gentleman of Birmingham, named Abraham M. Marbe. The process is simple, and the articles used are easily obtained. The mode and ingredients used in the manufacture of Mr. Marbe's fluid are: Take one gallon of the oil of turpentine, and add to it one pound of sulphuric acid and a quart of water. Stir this admixture well, and let it remain three or four hours; then pour the clear liquor into a vessel containing water. This last process separates the remaining acid from it. Then dissolve in another vessel a pound of fine lime for every gallon of the fluid; after which, the liquid is gradually poured into and stirred along with the lime. It is in this state left standing through the night, when the clear fluid is drawn off, and is fit for burning. In order to make a better fluid out of that above described, the "Scientific American" says that it should also undergo the following process: "For every gallon of liquor have a vat, in which are placed four ounces of fine lime and a half a pound of burned potash. Wet this with half a pound of alcohol, and allow the vapor to subside; then add more until the lime and potash are covered with about a pint of alcohol for every gallon of the purified spirit already described, a gallon of which is added for every half pound of the lime and potash. After this settles, the clear, is distilled, and a beautiful burning fluid is the result." [Home Gazette.

When Fourdrinier's invention of machinery for making endless paper was patented, owing to a mistake the word "machines" was written "machine." The property was pirated, which led to litigation, and the patentees' funds were exhausted before they could establish their rights. They became bankrupt, and lost all the fruits of an invention on which they spent £40,000.

Adroit Operations.—We are informed, says the Hartford Times, that one Towner, who forged the paper to the amount of $15,000, lately found in the Phœnix Bank of this city, has recently made some bold operations in Boston. He forged a note of $800 on Ives, Hooker & Co., of Hartford, and deposited it in the New-England Bank, Boston. He then procured a telegraph envelop and accompanying blank letter sheets, and wrote a "dispatch" from New York to Matthew Bolles, a broker of Boston, signing the dispatch Spear, (Bolles's New-York correspondent.) It was in substance as follows:

"Matthew Bolles—Take up the note of $800 in New-England Bank, signed Ives, Hooker & Co., and indorsed by D. F. Robinson. SPEAR."

Mr. Bolles, on receiving this dispatch, at once sent to the Bank and took up the note; the money was placed to Towner's credit. Towner then called on Bolles, and by a well told story, succeeded in borrowing $500 more; making $1,300 transferred from Bolles's pocket to his own in the course of a few hours.

Towner then forged another note of $600, and by repeating the telegraph operation, got E. W. Clarke, Dodge & Co., to take it up, he pocketing the cash. It was not long, of course, before he was missing with $1,900 in cash, procured by forgery, impudence and adroit management.

A Family Hotel.—One of the pleasantest Parisianisms is the Hotel garni, and some Yankee of genius, taking that for his model, proposes to erect in New-Haven a building of similar intent, but of somewhat more generous scope. The plan is to erect a house of some 140 rooms, exclusive of kitchen, public parlors, reception rooms, &c. The average rent to be about $45. The entrance to each suit of rooms will be upon a spacious, common hall, at the ends of which will be bath-rooms and other offices, dust-flues, &c. to save stair-work. There will be no necessity of keeping separate cooks, for the superintendent of the building will procure the cooking in the house at the lowest rates, and a regular bill of fare, with prices, will be daily sent to the occupants. At the end of each quarter a settlement will be made, and if the receipts exceed the expenses each occupant will be paid pro rata his share of the profits. [Tribune.

Fatal Accident on New Year's Day.—The N. Y. Tribune says: A horse attached to a pleasure-sleigh, containing Dr. Vancleek, Mr. D. Bedson, and a child, a niece of the latter gentleman, took fright in Madison avenue, about 3½ o'clock on Wednesday afternoon, and ran down the avenue to Twenty-ninth st. where the sleigh was upset and the whole party were thrown out with great violence. The child escaped unhurt, Dr. Vancleek was severely injured, and the skull of Mr. Bedson was dreadfully fractured. The parties were immediately conveyed to the Eighteenth Ward Police Station and attended by Drs. Mott, Wood and others. Dr. Vancleek was sufficiently recovered at 5 o'clock as to warrant his removal to his residence. Mr. Bedson died at 7 o'clock. He was a young man of highly respectable connections, and was to have been married in two weeks.

Singular Accident.—On New Year's Day a New York gentleman, named Theophilus Barlow, while making a call at a house in Brooklyn, was presented with a glass of hot lemonade, and while partaking of it swallowed a piece of glass, of triangular shape, about the size of a shilling. His throat was lacerated severely by the passage of the glass, and he bled very freely at the mouth, and suffered the most excruciating pain. Medical assistance was called in, but failed to accomplish any thing for the relief of the sufferer. His friends are fearful of serious results. The tumbler was probably frosted, and by pouring hot water therein was cracked, thus leading to this singular accident.

Robbery and Murder.—We are informed says the Peoria (Ill.) Republican, Dec. 13, that Jesse Funk, an extensive cattle dealer of Funk's Grove, McLean Co., was murdered and robbed on the 9th inst., a few miles from his residence. Mr. Funk and his son left home with a considerable amount of money, intending to purchase cattle for the Chicago Market, and on Tuesday last was overtaken and attacked by three men. He shot one of his assailants dead and wounded another; the third man however fired and killed him. The son of Mr. Funk, who had been detained on the road arrived at the scene of the affray a short time after the death of his father, and obtained from the wounded robber a confession of the crime and a description of the villain who had escaped. Young Funk then shot the robber and started in pursuit of his confederate.

Great Bank Robbery.—The Otsego County Bank was robbed between Saturday afternoon the 28th ult., and Monday morning the 30th ult., of Thirty Two Thousand Dollars, nearly as follows:—$5,000 bills of Central Bank, Cherry Valley; $19,000 bills of various banks, mostly in New York State, west of Schenectady; $9,000 bills of Otsego County Bank; $4,500 in gold; $2,500 in silver. $5,000 will be paid for such information as will lead to the conviction of the burglar and recovery of the money, or $2,000 for the former only, and $3,000 for the latter, or in that proportion for any part of it.

The Effects of Heat.—A native of Europe, remarks Dr. Arnott, views with surprise the effects of heat in equatorial regions. Sealing-wax, he finds, will not retain the impression of a seal; butter becomes oil; a tallow candle must be poured into a lamp; if he attempts to pour ether from a bottle, it disappears in vapor. Oak and fir trees, transplanted to the torrid zone, shrink into insignificance; wool-clad animals lose their covering, or exhibit only thin silky hair; and the bull-dog in a few months becomes almost naked, and is deprived of his native spirit and courage.

There is a boundary dispute between Canada and New Brunswick, involving a claim to upwards of 5,000 square miles of territory. The British Government has appointed Right Hon. Dr. Lushington, Mr. Falconer and Dr. Twiss, arbitors to determine the boundary in dispute.

Singular Case of Second Marriage.—The Lewistown (Me.) Journal, relates a singular incident, which, in a few words, may be stated thus: In the year 1814, a Mr. Thurston, of Pownal, was married to a young lady of that place, with whom he lived two or three years. He then left his wife, and went to the British provinces, where, a short time after, it was reported that he was executed for trespass upon the king's timber lands. A year or two after this report became current, she married a second time with a Mr. Lovell, with whom she lived until his death, which occurred a few years since. Since that time nothing has occurred to occasion a doubt of the truth of the rumor of the death of her husband, until a few days since a person called upon her, and stated that her first husband had recently died at Hudson, N. Y., having been injured by a fall from a carriage, and offered her $50 for an assignment of her right in his property. This she very wisely refused to do. The next day another man called upon her, and offered $150, which she likewise declined. An inquiry was instituted, and the result is that a fortune of some $30,000 will probably fall into her hands. Thurston left some eight or nine children by his second marriage; but as this, in the eye of the law, was illegal, she remains the sole heir.

Boat Capsized and Three Lives Lost.—The Montgomery (Ala.) Atlas learns that when the steamboat Mary Clifton, on a recent trip from Mobile to Montgomery, was a few hours out from Mobile, the bursting of a jar of alcohol occasioned the cry of fire to be raised, which caused such a panic on board, as to induce some of the hands, in the most reprehensible manner, and regardless of every other consideration than their own personal safety, to spring into the yawl and strike for the shore, but by some mismanagement, in their selfish eagerness to save themselves at the expense of the lives of others, the boat was capsized, and three of their number drowned. The engines in the meantime had been stopped and the fire extinguished without difficulty.

Troubles in Mexico.—The State of Oajaca, in Mexico, is still disturbed by the rebel Melendez. He seems to have gathered fresh strength of late, and to have become more audacious in his operations. At the head of more than 500 men he surprised the town Ixaltepec, killing the Sub-Prefect and a Lieutenant. Shortly afterwards he attempted to seize the town of Tehauntepec, where the cholera was prevailing to such an extent that he thought he would have an easy triumph. However he met with a warm reception, and after some skirmishing, was obliged to retreat with loss. The Monitor thinks that this rebellion will soon be suppressed.

Western Steamboat Accidents.—The steamer George Washington from Cincinnati, with two barges in tow, sunk one of them near the mouth of the Kentucky river. She, however towed it ashore. It is loaded with pork and lard. The Washington on entering the canal, grounded the other barge on the rocks, and it will be lighted off. The Citizen was sunk on the Arkansas river, below Little Roak, and is a total loss, except part of her machinery and upper works. The steamer Delta, No. 2, sunk on the 22d ult., and is a total loss. She was loaded with sugar and molasses. No lives lost.

Congregation Precipitated into a Cellar.—A distressing accident occurred in a quarterly meeting at Reynoldsville, Jefferson Co., the other day, says the Jersey City Advertiser of Jan. 4. An invitation was given for persons to come forward for prayer; a large number presented themselves, and the congregation pressed forward to see the proceedings, when the joists under the floor gave way, and about one hundred and fifty persons, men, women, and children, were precipitated into the cellar, in a heap, with a glowing stove in the center. Several were injured more or less—four being badly burned. One has since died.

Naval Force of Great Britain.—The following is the official return of the present naval force of the United Kingdom: The royal navy consists of 671 ships of war, either in ordinary or in commission, varying from 2 to 120 guns each; of this number 178 are armed steamers, of from 100 to 800 horse power engines, constructed on the most approved principles for active sea service. This fleet, the largest of any maratime power on the globe, employs in time of peace, 35,000 to 40,000 able bodied seamen, 2,000 strong lads, and 13,000 Royal Marines, consisting of 102 companies, divided into four divisions.

Sentence of Jack Wade.—Jack Wade, an individual who for several years past has maintained an unenviable notoriety on account of his known character as a most adroit burgler and thief, and who recently pleaded guilty in the Court of Common Pleas at Dedham, to an indictment charging him with breaking into and robbing the Dorchester and Milton Bank in June last of $82,000, was brought before the Court yesterday, and sentenced to sixteen years' hard labor in the State Prison at Charlestown, the first seven days to be in solitary confinement. Brooks, convicted of receiving a portion of the stolen money, knowing the same to have been stolen, was sentenced to three years' hard labor in the State Prison, the first three days to be in solitary confinement. An enormous mass of Zinc Ore from the mines of the New Jersey Exploring and Mining Co., N. J. recently passed through New York City, to the Navy Yard, Brooklyn, to be sent to the London Exhibition. It is the pure red oxyde of Zinc, which is found no where else in the world but in Sussex County, N. J. The dimensions are five feet long and between three and four feet broad and deep, the weight being 16,400 lbs., or nearly eight tons.

We learn from the Peoria (Ill.) Press of the 18th ult., that in consequence of the arrest of the person who in all probability planned the murder of Hewitt, the Sheriff has been officially ordered to postpone the execution of Brown and Williams until the 15th of January. In case the chief villian should be convicted, these young men will, in all probability, have their sentence commuted to imprisonment for a long term in the penitentiary.

SUMMARY.

A telegraphic dispatch dated Baltimore, Sunday, Jan. 5, says: A dealer in Jewelry, from Boston, named A. C. Mosher, was decoyed from the Theater to the suburbs of the City last evening by a gang of genteel thieves, who knocked him down, rifled his pockets, and then left him apparently dead. Several severe cuts were inflicted on his person with bowie knives. The wounds, however, are not very dangerous. Six of the robbers who committed the act have been arrested, and identified by the injured man.

The Boston Traveler says of the trade of the West India Islands with Boston, next to Cuba comes the Island of Hayti. During the year 1850, 288 vessels arrived here from ports in Cuba, and 145 from ports in Hayti. The largest number from any other West India Island was from St. Martin's, 29; and the total number from all the West India Islands, save Cuba and Hayti, was 98, or 47 less than from Hayti alone.

The freight agent at the Herkimer depot on the Schenectady and Utica Railroad states that 3,164,000 pounds of cheese has been received at that station and transported to eastern markets the present season, from the 1st day of March to the 1st day of December. NEW PICTORIAL WORKS,

NO. 128 NASSAU STREET, NEW YORK.

American Gift Books for 1851.

AGENTS ARE WANTED to circulate the following new and useful Works—(Retail Price, $2 50 per vol.)—a new and complete

PICTORIAL HISTORY OF CHINA AND INDIA:

With a Descriptive Account of those Countries and their Inhabitants, from the earliest period of authentic history to the present time, in which the Editor has treated not only of the Historical Events, but also of the Manners, Customs, Religion, Literature, and Domestic Habits of the People of those immense Empires.

The Embellishments are about two hundred, and of the first order, illustrating whatever is peculiar to the inhabitants, regarding their Dress, Domestic Occupations, their mode of Agriculture, Commercial Pursuits, Arts, &c. They are accurate, and each one has been made expressly for the Work.

The volume forms a large octavo, containing between five and six hundred pages, printed in the best style, and on good substantial white paper. It is furnished to Agents, handsomely bound in muslin, gilt, or leather, as the purchaser may prefer, at a very liberal discount, when quantities of not less than twenty copies are ordered at one time.

THRILLING INCIDENTS OF THE WARS OF THE U. S.:

Comprising the most striking and remarkable events of the Revolution, the French War, the Tripolitan War, the Indian War, the Second War with Great Britain, and the Mexican War; with three hundred engravings!

660 pp. Octavo; retail price, $2 50 per volume. Orders respectfully solicited.

SEARS' PICTORIAL FAMILY PUBLICATIONS

Are decidedly the best books that Agents can possibly employ their time in supplying to the people of the United States. They are valuable for reference, and should be possessed by every family in this great Republic. There is not a city or town in these United States, even those of small importance, but contains many citizens to whom these works are indispensable. They are adapted to the literary wants of the Christian, the Patriot, the Statesman, and the Domestic Circle—got up in a superior style of art and workmanship; and are not only such books as will sell, but such as an Agent of good principles will feel free to recommend, and willing to see the purchaser again, after they have been bought.

OUR PLAN.

The plan the Publisher has so successfully carried out for several years, is obtaining responsible men as Agents, who are well known in their own Counties, Towns, and Villages, and have time and disposition to circulate good and instructive books among their neighbors and friends. Any person wishing to embark in the enterprise will risk little by sending to the Publisher $25 or $50, for which he will receive an assortment as he may direct, at the wholesale cash prices.

☞ Enterprising and active men of respectability and good address, would do well to engage in the sale of the above volumes; and all Postmasters, Clergymen, Book Peddlars, and Newspaper Agents, are respectfully requested to act as our Agents. A handsome remuneration allowed to all who engage in their sale. For particulars, address, post-paid,

ROBERT SEARS,
128 Nassau-st., N. Y.

To Publishers of Newspapers throughout the U. S.

* * Newspapers copying this advertisement entire, well displayed, as above, without any alteration or abridgement, (including this notice,) and giving it one or more insertions, shall receive a copy of any one of our $2 50 or $3 works, (subject to their order,) by sending direct to the Publisher.

☞ No letter will be taken from the office unless post-paid.

Miscellaneous.

Mr. Whitney's Plan of a Railroad to the Pacific.

This plan has been favorably reported on by committees of four successive Congresses, including the thirty first; the Legislatures of twenty States of the Union have recommended it; the people of the United States in various forms have very extensively expressed their views and feelings in its favor; and the voice of the public press has been almost unanimous in the same opinion. It may be pertinent, to give a succinct view of the plan, as contained in the two reports lately presented to both Houses of Congress by the committes of each on roads and canals.

Mr. Whitney's plan is peculiar, but nevertheless simple, and can easily be understood. It proposes to set apart a belt of the public domain sixty miles wide, or thirty miles on each side of the road, from its eastern terminus, on Lake Michigan, to its western terminus, on the Pacific, comprehending an area of about 78,000,000 acres, for which ten cents per acre of the avails of the land, including the good, bad and indifferent, is to be paid into the public treasury, amounting to nearly $8,000,000. As only about 800 miles of the 2,030 miles in length is good land, or adapted to agriculture, and as our public policy is now rapidly tending to give away the public domain instead of selling it, as heretofore, it is sufficiently evident that this sum of $8,000,000, to be paid into the national treasury, is more than would ever be realized by the Government for the people in any other way. It is estimated that the land-warrants bestowed on the soldiers of the Mexican War, and the bounty-land bill for soldiers of the war of 1812, and of our Indian wars, which has now become a law, will together cover as much territory as is required to build this road. The Whitney plan, therefore, is the only way to save any land for this great purpose, and probably the only way by which any more lands can be saved for any national object whatever.

Mr. Whitney engages, and is required by the bill reported for the purpose, to build the road out of the lands set apart for the object, besides the $8,000,000 to be paid into the public treasury.

It is shown by the reports of the committee that the road, running through these lands, will impart a value to them adequate to the accomplishment of these ends. In this manner a capital is to be created out of the land to build the road by the effect of the road on its value, without one dollar of cost to the people or to the public treasury. The bill also provides that, when the road shall be completed, no tolls shall ever be imposed except to keep the road and its machinery in working order. As the lands are to build the road, there will be no stock, and of course no dividends. It is this great principle of cheap transport, thus brought into force, that will draw and accumulate trade on this line to an indefinite and immense amount, for ever augmenting, between the Atlantic and Pacific portions of the United States, between the United States and Asia, and between Europe and Asia. It will be seen by an examination and measurement of the globe, that this connection will bring into the most intimate commercial contact the great industrial and producing masses of mankind; and the cheap transport to be effected by this scheme, and which can only be done by this, will turn this immense commercial intercourse in this direction. All other plans, instead of creating the capital to build the road with, must borrow it, and consequently will be subject to tolls to satisfy the interest of such capitol, preventing trade by the tax imposed, instead of inviting it by cheap transport; or else they will be doomed to a stupendous failure—in any case a failure. The cost of the road on the Whitney plan is estimated at $60,000,000, all to be raised out of the lands; the cost, if built by the Government, is estimated at $200,000,000, all to be borrowed instead of being created.

Mr. Whitney expects to be able to complete it in fifteen years. The proposed law gives him twenty-five. All the capital required to go on with lies in abeyance to the passage of the bill, as the security of a lien on the rights to be conferred by the law would be abundant. There is no other way in which the road can be soon begun and completed.

Nutrition in Various Grains.

Wheat is one of the most important of all crops. The grain contains from fifty to seventy per cent. of starch, from ten to twenty per cent. of gluten, and from three to five per cent. of fatty matter. The proportion of gluten is said to be largest in the grain of warm countries. It is a singular fact, that in all the seed of wheat and other grains, the principal part of the oil lies near or in the skin, as also does a large portion of the gluten. The bran owes to this much of its nutritive and fattening qualities. Thus, refining our flour to the utmost possible extent, we diminish somewhat its value for food. The phosphates of the ash also lie to great degree in the skin. The best fine flour contains about seventy pounds of starch to each hundred. The residue of one hundred pounds consists of ten or twelve pounds of gluten, six to eight pounds of sugar and gum, and ten to fourteen pounds of water, and a little oil.

Rye flour more nearly resembles wheaten flour in its composition than any other; it has, however, more of certain gummy and sugary substances, which make it tenacious, and also impart a sweetish taste. In baking all grains and roots which have much starch in them, a certain change takes place in their chemical composition. . . . By baking, flour becomes more nutritious, and more easily digestible, because more soluble.

Barley contains rather less starch than wheat, also less sugar and gum. There is little gluten, but a substance somewhat like it, and containing about the same amount of nitrogen.

Oats.—Oatmeal is little used as food in this country, but it is equal, if not superior, in its nutritious qualities, to flour from any of the other grains; superior, I have no doubt, to most of the fine wheaten flour of northern latitudes. It contains from ten to eighteen per cent. of a body having about the same amount of nitrogen or gluten. Besides this, there is a considerable quantity of sugar and gum, and from five to six per cent. of oil or fatty matter, which may be obtained in the form of a clear fragrant liquid. Oatmeal cakes owe their peculiar agreeable taste and smell to this oil. Oatmeal, then, has not only an abundance of substance containing nitrogen, but is also fattening. It is, in short, an excellent food for working animals, and has been abundantly proved in Scotland, for workingmen also.

Buckwheat is less nutritious than the other grains which we have noticed. Its flour has from six to ten per cent. of nitrogenous compounds, about fifty per cent of starch, and from five to eight sugar and gum. In speaking of buckwheat or of oats, we of course mean without husks.

Rice was formerly supposed to contain little nitrogen; but recent examinations have shown that there is a considerable portion, some six or eight per cent. of a substance of gluten. The percentage of fatty matter and of sugar is quite small, but that of starch much larger than in any grain yet mentioned, being between eighty and ninety per cent.; usually about eighty two.

Indian Corn is the last of grains that we shall notice. This contains about sixty per cent. of starch, nearly the same as oats. The proportion of oil and gum is large, about ten per cent.; this explains the fattening properties of Indian meal so well known to practical men. There is besides these a good portion of sugar. The nitrogenous substances are also considerable in quantity, some twelve to sixteen per cent. All these statements are from the prize essay of Mr. J. H. Salisbury, published by the New York State Agricultural Society. They show that the results of the European chemists have probably been obtained by the examination of varieties inferior to ours; they have not placed Indian corn much above the level of buckwheat or rice, whereas, from the above, it is seen to be "in most respects superior to any other grain."

Sweet Corn differs from all other varieties, containing only about eighteen per cent. of starch. The amount of sugar is, of course very large; the nitrogenous substances amount to the very large proportion of twenty per cent.; of gum, to thirteen or fourteen; and of oil, to about eleven. This, from the above results, is one of the most nourishing crops grown. If it can be made to yield as much per acre as the hardest varieties, it is well worth a trial on a large scale.—Prof. Norton's Elements of Scientific Agriculture.

Life in North Carolina.

Rev. Wm. S. Balch, a Universalist clergyman of New York, is preaching down in North Carolina, and has written home to the 'Christian Messenger' some notes of his travels. The following is his account of his first day's journey through the heart of the State, after leaving the Railroad at Goldsborough:

"After breakfast, I started in an open buggy for Kinston; I saw by the map that it lay in the line to this place. Nobody at Goldsborough, nor the Conductor or Superintendent of the Railroad, who was along, could tell me the distance, nor the way to get here. So I had to start at a hazard, with a "boy," which means here a slave, and a small, miserable looking horse. Goldsborough has a little Court House, and a dozen or two dwellings and slave huts, scattered among the pine trees in the wildest imaginable confusion. A little way out I saw a small, dingy building; the "boy" said it was a school house. We passed on, and such a road, and such a country, and such houses, and such people, and such a day! Oh! heavens! I did not expect to see all this in "the sunny and chivalrous South." These scattered plantations, with a few wretched log huts, dropped down in the edge of the woods, all open and dirty and comfortless cabins! Ireland! why Irish mud-hovels are palaces of comfort compared with many of them, for they are dry and warm. Their thick walls and thatched roofs protect the starved inmates from the chill night and drenching rains. These do neither. But these are negroes? No, not all of them; for I saw some whites in as wretched a plight as I ever saw in Ireland or Italy—one family, a few miles out from Goldsborough, which for destitution surpassed anything I ever beheld or dreamed of in my life. The "boy" stopped to water his horse. For an excuse I stepped to the door to borrow a cup for some drink. Two flaxen-haired boys about the door, one it might be five, and the other three, with what were shirts once, hanging on their shoulders, and stringing in rags down to their hips, constituted all their clothing, and the day was chill and wet. Inside was an infant, 8 or 9 months old, dressed as the others, and lying on the nasty floor. On the bench of a loom, standing near the fire, was sitting the tall figure, or rather shadow of a woman. She left her loom and went to the dresser and took down the only tea-cup, and handed it to me. I regarded her pale, cadaverous visage, as she lifted her sunken eyes to me, for an instant, with a shudder of horror, as when one sees unexpectedly a human skeleton stand up before him; and I shrunk from her with similar feelings. I could not speak. I took the cup from her attenuated fingers, and went to the well—a hole dug in the ground, six or eight feet deep, with no stick or stone to curb it, exept above the ground. As I returned it, I noticed a young woman sitting in the corner of the fire-place, close down to the fire as if shaking with the ague. Such a picture of destitution and misery I did not see in Kerry, Clare, or Galway. The nearest approach to it I saw in Tivoli near Rome.

I have not time to describe other scenes, but pass on through holes of shallow mud, from one to ten rods long, ford small streams meeting once in a long distance, some pale sickly, ragged, wretched looking man, now and then a negro, some on the backs of small poor horses, which are harnessed into old carts botched up of round pine sticks, on which are single barrels of pitch. In some cases I met similar carts with a single ox harnessed in—not cows as are seen in Germany. In a few cases I saw men on horseback; but met but two carriages, and the stage, with one passenger in it, in all day, and a journey of 34 miles."

A Literal Servant.—"Please, marm, and what shall I do with the bits of candles?"

"Take them down stairs and burn them in the kitchen, Bridget."

Off she started. At night Bridget called the lady and asked for a candle for the kitchen.

"A candle—why! what have you done with those pieces you had this morning?"

"Faith, marm, I put them in the fire and burned them in the kitchen, as ye tould me this mornin'!"

PROCRASTINATIONS.

BY CHARLES MACAY.

If fortune with a smiling face
Strew roses on our way,
When shall we stoop to pick them up?
To-day, my love, to day.
But should she frown with face of care,
And talk of coming sorrow,
When shall we grieve, if grieve we must?
To-morrow, love, to-morrow.

If those who've wronged us own their faults,
And kindly pity pray,
When shall we listen and forgive?
To-day, my love, to-day.
But, if stern Justice urge rebuke,
And warmth from memory borrow,
When shall we chide—if chide we dare?
To-morrow, love, to-morrow.

If those to whom we owe a debt,
Are harmed unless we pay,
When shall we struggle to be just?
To-day, my love, to-day.
But if our debtor fail our hope,
And plead his ruin thorough,
When shall we weigh his breach of faith?
To-morrow, love, to-morrow.

If love, estranged, should once again
Her genial smile display,
When shall we kiss her proffered lips?
To-day, my love, to-day.
But, if she would indulge regret,
Or dwell with bygone sorrow,
When shall we weep—if weep we must?
To-morrow, love, to morrow.

For virtuous acts and harmless joys
The minutes will not stay;
We've always time to welcome them,
To-day, my love, to-day.
But care, resentment, angry words,
And unavailing sorrow,
Come far too soon, if they appear
To-morrow, love, to-morrow.

Danish Farm-Houses.

The Danish farm-steadings are almost uniformly built in the form of a square—a fashion which has descended from the time of the old Scandinavians, whose principle it was to construct their habitations toward the four cardinal points or quarters of the heavens. One side is occupied by the dwelling-house, generally with one or two hinds'-houses attached; the other two by the stable, cow-house, and sheep stalls; the fourth by a barn. At the back is generally a kitchen-garden, with fruit-trees and flowers. The stack-yard, filled with stacks, which generally have a much more ragged and untidy appearance than those of English build, stands at the side. The whole is surrounded by a rough stone wall, the materials for which have generally been obtained from the granite bolders once plentifully scattered over the surface of Denmark, most of which have been removed and broken up for roads and buildings. In barren and thinly populated districts, these homesteads have much the appearance of islands in the midst of a sea of corn or pasture. Long, low and narrow, with whitewashed walls and thatched roofs, they exactly resemble the old style in which the Scottish farm-houses used to be built. The court-yard inside generally contains a heap of manure from the byres. In the homesteads of large farms of modern erection, the square form is only adopted when it happens to be the most convenient for the locality; but both single homesteads and hamlets containing perhaps twenty different farm houses, of older date, are always laid out strictly on a quadrangular plan. There is slovenliness enough observable both outside and in the cattle-houses; the buildings, too, have stood the storms of a century or two in most cases, and wear not unfrequently a rather rickety look. Inside you will find plenty to eat and drink, and a rude but not uncomfortable style of housekeeping. The rooms consist of a sitting-room—sometimes also answering the purposes of a bedroom—one or two sleeping-rooms, and a kitchen; the deal floor is sanded, but rarely or never carpeted. The more substantial class of small proprietors, possessing from 200 to 300 acres of land, furnish their houses with as much elegance as people of the corresponding rank in England. Carpets, a few books and musical instruments, are found in them, and your host will produce you a bottle of capital claret, which does not cost so much here as at home.

Ohio Wine.

We take from the Richmond Age the following statements of several vineyards in that neighborhood. New Richmond is about twenty miles from Cincinnati, in Clermont County, on the north bank of the Ohio. It is a flourishing place of 1,700 inhabitants, and there are many vineyards in the vicinity. The Age says:—

Mr. George Weire, of this neighborhood, has made this season 4,800 gallons Catawba wine, from eight acres of land. Over six hundred gallons to the acre. Judges say it is a superior article.

Thomas Williamston, we are told, has made over 1,300 gallons, the precise amount we have not learned.

William Carnes made nearly 70 gallons on two and a half acres, first year's bearing.

Charles Buckheart made 150 gallons on a little over an acre of ground, first year's bearing.

Michael Male made 240 gallons on two acres, first year.

Benjamin Light, about 1,700 gallons on three acres.

Peter Light, about 1,700 gallons on three acres.

This makes in all 9,660 gallons, including Mr. John Williamson's. This, at the lowest price offered, will make $6,480.

The whole amount of ground, it will be seen, is twenty-two acres, and the net product per acre about $300. We are not told the cost of cultivation, but we believe it is not one third the value of the product. [Chron.

Imaginary Hydrophobia.

In a memoir of a learned professor is found recorded a strange case of imaginary hydrophobia. A Lucchese peasant shooting sparrows, saw his dog attacked by a strange and ferocious mastiff. He tried to separate the animals, and received a bite from his own dog, which instantly ran off through the fields. The wound was healed in a few days, and the dog was not found; and the peasant, after some time, began to feel symptoms of a nervous agitation. He conceived that the dog, from disappearing, was mad; and within a day or two after this idea struck him, he began to feel symptoms of hydrophobia. They grew hourly more violent; he raved, and had all the evidence of this most violent distemper. As he laid with the door open to let in the last air that he was to breathe, he heard his dog bark. The animal ran up to his bedside and frolicked about the room. It was clear that he, at least, was in perfect health. The peasant's mind was relieved instantly; he got up with renewed strength, dressed himself, plunged his head into a basin of water, and thus refreshed, walked into the room to his astonished family. It is not improbable that many attacks of a disease so strongly dependent on the imagination might equally be cured by ascertaining the state of the animal by which the bite was given.

Opium Eating.

It is said that opium eating is ruinously indulged in by the people of the United States. Let those who use the wretched drug in any shape, read the following, and take warning by the horrible description:

"A writer on India, who was a constant witness of its terrible effects, draws a startling picture of the horrible sensations to which the opium eater subjects himself. In two years from the time he commences its use he must expect to die, and a death most most terrible, and which makes one shudder to think of. After the habit becomes confirmed the countenance presents an ashy paleness—the eyes assume a wild brightness—the memory fails—the gait totters—mental and moral courage sinks, and frightful marasmus or atrophy reduces the victim to a ghastly spectre; a living skeleton. There is no slavery of body and mind equal to that of the opium taker. Once habituated to its doses as a fictitious stimulant, everything will be endured rather than the privation of it, and the unhappy victim endures all the consciousness of his own degraded state, while he is ready to sell all he has in the world—to part with family and friends—rather than surrender the use of this fatal drug—this transient delight. The pleasurable sensations and imaginative ideas arising at first, soon pass away: appalling pictures of death—spectres of fearful visage, haunt the mind: the light of heaven is converted into the gloom of hell: sleep, 'balmy sleep,' flies forever; night succeeds day, to be clothed in never-ending horrors—incessant sickness—vomiting and total derangement of the digestive organs ensue, and death at last relieves the victim of this sensual enjoyment."

A Miser and his Will.

Peter Thelluson was a London banker, whose ruling passion was an inordinate love of money. He died in July, 1797, worth upwards of £700,000, and by his singular will, after bequeathing to his wife and children about £100,000, directed that the residue of his property should be invested in the purchase of estates, to accumulate until such time as all his children, and the male children of his sons and grandsons, shall die, and then the lineal male descendants, who must bear the name of Thelluson, shall inherit in three equal lots—the number of his sons—thus creating, prospectively, three large landed estates. In case of failure of male descendants, the estates to be sold, and the proceeds applied towards paying off the national debt. Many attempts were made to upset the singular and unjust will; but they all failed. It has been calculated, that ninety or a hundred years from the date of the will must elapse before the lineal male descendants can take possession of the property; and if, during that period, the sums of money left by the testator could have been invested at five per cent. compound interest, they would amount to more than £70,000,000 sterling. No more wills of this kind can be made, for Act 4, Geo. IV, limits the power of bequest to a life or lives in being, and twenty one years after the death of the survivor.

Steam and Stame.

The Newark Daily Advertiser states, that Mr. James Frost recently delivered a lecture on the discovery of a new element called stame, which is produced from steam.

He showed that it required but four degrees of heat, applied to steam, to double a volume of it, heated apart from water; and but sixteen degrees of heat to treble a volume of it, heated apart from water. This substance, thus acquired from the heating of steam, is denominated stame, and is considered a distinct chemical element, more economical and immensely greater in value than steam. Mr. Frost pointed out a vast variety of uses to which a motive power so economical could be put, particularly its applicability to locomotives or coaches on common and plank roads.

The general results showed that more than six times the motive force was realized from equal quantities of heat and water, when employed to actuate the engine with heated steam, or stame, than was obtained from the use of natural steam—each being alike produced from the same constant fire and time, and same engine, which engine, apparatus and scientific instruments, are described in his work; and testimonials of competent and respectable engineers are open for inspection. Mr. Frost had a working model in the room, and gave actual experiments of the proposition he advanced.

Stumbling Horses.—It is a general but very mistaken notion, that the safety of a roadster depends upon his lifting his fore-feet high from the ground, whereas it all depends on the manner in which he places them down upon it. The highest goers are often the most unsafe; and there are thousands of instances of horses going very near the ground and never making a trip. It is, however, a well established fact, that if the form of a horse's shoulder, and the consequent position of the fore-leg, enable him to put his foot to the ground flat, with the heel down, his lifting the foot high is not at all necessary; whereas, on the other hand, if, by any improper position of the leg, issuing out of a short, upright, ill-formed shoulder, the toe touches the ground first, and, as it were, digs into it; no matter how high such a horse may lift his legs, in any of his paces he will be liable to stumble.—Essay on the Horse.

A Ship Sunk by a Waterspout.—A fearful accident recently happened to the Maltese brig Lady Flora, which vessel left Malta on the 14th of October for Leghorn. On the same day, about 9 P. M., when about thirty miles to the west of Gozo, she was struck by a waterspout, and immediately foundered. One man alone was saved by the brig Maltese, which was near, but all endeavors to save more of the hapless crew were fruitless. About nine men, among whom were the owner of the brig and his son, have thus met a watery grave, the greater number leaving widows and families in great distress.

Adventure of a Spanish Aeronaut.—A Mr. Orlandi made a balloon ascension at Barcelona on the 27th ult. As no news was obtained of him for two days, great uneasiness was felt lest he should have met with the same unhappy fate as Monsieur Arban. He had, however a very narrow escape of his life. The balloon was wafted over the snow-covered mountains of Valivadrera where it was enveloped in a thick mist, now and then pierced by lightning. The intrepid aeronaut was covered with a thick coating of hail, that fell incessantly. Having ascended above the cloud, he caught another glimpse of the sun, and, seeing that the wind was changed in a south-westerly direction, he resolved to descend to the earth, which he could not in the least distinguish. The wind drove the balloon with terrible velocity, and at last it fell into the sea, where M. Orlandi, holding fast by the ropes, managed to keep himself above the water during three hours, when he was washed on shore at ten at night, his balloon being carried out to sea again. After two hours spent on the cold sand he recovered his strength sufficiently to get up and look out for shelter. He was stopped by one of the coast guard, who had like to have shot him as a smuggler or bandit, but who recognized him as the man of the balloon, took him to a village, and put him to bed.

What's in a Name?—They tell a laughable story of the late Indian sub-agent at Fort Snelling, and an excellent officer, to this effect—that when the Major first met the Indians at Fort Snelling, he introduced himself to their acquaintance as follows: "Tell them, Mr. Prescott, [interpreter,] that I am their father—that I am Major Murphy, the Big Potato." Mr. Prescott accordingly said to the Indians, "This is your father, Mendo Tonka," [big potato.] The Indians grunted out an admiring ugh! and shook the Major very cordially by the hand. When Major McLean, Murphy's successor, was introduced to the Indians, Mr. Prescott was not instructed to inform the Indians what McLean's name was, but they, taking it for granted that he, too, must be one of the Potato family, sent to supply their necessities, called him—probably with reference to his personal contrast to Major Murphy—their "father Mendo Chistina," [small potato]—and the Sioux, in Dakota, now uniformly call him "the Small Potato."

A Hard Hit.—A plain spoken woman recently visited a married woman, and said to her, "How do you contrive to amuse yourself?"

"Amuse!" said the other, staring; "do you not know that I have my house-work to do?"

"Yes," said the other, "I see you have it to do, but as it is never done, I concluded you must have some other way of passing your time."

Variety.

'Tis sweet on a winter's night at home, to sit by fire and tapers; but ah! it is a wiser thing, by far, to read the papers. Won't you take the papers? Can't you take the papers? The joys of heart are little worth, unless you take the papers. Maidens, waiting lovers true, you must take the papers. Swains who would not idle woo, you must take the papers! Won't you take the papers? Love's joys below, you'll never know, unless you take the papers.

Hon. Edward Stuart Wartley and Hon. W. Coke, of Queen Victoria's Guards, arrived at St. Louis on the 21st November from St. Paul. They have been absent for five months, on a hunt in the buffalo ranges of the Red river of the North. Their party was unusually successful in the chase, having killed in a single drive two hundred buffalo cows. The party was composed of about eighty horsemen, mostly half breeds.

Professor Johnson, of St. Louis, has discovered a method, it is said, by which ropes can be rendered indestructible by fire. The process is stated to be very simple, and so cheap that the commonest fabric can be prepared with it, and its use be made universal. Wood for the lining of safes, prepared by this process, possesses a perfect resistance to a fire capable of melting the cast iron, and burning out the wrought metal enclosing it.

Mrs. Eliza W. Farnham, formerly matron of the Sing Sing prison, and the projector of a partially successful scheme of female emigration to California, has become the proprietor of a fine farm near San Francisco, the crops of which are worth $60,000. The California Courier gives an account of a judgment obtained by her in one of the courts in San Francisco, against Joseph S. Ruckle, for $3,661 27.

The State House, now building at Columbus, the capital of Ohio, is to be 304 feet long by 184 wide. The height of the walls, to the top of the blocking course, will be 62 feet; to the top of the rotunda, 140 feet. A great part of the labor upon the edifice is done by convicts. When completed it will be one of the handsomest structures in the United States.

The sale of intoxicating liquors has been prohibited by statute in Connecticut. It is absolute unless such liquors are to be used for medical, chemical, and mechanical purposes.

A person in New York has engaged to build a yacht of 150 to 180 tons, to be ready to sail during the World's Fair in London, and to beat any vessel brought against her, or the builder is to receive no compensation for his labor; otherwise he receives $30,000.

Massachusetts has 994,665 inhabitants by the census just completed—an increase of 256,966 since the census of 1840. This is at the rate of nearly 35 per cent., or more than double the average increase of the five preceding terms of ten years each.

The Indian Department at Washington has offered a reward of $1000, for the redemption or recovery of the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. M. White, now supposed to be in captivity with the Apache Indians in New Mexico.

Two sailors, named Thomas Read and Edward Clements, convicted at Richmond, Va., of Piracy, have been sentenced to be hung on the 31st January.

Two-dollar bills of the Manhattan bank, in this city, have been fraudulently altered to tens, and are in circulation.

Navigation on the Mississippi river, is entirely suspended above the mouth of the Illinois.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year of this Seminary, for 1850 and '51, will commence the third Wednesday in August, and continue forty-four weeks, including a short recess between the terms, and one of ten days for the winter holidays.

The year is divided into three terms:—

The first, of 14 weeks, begins Wednesday, August 21st, and ends Wednesday, November 27th.

The second, of 15 weeks, begins Monday, December 2d, and ends Friday, March 14th.

The third, of 14 weeks, begins Tuesday, March 18th and ends Tuesday, June 24th.

Board of Instruction.

GURDON EVANS, A. M., President,
And Professor of Mathematics and Natural Science.

Rev. JOSEPH W. MORTON,
Professor of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, Spanish, and Moral and Intellectual Science.

Mrs. SUSANNA M. SPICER, Preceptress.

ADOLPH ROSENHAYN,
(Late of Friedrick Wilhelm College, Berlin,)
Teacher of German, Piano Forte, and Assistant in Greek and Latin.

Other competent Teachers will be employed as occasion may demand.

TEACHERS' CLASSES will be formed, as usual, at the beginning of the Fall and middle of the Winter Terms, and continue seven weeks.

In the Common Branches, classes will be formed at the commencement of each term; but in the higher, the interest of the student, as well as the welfare of the Institution, demand that a more systematic course of study be pursued.

In the Natural Sciences, Elementary Chemistry and Philosophy will be pursued during the Fall Term Agricultural Chemistry, Astronomy, and Physiology during the Winter Term; Botany and Geology during the Summer Term.

Classes will be formed in Latin, French, and German, at the commencement of the Fall Term; in Hebrew, Greek, and Spanish, at the commencement of the Winter Term, and continue through the course of study.

In Mathematics, Geometry is studied in the Fall, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, and Astronomy, Surveying, Navigation, &c., in the Summer Term

The course of instruction in Agriculture is thorougly scientific, embracing study and recitation in the best authors. Instruction is given in a well-furnished laboratory, in the analysis of soils, ashes of plants, manures, &c. and the modes of testing for their constituent elements. The attention of farmers who wish to give their sons a practical education is especially called to this department.

Board in private families, from $1 25 to $1 50. Many students board in clubs for 60 to 75 cents.

Tuition—to be settled upon entering school—from $3 00 to $5 00. Extras—For Drawing, $1 00; Oil Painting, $5 00; Chemical Experiments, $1 00; Writing, including stationery, 50 cents; Piano Forte, $8 00; Use of Instrument, $2 00; Agricultural Chemistry, including chemicals, apparatus, and fuel, (breakage extra,) $12 00.

It is very desirable that students should enter at the beginning of the term; yet they are received into classes already formed at any time.

For farther information, address Gurdon Evans, J. W. Morton, or Rev. J. R. Irish, President of the Corporation.

MAN—TIME—IMPROVEMENT.

Our life is a dream;
Our time, as a stream,
Glides swiftly away,
And the fugitive moment refuses to stay:
The arrow is flown:
The moment is gone;
The millennial year
Rushes on to our view, and eternity 's near.

Man is a mysterious being, placed in a world of ever-varying relations, and mysteriously connected with those relations. As an animal, he is allied to the humblest worm that creeps in the dust. As man, he is a being inherently noble. His nobility arises not from outward circumstances of fame or fortune, but from his inward powers of mind. These make him a being of thoughts, emotions, desires, passions, and determinations—a being possessing moral capacities, capable of religious emotions and aspirations—capabilities that ally him to Deity. Thus constituted, man is ushered into the world, and becomes an active or passive participant in the mazy drama of life. How varied are the scenes of this drama! To some it is surcharged with grief and anxious care. They are tossed, through long days and nights, in the brazen arms of some dire disease, bowed beneath a griping poverty, scourged by the oppressor's lash, ground down by his iron heel, or pierced with the scorpion stings of a guilty conscience. To others, how bounteous of bliss it appears—joy's cup how full! How many, launched at ease upon the whirlpool of delusive pleasure, in life's fragile bark, are carelessly sailing, in converging circles, over its eddying waves. How many are offering their daily sacrifice at mammon's shrine! How many make the ocean their home, and speed their way over its surging billows in quest of golden fleece or fairy land! How many are thus threading the mazy labyrinths marked out by folly's brain! Yet a few there are who seem to have a nobler purpose in view—seem to recognize the true end of life, having received of the peace, wisdom, salvation, that cometh down from above; while a very few, moved by an impulse far above that impelling the mass of mankind, have left their homes, friends, native country, and, by aid of ocean waves, as mercy's chariot, have carried the olive branch of heavenly peace to heathen lands.

Man sees himself running to and fro along the shores of the boundless ocean of eternity, whose silent waves are resistlessly washing away his foothold on life. He would fain strive to stay their action; but the vainness of such an attempt alternately startles and depresses his spirits. He looks to the past with regret for the follies and foibles, sin and ignorance, which have marked his pathway. The present is an ever-changing pivot, on which he continually but vainly endeavors to balance himself. The future he is looking to with mingled emotions of hope and fear. He is continually impressed with the delinquencies of the past, the responsibilities of the present, and the uncertainty of the future; yet minutes, hours, days, weeks, months, years, glide imperceptibly away, unregarded, unimproved. When he has resolved to improve each moment as it flies, his resolution easily slips from his mind; or, if he holds to his resolution, he is prone to go to work without order, and each successive moment serves to wind him farther and farther in the inextricable labyrinths of an unarranged business. He feels at times, frequently feels, that it should not be thus—that it does not arise from the necessities of the case—that he would have it different. He "resolves and re-resolves," yet in the midst of his resolution, Time, with his scythe all crimsoned and gory with the blood of many generations, still right onward moves, and, regardless of the prayers of man, continues to turn a heavy swath, causing to arise shrieks and lamentations of blighted friendships, blasted hopes, and broken ties.

Happy is the man who, amid such circumstances, has learned "superior wisdom;" who has secured a hold on heaven by the golden chain of faith; who has determined to do with his might whatever he finds to do; who has awakened the latent inward power that looks earnestly and confidently forward to perfection, glory, and immortality. Such an one grasps each golden moment as it flies, and exchanges it for its equivalent in good done, character established, influence exerted. He makes winds, waves, storms, and sunshine, sickness and health, joy and sorrow, adversity and prosperity, friends and foes, labor and leisure, every thing, produce "the fruit of the spirit—love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance." When an individual thus determines, deliberately, resolutely, solemnly, and by divine assistance, to make the very best of the time and talents that are given to him, the transforming effect of such a resolution is wonderful. Industry, punctuality, perseverance, are manifested in all of his undertakings; virtue speaks forth in every action; the self-searching power of the soul is developed; the self-forming power is awakened; the undue development of the passions is restrained; intercourse with superior minds is cherished; he permits the wise, the great, the good of all past ages, to cross his threshold, and talk to him in their richest and choicest thoughts. The Bible becomes to him a constant light, guide, and companion. It matters not so much about the lowliness and degradation of his lot at the time of the awakening of his aspirations. The lowlier his lot, the brighter appears the day-star of perfection. However humble his situation, however small his talents, however limited his influence, whatever may be his career, all along the pathway of life he is laboring and waiting for the unfoldings of eternity to develop the full fruit of his labors, feeling that life is truly a school—a state of probation—the judgment, the day of examination, where every one shall be awarded according to his deeds. JASPER.

"Still achieving, still pursuing,"

LORD MORPETH ON AMERICA.

The Earl of Carlisle, best known in this country by his former title of Lord Morpeth, has lately appeared in the character of a popular lecturer, with great success, at the Mechanic's Institute and Literary Society of Leeds. His Lordship's first lecture was on the Works of Pope. The next evening the subject was America. We copy the more prominent portion of the lecture as follows:

It is my wish to touch very lightly upon any point which among us, among even some of us now here, may be matter of controversy. I, however, honestly think that the experience of the United States does not as yet enable them to decide on either side the argument between the established and voluntary systems in religion. Take the towns by themselves, and I think the voluntary principle appears fully adequate to satisfy all religious exigencies. Then it must be remembered that the class which makes the main difficulty elsewhere, scarcely, if at all, exists in America. It is the blessed privilege of the United States, and it is one which goes very far to counterbalance any drawbacks at which I may have to hint, that they really have not, as a class, any poor among them. A real beggar is what you never see. On the other hand, over their immense tracts of territory the voluntary [illegible] religious accommodation. It may, however, be truly questioned whether any establishment would be equal to that function. This is, however, one among the many questions which the republican experience has not yet solved. As matters stand at present, indifference to religion cannot fairly be laid to their charge. Probably religious extremes are pushed further than elsewhere. There certainly is a breadth and universality of religious liberty which I do not regard without some degree of envy.

The House of Representatives, the more popular branch of the Government, returned by universal suffrage, assemble in a chamber of very imposing appearance, arranged rather like a theater, in shape like the arc of a bow, but it is the worst room for hearing I ever was in; we hear complaints occasionally of our Houses of Parliament, old and new, but they are faultless in comparison. In parts of the house it is impossible to hear anybody, in others it answers all the purposes of a whispering gallery, and I have heard Members carry on a continuous dialogue while a debate was storming around them. Both in the Senate and the House every member has a most commodious arm-chair, a desk for his papers, and a spitting-box, to which he does not always confine himself. I went very often, and it was impossible to surpass the attention I received; some Member's seat in the body of the House was always given to me, and I was at liberty to remain there during the whole of the debate, or write my letters, as I chose. The palpable distinction between them and our House of Commons I should say to be this, we are more noisy, and they are more disorderly. They do not cheer, they do not cough, but constantly several are speaking at a time, and they evince a contemptuous disregard for the decisions of their Speaker. They have no recognized leaders of the different parties, the members of Government not being allowed to have seats in either House of Congress, and the different parties do not occupy distinct quarters in the Chamber, so that you may often hear a furious wrangle being carried on between two nearly contiguous members.

While I was at Washington, the question of Slavery, or at least of points connected with Slavery, gave the chief color and animation to the discussions in the House of Representatives. Old Mr. Adams, the ex-President of the United States, occupied, without doubt, the most prominent position; he presented a very striking appearance, standing up erect at the age of seventy-five, having once filled the highest post attainable by an American citizen, with trembling hands and eager eyes, in defense of the right of petition—the right to petition against the continuance of Slavery in the District of Columbia, with a majority of the House usually deciding against him, and a portion of it lashed into noise and storm. I thought it was very near being, and to some extent it was quite a sublime position; but it rather detracted from the grandeur of the effect, at least, that his own excitement was so great as to pitch his voice almost into a screech, and to make him more disorderly than all the rest. He put one in mind of a fine old gamecock, and occasionally showed great energy and power of sarcasm. I had certainly an opportunity of forming my opinion, as I sat through a speech of his that lasted three days; but then it is fair to mention that the actual sittings hardly last above three hours a day—about four, dinner is ready, and they go away for the day, differing much herein from our practice; and on this occasion they frequently allowed Mr. Adams to sit down to rest. All the time I believe he was not himself for the discontinuance of Slavery, even in the District of Columbia, but he contended that the Constitution had accorded the free right of petition for the dissolution of the Union, which raised a great tempest. Mr. Marshall of Kentucky, a fine and graceful speaker, moved a vote of censure upon him. Another member, whom I need not name, the ablest and fiercest champion whom I heard on the Southern or slaveholder side, made a most savage onslaught on Mr. Adams; then up got that "old man eloquent," and no one could have reproached him with not understanding how to speak even daggers. His brave but somewhat troublesome spirit has passed from the scenes upon which he played so conspicuous a part, but he has left behind him some words of fire, the sparks of which are not yet extinct. Nothing came of all this stir; I used to meet Mr. Adams at dinner while it went on, very calm and undisturbed. After seeing and hearing what takes place in some of these sittings, one is tempted to think that the Union must break up next morning; but the flame appeared generally to smoulder almost as quickly as it ignited. The debates in the Senate, during the same period, were dignified, business-like, and not very lively; so it may be judged which house had most attraction for the passing traveler.

I heard Mr. Clay in the Senate once, but every one told me that he was laboring under feebleness and exhaustion, so that I could only perceive the great man in the tones of his voice. I think this most attractive quality was more perceivable in private intercourse, as I certainly never met any public man, either in his country or in mine, always excepting Mr. Canning, who exercised such evident fascination over the minds and affections of his friends and followers as Henry Clay. I thought his society most attractive, easy, simple, and genial, with great natural dignity. If his countrymen make better men Presidents, I should applaud their virtue in resisting the spell of his eloquent attractions. When the actual list is considered, my respect for the discernment elicited by universal suffrage does not stand at a very high point.

Another great man, Daniel Webster, I could not hear in either House of Congress, because he then filled, as he does now, the high office of Secretary of State; but it is quite enough to look on his [illegible] massive forehead, to be assured that they are the abode of as much, if not more, intellect than any head you perhaps ever remarked. For many, if not for all reasons, I am well content that he should be again at the head of the American Cabinet, for I feel sure that while he is ever intensely American, he has an enlightened love of peace, and a cordial sympathy with the fortunes and glories of the old, as well as the new Anglo-Saxon stock.

The late Mr. Calhoun, who impressed most of those who were thrown in his way with a high opinion of his ability, his honesty, and I may add, his impracticability, I had not the good fortune to hear in public, or meet in private society. It is well known that his attachment to the maintenance of Slavery went so far as to lead him to declare that real freedom could not be maintained without it.

Among those who at that time contributed both to the credit and gaiety of the society of Washington, I cannot forbear from adding the name of Mr. Legare, then the Attorney-General of the Union, now unhappily, like too many of those whom I have had occasion to mention, no longer living. He appeared to me the best scholar, and the most generally accomplished man I met in all the Union. I may feel biased in his favor, for I find among my entries, "Mr. Legare spoke to-night of Pope as he ought."

I spent a fortnight at Charleston, the capital of South Carolina. This town and State may be looked upon as the head-quarters of the Slaveholding interest; and repeatedly, when they have thought the policy of the North too encroaching either upon questions relating to what they term their peculiar institutions, which is their euphonious description of Slavery, or when we should feel a juster sympathy with them upon questions relating to the protection of the Northern manufactures in opposition to a liberal commercial policy, they have not only held the very highest tone in favor of a dissolution of the Union, but have proceeded to overt acts of resistance. I am bound to say that I spent my time there very pleasantly. There was much gaiety and unbounded hospitality. I have made no disguise of what my opinions upon Slavery were, are, and ever must be; but it would be uncandid to deny that the planter in the Southern States has much more in his manner and mode of intercourse that resembles the English country gentleman than any other class of his countrymen; he is more easy, companionable, fond of country life and out of door pursuits. I went with a remarkably agreeable party to spend a day at the rice plantation of one of their chief proprietors; he had the credit of being an excellent manager, and his negroes, young and old, seemed well taken care of and looked after; he repelled the idea, not of educating them—that is highly penal by the law of the State—but of letting them have any religious instruction. I was told by others that there was considerable improvement in this respect. Many whom I met entertained no doubt that Slavery would subsist among them forever; others were inclined to think that it would wear out. While I was willing not to shut my eyes to any of the more favorable external symptoms or mitigations of Slavery, other indications could not come across my path without producing deep repugnance. On the very first night of my arrival I heard the deep sound of a curfew bell; on inquiry, I was told that after it had sounded every night at about nine o'clock, no colored person, slave or free—mark that!—might be seen in the streets. One morning, accordingly, I saw a great crowd of colored persons in the street, and I found they were waiting to see a large number of their color, who had been taken up the night before on their return from a ball, escorted in their ball dresses from the gaol to the court-house. Indeed, it was almost principally with relation to the free blacks that the anomalous and indefensible working of the system appeared there to develop itself. I was told that the slaves themselves looked down upon the free blacks and called them rubbish. I must not omit to state that I saw one slave auction in the open street, arising from the insolvency of the previous owner; a crowd stood round the platform, on which sat the auctioneer, and beside him were placed in succession the lots of from one to five negroes. The families seemed to be all put up together, but I imagine they must often be separated. They comprised infants and all ages. As far as I could judge, they exhibited great indifference to their changing destiny. I heard the auctioneer tell one old man, whom I could have hardly distinguished from a white person, that he had been bought by a good master. One could not help shuddering at the future lot of those who were not the subjects of this congratulation. In point of neatness, cleanliness, and order, the Slaveholding States appeared to stand in about the same relation to the Free as Ireland does to England; everything appears slovenly, ill-arranged, incomplete; windows do not shut, doors do not fasten; there is a superabundance of hands to do everything, and little is thoroughly done.

Passing from the physical to the moral atmosphere, amid all the vaunted equality of the American freemen, there seemed to be a more implicit deference to custom, a more passive submission to what is assumed to be the public opinion of the day or hour, than would be paralleled in many aristocratic or even despotic communities. This quiet acquiescence in the prevailing tone, this complete abnegation of individual sentiment, is naturally most perceptible in the domain of politics; but I thought that it also in no inconsiderable degree pervaded the social circle, biased the decisions of the judicial bench, and even infected the solemn teachings of the pulpit. To this source may probably, in some measure, be traced the remarkable similarity in the manners, deportment, conversation, and tone of feeling, which has so generally struck travelers from abroad in American society. Who that has seen, [illegible] forget the slow and [illegible] silence of the couples who walk arm in arm to the tables of the great hotels, or of the unsocial groups who gather round the greasy meals of the steamboats, lap up the five minutes meal, come like shadows, so depart? One of their able public men made an observation to me, which struck me as pungent, and perhaps true, that it was probably the country in which there was less misery and less happiness than in any other of the world.

If we ascend from social to political life, and from manners to institutions, we should find that the endless cycles of electioneering preparations and contests, although they may be carried on for the most part without the riotous turbulence or overt bribery by which they are sometimes too notoriously disgraced among ourselves, still leave no intermission for repose in the public mind; enter into all the relations of existence; subordinate to themselves every other question of internal and foreign policy; lead their public men, I will not say their best, but the average of them, to pander to the worst prejudices, the meanest tastes, the most malignant resentments of the people; at each change of administration incite the new rulers to carry the spirit of proscription into every department of the public service, from the Minister at some foreign court to the Postmaster of some half-barbarous outpost, thus tending to render those whose functions ought to withdraw them the most complhtely from party influences, the most unscrupulous partizans; and would make large masses welcome war and even acqiesce in ruin, if it appeared that they could thus counteract the antagonist tactics, humiliate the rival leader, or remotely influence the election of the next President.

THE FAMILY NEWSPAPER.

The silent influence of the religious newspaper in the family, and through thousands of families in the heart of the great community, is briefly stated by a writer unknown to us, in the following paragraph.

"A large portion of our best moral impressions and sentiments have been suggested, reiterated, and fastened on the mind by the family press. The pulpit does much; parental instruction in many cases does much; but the press is, in the present day, necessary to both. Let any reader of a well-conducted family paper open his paper, and consider thoughtfully its contents. There are in a single number sometimes from 150 to 200 separate and distinct articles, each one conveying an idea, a fact, or a sentiment, and stated or illustrated so as to produce an effect, in enlarging the reader's store of knowledge, or giving a right direction to thought, feeling, or action. Must not all this have its influence, and in the aggregate a mighty influence upon the reader? No reflecting man can fail to see that the fifty-two visits in a year of a carefully conducted paper, intelligent, correct, elevated in its moral tone, and withal interesting in its contents, must exert a great and blessed influence upon domestic life. Children growing up under such influences, are far more likely to be intelligent, correct in their opinions and morals, and better prepared for the active duties of life, than they could possibly have been without it."

THE PRICE OF SUCCESS.

BY E. BOGART.

A boy sat musing by a wayside brook,
With prescient dreams of honor and of wealth;
His eye was scanning Nature's open book,
His ruddy cheek proclaim'd life's blessing, health.

He sought for knowledge, and he sighed for fame,
With ardent longings in his youthful heart;
The voices of the earth should sound his name
Beyond the sphere where he might act his part.

He bent his will to hope, his hope to will,
And marked with single aim his onward course:
Concentrated strength should break down every ill,
The strength of mind, with its unyielding force.

And thus determined, from that brooklet's side,
That little stream, which to the ocean ran,
He dashed forth in the world, and on its tide
He wrestled sternly, and became a man.

And with the swift he ran the toilsome race,
And with the strong he battled for the prize;
That with the learned his name should have a place,
In some bright niche, what'er the sacrifice.

He jostled rivals from his way, for room,
His eye grew dim with study, ere his prime,
And, frightened from his cheek, fled boyhood's bloom,
And gray hairs came, unlicensed yet by Time.

Dreams, waking dreams, hung o'er his weary life,
And circled round him with bewild'ring power;
He scorned repose amid the ceaseless strife,
And for the yellow leaf trod down the flower.

And onward still, and upward, was his course,
Till he obtained both honor, fame and wealth;
But the bright fountain had a bitter source,
Which sapped the springs of boyhood's blessing, health.

The man with reckless waste had spent his powers
In restless toil, to reach life's dizzy height;
The wayside brook flowed on through summer hours,
As hope exhaustless, as ambition bright.

WOMAN'S PLACE IN SOCIETY.

The following remarks on the recent Woman's Rights Convention at Worcester are from the Christian Inquirer:—

We should admire the candor, did it not also mark the conceit, with which it is admitted by some of the most active Woman's Rights advocates, that the Bible is rather heretical upon this subject. So confident are the friends of this movement of the strength of their position, that they would rather not have any sacred authority for it, to divide the honor of the approaching victory with them. The champions of this cause are willing to devote their superfluous strenght to disproving the inspiration of the Scriptures, or to removing any other verity which is inconsistent with their cardinal doctrine—the identity of the sexes. A little piquant skepticism doubtless gives a zest to reform, and we can readily conceive the fascination of montrosity leading women to coquet with infidelity. Abolitionism would lose no small part of its popularity, should it become more modest and reverential towards religion, and the Woman's Rights question would be tame indeed, if it did not afford a platform upon which people could grow eloquent, by shocking the veneration of the public.

The women of this country will not thank their talking sisters, who assume to represent the sex, for the exhibition they have made of their claims. They know too well where their strength and influence lies, to wish to risk it in a competition to which they are so unequal. We do not doubt that women exert a far larger influence than men over society in its present constitution. They do in their present position, a thousand times better than they could in the position some of them seek, the very work for which they are demanding to be admitted to an identity with man. Their rights are ten times more sacred as the objects of man's care, than they could be when self-asserted. They are better off, and society is better off for them as downright woman, than thay possibly could be as female men. Their present position in society is no more emphatically distinguished from man's, than their physical and mental constitution is. God made them male and female, and instead of abolishing the distinction, a true culture and refinement only increases it. Women are most like men in a savage state. A more thorough development, a more Christian culture, brings out into bolder relief the essential differences between them, and unfolds more beautifully the reason of the dissimilarity. There is a mischevious tendency in the democratic spirit of the times, to sacrifice the essential and divine distinctions among natures and things on the altar of equality. But a truer philosophy and a meeker faith recognizes the rich variety, and thorough diversities in persons and objects established by the Creator. Woman is man's partner, not his rival—the complement, not the double of his being. It is not to her dispraise to deny her what would add nothing to her worth, while it would destroy her fitness for her place in a perfect order of society—the mental energy, the creative power, the sustained strength of reasoning which distinguishes man. She is not fitted for public life. It is ridiculous to ascribe this sentiment to the jealousy of the stronger sex. It is not from fear of competition, but from fear of losing the charm of the world; from love of woman, not from jealousy, that man so earnestly contends that she is now in her place. He knows herself and the world well enough to thank God that woman is not like him, or exposed to his lot. It is tenderness to her, and an enlightened self-love, that unite to make him disgusted with the first signs of a metamorphis of woman into men.

We have the satisfaction of knowing that the most truly illustrious women repel with indignation the idea that their claim to equality is to be defended with the sacrifice of the appropriate graces of their sex. A true woman is jealous of the peculiar rights of her sex—and among them she reckons the right of being a woman, and not a man. Rights imply duties, and freedom from certain duties is one of the most precious rights of women. The immodesty and rashness with which duties not assigned to them are sought by some women, give poor indications of any appropriate sense of the difficulty and importance of discharging those distinctly imposed by Providence. The women that want to be men, in everything but sex, are likely to be among that "strong-minded" order that neither their own nor the other half of creation love or respect.

THINGS WHICH A MINISTER CAN'T DO.

He can't always write and preach eloquent sermons. There are few eloquent writers, and still fewer eloquent speakers. It is on the whole a great blessing to the Church that it is so; for Divine truth appears best in a simple garb; and the most useful pastors have been those, generally, whose names have never attained to any thing like notoriety. But with the power to be eloquent—using that term in the popular acceptation—his sense of duty would oblige him to sacrifice popularity to usefulness. Comparing himself with himself, that is intellectually, the minister is not able to be alike interesting in his sermons. Some discourses must be doctrinal—and by a certain class of hearers they will be called dry; others must be expository, and by another class—those [illegible] amusement than for instruction—these will be considered tedious. Besides, the minister is but a man; feeling sometimes in the mood for study, and at other times almost incapable of an intellectual effort. His sedentary life renders him peculiarly liable to nervous depression, headache, and indigestion. These affect the mind, and render study, at times, almost out of the question. Still he is expected to be just as interesting at one time as at another. How unreasonable! Again: He cannot always feel equally interested in the delivery of his sermon. There are subtle causes at work to deaden feeling, and what he has prepared with great study, may be delivered in a heartless manner. Is this under his own control? Every minister will say nay. Hence, sermons that cost but little study—delivered under a state of excitement—will often be more admired, and talked of, than those which cost vastly more effort, but which, unhappily, have been pronounced with less feeling. Then again, his congregation is thin, when he expected to see it full—or those are absent for whose edification especially the discourse was prepared; and are not these circumstances calculated to depress the mind? How, then, can it be expected that ministers should always preach interesting and eloquent sermons?

Another thing which ministers can't do, is to visit as much as the people expect. This will always be a standing charge against them. Until they get a power of ubiquity, I see not how this expectation can be met. If six months, or even three, sometimes elapse, they are saluted with the declaration, "Why, what a stranger you are; we thought you had forgotten us." Now I maintain that if a minister, especially in a large city congregation, attends to all the sick, the bereaved, and the serious inquirers, with great punctuality and faithfulness, the rest of the congregation should accept a visit whenever it can conveniently be made.

Still another thing which ministers can't do; i. e., trade with every body in the congregation. In almost every congregation there are several of the same occupation, mechanics or merchants, making or selling what a minister's family must necessarily consume. Now some are so unreasonable as to think that a minister should spend the pittance that is allowed him entirely within the congregation; and if a preference is given to others, it is sometimes a ground of mortal offense. This expectation, or obligation, as some would consider it, applies less to cities than the country towns. But what shall a poor minister do—when even in his own congregation he has got to make a selection! Alas for him, somebody must be preferred. How nicely sometimes has he to adjust his patronage, for fear of giving offense! Now this is slavery. Every noble mind will pronounce it such. Let the minister have some independence in the matter—spend his money where he pleases, give it away to whom and for what he pleases, do just in these respects, as any other man in the congregation takes the liberty of doing. But enough; it will be evident from what has been said, that there are some things which men are apt to expect from the minister, which he cannot do.

PROPERTY AND RELIGION.—Property is comparatively worthless when not sealed by the presence of a moral and religious community. I have just been handed estimates by an intelligent citizen of this place, respecting the value of lands in two adjoining counties. The natural advantages are the same, the proximity to market is the same, and yet in one land is worth ten dollars per acre, and in the other twenty. The cause of the difference is the religious character of the early settlers.

Said the eccentric Horace Bushnell to a hardware merchant in Cincinnati, in the vicinity of whose lands he was building a church. "What do you suppose real estate was worth in Sodom?" "Ah," said he, "I see what you are after. You are building a church in the neighborhood of my farm. You are welcome to some glass and a keg of nails. Such was the language of true philosophy and a wise economy. We cannot afford to do without the means of intellectual and religious education.

REMEMBERED HAPPINESS.—Mankind are always happier for having been happy; so that, if you make them happy now, you make them happy twenty years hence, by the memory of it. A childhood passed, with a due mixture of rational indulgence, under fond and wise parents, diffuses over the whole of life a feeling of calm pleasure; and, in extreme old age, is the very last remembrance which time can erase from the mind of man. No enjoyment, however inconsiderable, is confined to the present moment. A man is the happier for life, from having made once an agreeable tour, or lived for any length of time with pleasant people, or enjoyed any considerable interval of innocent pleasure.

As the disciples, when Christ told them "One of you shall betray me," they that were innocent suspected themselves most, and cried out, "Master, is it I?" so meek Christians, when they hear sinners reproved or the hypocrite laid open in the ministry of the word, presently cry out, "Is it I?"

RELATION OF THE SOCIAL PRINCIPLE TO THE HEAVENLY STATE.

The gradual diminution which death makes of the number of our friends, is a subject suggestive of important reflections. In the early part of his life, a man rejoices in a large number of those whom he considers as truly his friends. He takes delight in their company; he feels that to enjoy their society, and receive and reciprocate their kindness, is what gives a charm to life. He can fancy no condition on earth more dreadful than to be left utterly without friends; so strongly is the social principle rooted in his nature. Nevertheless, as time advances, he sees one stricken down by the fell destroyer, another is taken, a third is snatched away, a fourth perishes, till at last those whom he once delighted in are all gone. In the mean time, he has felt himself more and more disinclined to form new acquaintances. He has lived long enough to become suspicious of human nature. He knows that mankind are selfish, that the selfishness of man generally increases as he grows older, and that it is therefore difficult to form friendships with those of congenial age and disposition with himself, which possess any of the elements of permanency. But in spite of all this, the social principle of his nature continues as strong as it ever was; and to gratify it, he goes back in his imagination, and lives in the past, sighing at the same time to think, that the opportunities which he once enjoyed with the companions of his choice are gone, to return no more.

Has the Creator implanted this principle within us—suffered it to "grow with our growth and strengthen with our strength," so that upon the borders of the grave the old man pants for something to meet and fill and bless this faculty of his nature—and yet doomed it to extinction at death? It cannot be. The principle must continue to live; and the very fact that it is strong in the dying hour, is an argument of no little weight for the immortality of the soul. Yet who would wish to have social opportunities renewed and friendships reëstablished in the future life, if they must be attended with the same uncertainty of continuance as here, liable to be marred, broken up, or turned into bitterness by the selfish passions of the heart? What would heaven be worth—in what respect would it be desirable—if the selfish passions of those who are brought there were not wholly eradicated? The divine law says, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself;" and it is evident that if men were universally conformed to this law, friendships would be formed in the utmost sincerity. One would never be troubled with the suspicion, that his pretended friend was not all he seemed to be. He would know to the contrary. He would feel that he had a hold upon his friend's affections, which nothing could destroy. Such friendships, truly, would be of the most delightful kind. An all-wise and merciful God has therefore provided, that society shall be reëstablished in heaven upon this principle. None can dwell there, unless this law is first written upon his heart. On no other principle would society there be safe; on no other principle would friendships be lasting. "They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain," is a characteristic feature of the heavenly state; and in order to this, the divine law of love must be obeyed; for, "love worketh no ill to his neighbor."

But on what principle do men love one another? When they take similar views of things, when they agree in their love and admiration of the same objects, and when they find themselves delighting in the same pursuits, they experience such a congeniality of disposition, that they are mutually attracted one towards another. This is the foundation of all strong friendships. It is on this principle that the friendship between husband and wife is so delightful; and where this congeniality of disposition is wanting, the relation between them is any thing but comfortable. It is on this principle that persons of the same sect in religion, or party in politics, feel an attachment for each other, which they do not feel towards those of a different party. It is so in all other cases. It is, therefore, provided in the divine law, that there shall be some common object which men shall contemplate, that they shall take similar views of this object, and that their affections shall in common cling around it. And who so worthy of being this common object, as the great Creator himself, on whom they all depend, and whose goodness is over all his works? Hence the law requires, that man shall not only love his neighbor as himself, but, as a means to this, that he shall love the Creator with all his heart. If all men could take similar views of the Creator, if they could all delight in his perfections as they are revealed, and could all delight in the service which He requires, they would have no difficulty in loving one another. Their affections would flow together like water. Hence it is provided that the entire law of love—love to man and love to God—shall be written in the hearts of all those who enter heaven. And what a blissful state of society will thus be produced!

What now is the New Birth, which the conceited wisdom of this world affects to despise? Is it any thing more or less than that work which conforms the heart of man to this law of love? Is it any thing else than a re-writing of the divine law in the heart? This is just what it is. It is sound philosophy, therefore, based upon the very nature of man, which says, "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." Heaven would be no place for permanent friendship between man and man, if the unregenerate were there. If the design of the Creator is to establish a perfect state of society there, that disposition which leads a man to build up his own interests, at the expense of his neighbor's, must be wholly eradicated. He must be made to "pass from death to life," and "love the brethren."

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 24.

GLASGOW, December 20, 1850.

Although, to a very great extent, in the denunciation of Papal measures, the invasion of the Queen's supremacy has been the point mainly dwelt upon, we are not without a conviction that good will result. No indication has been made of what the Government intend to do; but the Daily News lately intimated, that the Attorney-General has been instructed to prepare a Bill, inhibiting the assumption of the titles which the Pope has conferred. Such a measure, if brought into Parliament when they meet in the beginning of February, would almost to a certainty be carried. Meanwhile, the Jesuit Cardinal Wiseman has entered upon his assumed office—with much less dignity, indeed, than he had anticipated, having been compelled, by the temper of the times, to make his "enthronement" a comparatively quiet affair, although with the ordinary procession of 200 ecclesiastics. We are now more than half through the seventeen days' jubilee, appointed by the Pope, as the inauguration of his friends and coadjutors in the propagation of delusion; and if the matter was not one of deep dishonor to a holy God, and awful injury to souls, we might smile at the prospect of the Cardinal being possibly sent back to Rome to be disrobed, while yet the hundred years of exemption from purgatory promised to "the faithful" by their guilty head, had been fairly won by thousands, trusting in the knavery. As there were no conditions relative to Wiseman's degradation, could the Pope with honor refuse to keep faith with his own followers in such a case, as he may and does with "heretics?" Casuistry may fairly be set to decide the point; for, already, Sir Edward Sugden, an eminent lawyer, at an English county meeting, upon a careful examination of the successive changes and choppings which our law in regard to Popery has undergone, has given it as his decided opinion, that Wiseman, by the adoption of the title conferred by the Pope, has violated the existing law, and is liable to punishment.

Although the number of meetings has diminished the public press is still busily discussing the subject, and the general attention is being called more effectually to the numerous evils which Popery inflicts, and the claims it makes, temporal as well as spiritual. This is indeed required. For, besides the danger which can only legitimately be met by presenting the Word of God, confronting thus the error with the truth, and seeking the overthrow in the hearts of men of that domination over conscience which Popery seeks to establish, we must also seek to guard against the consequences ready to result from the attempt to enforce the dogma which claims also temporal supremacy over all lands. As citizens, we have rights which Rome seeks to usurp; and though we may not impose penalties, we are warranted in taking measures to frustrate the schemes which an unscrupulous adversary adopts for the invasion of our liberties, and the endangerment of our lives. We can hardly be expected to be indifferent to the machinations of a foreign political confederacy, merely because, contrary to the usages of other nations, it bestows upon its agents, emissaries, and intriguers, titles that are supposed to be only ecclesiastical. Realities rather than names merit our attention—and this the more especially when the name is intended to mask the reality. Before consecration, either as Bishop or Archbishop, an oath is taken binding to the extirpation of heretics and enemies of the Pope; and although it is asserted that this part of the oath is dispensed with for Britain, yet as the only reason for such dispensation must be, that it is presumed the heretics have the power, yet Dr. Cummings, of London, has shown good reason to doubt whether, in the very case in hand, there was any departure from the common form. Besides, Wiseman, as a Jesuit, must feel himself at liberty to trample on the laws of truth in dealing with us heretics, he not being required to keep faith with such. And indeed, not only in regard to his oath, but in written statements which he made as to the will of a very old gentleman who has left all his property, amounting to £3000 a year, to the Church of Rome, giving to his family only a life-rent interest in it, it has been clearly proved that integrity can easily be disregarded. He has entered upon office with a character tainted by untruth; and the professions which now he meekly makes, stand in sad contrast with the lordly assumption of his earliest demands.

We cannot shut our eyes to such considerations, while yet attaching highest importance to those which bear more immediately on the spiritual well-being of our people. We know the crushing efforts which Rome has ever made to prevent the free dissemination of the Word of God, and the rights of private judgment in rejecting Church interpretation, and resisting apostatizing Church decrees. This point was well enforced by the young Duke of Argyll at a late meeting in Edinburgh, and has been, indeed, presented more or less fully at nearly all the Anti-Papal meetings in Scotland. The Queen's supremacy is little regarded—even the Established Church here feeling a repugnance to its admission. Accordingly, in the meeting held in Glasgow, (a paper containing an account of which I formerly sent you in lieu of a letter,) all denominations took truly Protestant ground. They did not, like the Archbishops, Bishops, and Clergy of the Church of England, make so much of the "unwarrantable insult," as of the corruptions of Rome. Indeed, we did feel surprise that the hierarchy of England should, with the knowledge of their own claim to the right of decreeing rites and ceremonies, have protested at all against Rome's prescribing, "as necessary to salvation, the belief of doctrines grounded on no warranty of Scripture."

Reluctantly, as clearly appears, the Bishop of London has been compelled to give some effect to the will of the people in the matter. Pressed by the Government, it may be presumed, he directed his archdeacons to visit the churches and chapels in which Romish ceremonies were alledged to be practiced, and to report to him. And although disposed to be far from strict, and willing to take a wide view of what is "authorized by the rubric," or "sanctioned by established custom," he has received already the resignation of one incumbent and three curates, who were unwilling to be so confined in their "mummeries." Mr. Bennett, of St. Barnabas, in his intercourse with the Bishop, justifies his "histrionics," as they have been well termed, as necessary substitutes for our Lord's miracles! On Sunday last, his church was shut, notices being posted on the doors that this was occasioned by the difficulty experienced in performing divine service. Some of the Tractarians, it is said, purpose to found a new church—not being willing to receive all Rome's abominations, yet dissatisfied with the measure to be allowed them in the Church of England, large as that measure appears to us to be. MISSIONS OF THE AMERICAN BOARD.

At a meeting held in this city on the first Monday in January, interesting statements were made relative to the condition and prospects of the missions of the American Board.

The receipts into the treasury of the Board, during the five months ending December 31st, were $92,044. During the corresponding period last year, they amounted to $91,532

The records of the Board show that there are at present connected with the missions under its auspices, 85 missionary churches, to which, during the past year, there have been [illegible] a larger number than has been admitted during any one of the six past years. The average increase is 23 members to each church. The records of the Presbyterian church, (N. S.) show an increase in each church, during the past year, equal to 2½ members. The increase in other denominations in this country is probably not much greater. In the Presbyterian missions among the Choctaws, there have been 182 additions during the same time. In the Armenian churches, seven in number, there have been 237 additions, and many were made to the Nestorian churches, in consequence of a powerful revival last spring.

Letters just received from Ceylon, dated Oct. 7, speak of a powerful revival in progress at that time in the Batticotta Seminary. It received its first impulse on the occasion of receiving as members of the Church five pupils at that institution, on the second Sunday in August last.

After the reading of other letters from missionaries in various parts of the world, Rev. Mr. Coe, the Secretary, entered into a review of the principal events that have occurred in connection with the missionary work during the past year. One of the most interesting features, he observed, was the very remarkable increase of interest in religious truths that has been awakened throughout Turkey and the East generally, particularly in the Armenian Churches. A missionary is now on his way to take possession of an important post in this field. There is also a loud and almost universal demand for reformation in India. The Brahmins are denounced; the distinctions of caste have been virtually abolished; education is encouraged; an expurgation of the absurdities and grosser superstitions contained in the Shasters or sacred books, is demanded; there exists an entire freedom of religious observances, and a new mode of restoration has been discovered for those who have lost caste. The effect of this latter measure, however, is quite the opposite of what was expected. It was thought that many who had embraced Christianity would recant, but all barriers being removed, still larger numbers took occasion to abandon idolatry. The most learned of the Brahmins admit that their church must be speedily reformed, else it will cease to exist. In Western India, there is a great change with respect to female education The conviction has become general, that females are susceptible of education, and a large number of female schools have been organized, also Normal Schools for the education of teachers. The Governor-General and the Bishop have taken action in their favor.

SUNDAY IN WILLIAMSBURG.—The Trustees of Williamsburg, L. I., recently passed a vote, giving to a line of stages permission to run through the village on Sunday. At a subsequent meeting, an attempt was made to get the decision changed, but they refused to reconsider the vote.

Professor Park recently stated, in the course of a sermon, that all the sermons delivered in the land in the course of a year would make 120,000,000 large octavo pages.

THE SUNDAY IN FRANCE.

A foreign paper, in alluding to the effort to secure a better observance of the Sunday in France, says that the Ultra-Catholic party in the National Assembly appear to be following in the footsteps of the Agnewites in England. At a recent session, M. de Montalambert brought forward a report of a committee lately appointed relative to the observance of Sunday. He said that the observance of Sunday as a day of rest was a blessing and a duty, and had been shamefully violated in France. The non-observance of that sacred day was a public profession of atheism—a defiance thrown to the Creator. The demoralizing effects of their neglect of that holy day might be seen in the increased number of cabarets, which amounted to 332,000 in France. It was full time to remedy the evil, and to pay some attention to the moral improvement of the laboring classes. M. Montalambert then read the different clauses of the project, by which it is proposed that Sunday observance shall be regulated. By the first article of the project it is expressly forbidden to execute, on Sundays, or holy days, any works paid out of the funds of the treasury, the departments, or the communes. By subsequent articles, masters are forbidden to compel their servants or laborers to work on Sunday. An exception is made in favor of the venders of food, persons employed on the railroads, canals, harbors, &c. The Mayors of Communes under 3000 souls are empowered to order shops to be closed during divine service, and the soldiers of the army and navy are to be allowed two hours to attend some place of worship. The proposal has been received with extremely little favor by the public. No one applauds except the Jesuits and their immediate disciples.

FUGITIVES FROM LABOR.

The clause of the Constitution of the United States which was made the occasion of framing the Fugitive Slave Law, and which is always quoted by those who would justify that law, reads as follows:—

"No person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall in consequence of any law or regulation therein be discharged from such service or labor; but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due."

"The Emancipator and Commonwealth" has a long article upon this clause, in which it is admitted that the clause is binding upon the judicial courts of the States, according to its true intent and meaning; but denied that there is any power in Congress to enact any laws whatever, or to constitute any special tribunals whatever, for the enforcement of the clause. The taking of the jurisdiction of these claims out of the hands of the states, and vesting it without any authority whatever in the federal courts, is justly regarded as a gross piece of federal usurpation.

"It may indeed seem to some, that by the second section of the third article of the constitution—'The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this constitution'—Congress have a right to vest jurisdiction over these claims in the federal courts. But if these matters of the return of fugitives are 'cases in law,' then it follows, beyond all question, that under the ninth article of amendment, all questions of fact, arising during their investigation, must be decided by a jury; and of course that the recent fugitive slave law, and also that of 1793, are unconstitutional. To avoid this dilemma, it has been very ingeniously and learnedly argued, that this return of fugitives is not a 'case in law,' but a mere extradition, like the giving up for trial of fugitives from justice. Very well; admit it; and it follows beyond dispute, that the federal judiciary power does not extend to these demands; but that all action upon them must be left to the state authorities."

ANTI-FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW CONVENTION.

The "Anti-Fugitive Slave Law Convention," held at Syracuse, N. Y., last week, was largely attended, and awakened much interest. Dr. Lyman Clary of Syracuse presided, and Wm. L. Chaplin, Gerrit Smith, and Frederick Douglass, were among the speakers. Mr. Douglass was particularly pungent in his remarks upon the Fugitive Slave Law—a law which he thought two or three dead slave-catchers would help to make a dead letter. "If any one should attempt to take me into slavery," said he, "I should strike him down—not with malignity, but with as much complacency as I would a blood-hound, and think I was doing God service." A series of resolutions, and a lengthy address, were adopted by the Convention, for which we shall endeavor to find room when authentic copies are received. Meanwhile, we copy the following resolutions, as indicative of the kind of action it is proposed to take:—

Resolved, That all of us are liable on any day to find ourselves so placed that we must violate our duty to the panting fugitive, or else in some way oppose the execution of the Fugitive Slave Law, and, in consequence of opposition, subject ourselves to the loss of one thousand dollars, the loss of another thousand by civil process, the expenses of suits, and imprisonment for six months—therefore it is the dictate of prudence, as well as of good fellowship in a righteous cause, that we should unite ourselves into an association, in each of our neighborhoods, pledged to stand by its members in opposing this law, and to share with any of them the pecuniary losses they may necessarily incur under the operations of this law.

Resolved, That a Central Committee of seven be appointed, whose duty it shall be to prepare immediately, and to send throughout the State for signatures, a memorial to our Legislature, praying them at once to enact a law making it criminal, and punishable as kidnapping would be, for any man, official or not, to take, or assist to take, any person out of the State as a Fugitive from Slavery, who has not been proved to be, by a jury trial, or what is understood to be "due process of law."

Resolved, That this Committee appoint a sub-Committee, or a Committee of other suitable powers, to appear before the Legislature, during their present session, to urge upon the members of that body the enactment of such a law, and of any other laws which may be found necessary to protect the liberty of citizens of this State.

RECEPTION OF WM. L. CHAPLIN.

On the evening of January 6th, the people of Syracuse, N. Y., gave a most enthusiastic reception to Wm. L. Chaplin, late an inmate of a Maryland jail for aiding in the escape of fugitive slaves. After singing, prayer, and brief remarks by two or three individuals, Mr. Chaplin addressed the large audience which had assembled.

Referring to his connection with the affair which resulted in his imprisonment, he said the thought would often arise, WAS HE RIGHT? He did not go to Washington—nor did he remain there—to aid slaves in their escape. He was there in the regular course of business, as he had been most of the time for three or four years past. It was true, that for years he had learned to think and talk of Slavery as hard as the fanatical abolitionists of New York. Feeling, thinking and talking in this way, it was very natural that the colored people—for poor people are apt to find out their friends—should find him out. They did, at all events; and for years had been in the habit of consulting him in regard to sending news to friends at the North—in regard to education—in regard to their troubles—and also in regard to their legal rights; for he found in the course of his investigations that many were held in bondage in violation of slaveholders' law. Last spring the slave trade was unusually active—good "boys" were worth much more than usual—and scarcely a day passed that gangs of chained slaves did not pass through the city, or one or more smart young men were not sold and put into the slave-pens, to be taken to the Southern market. This created alarm, and produced cases of unutterable hardship and agony, the tales of which, from his position, came directly to his ears. In the course of these events, it came to his knowledge, that two young men were confined in a very small space—with scarcely room to breathe—and that, if detected, their secretion would involve many others in condemnation, and expose them all to severe suffering, and the untold hardships of the worst forms of slavery, with no chance of redemption. It was at his option to do what he could to relieve them. Was he right in making the attempt?

Another thing—he did not suppose for a moment that he was committing a crime, constitutionally. He had, in common with many of the ablest lawyers in the country, arrived at the conclusion that slaves in the District of Columbia were not constitutionally—were not legally—held, even according to slave law. He knew he was right in the sight of Heaven, and did not believe he was interfering even with any human enactment. [illegible] two young men, whose names he did not know, whom he had never seen before, were allowed by him to ride in his carriage for two or three miles more or less—and when thus proceeding, he was assailed by a band of assassins, who fired fifteen shots upon his party, and thrust a bowie knife through the panel of the coach, and assaulted him in a manner which, had it occurred in the State of New York, would have subjected every man of them to a trial, capitally. Had this occurred in the State of New York, and he had shot every one of them dead, he would have been acquitted at law. But he carried no pistols—no weapons of death—and never had done in his life; and he was not aware, until the assault, that any one with him was so provided.

THE FUGITIVE SLAVE CASE IN NEW YORK.—The case of Henry Long, the alledged fugitive from slavery, was decided last week by Judge Judson, who, after a long talk about the Constitution, in the course of which he maintained the constitutionality of the Fugitive Acts of 1793 and 1850, declared that Henry Long is the property of J. S. Smith of Virginia, and that a certificate in conformity with the act of Congress should be issued by the Clerk of the Court, for his surrender as a fugitive from service and labor. The agent of Mr. Smith presented an affidavit, setting forth that great excitement existed, and that he had reason to apprehend that Long would be rescued by force from his possession before he could be taken beyond the limits of the State, and claiming the assistance of the U. S. Marshal. At 5 o'clock the same afternoon, Long was conveyed by the Marshal and his officers to the New Jersey Railroad, and placed on board, to be conveyed to Virginia. An offer was made by gentlemen here to buy his freedom, but the agent stated that he was not authorized to sell him.

COLONIZATION IN NEW JERSEY.—A special meeting of the N. J. Colonization Society was held in Newark, Dec. 28th, 1850, Hon. J. C. Hornblower, President of the Society, in the Chair. The following resolution was adopted, and a committee was appointed to present it to the Governor:—

Resolved, That his Excellency the Governor of New Jersey be respectfully and earnestly requested to recommend in his message to the Legislature, at its next session, an appropriation on the part of the State of New Jersey, to promote the objects of the Colonization Society, in aiding free people of color in their voluntary emigration from this State to the Republic of Liberia.

"THE COMMONWEALTH" is the title of a daily paper started in Boston January 1st, 1851, to advocate the principles of the Free Soil Party. A weekly paper, called the "Commonwealth and Emancipator," is made up from the matter of the daily. Elizur Wright is one of the editors, and his paper, the Chronotype, is merged in the Commonwealth, together with the Emancipator and Republican.

THE SABBATH-SCHOOL VISITOR.—Are our friends generally taking the necessary steps to secure a large list of subscribers for the Sabbath-School Visitor? That some are, we know from orders already received; we hope soon to have tangible proof that all are. February will soon be here; and before the number for that month goes to press, it is desirable to know about how many copies will be wanted. In places where an opportunity does not often occur to present the subject to the people, would it not be well for some public-spirited friend of the cause to advance the money necessary to order twenty or forty copies, and get his pay when the papers are distributed? Several have done this. One church has ordered enough to supply each child in the congregation. Every church ought to take some—few churches less than forty.

ORDINATION OF DEACONS.—On Fourth-day, Dec. 25th, 1850, the following persons were set apart by solemn ordination service to the office of Deacon, to serve the First Seventh-day Baptist Church of Alfred, N. Y., viz:—George W. Allen, Alfred Lewis, Josiah Witter, and Daniel Potter. The ordination services were conducted as follows: Introductory services by Eld. Jared Kenyon; sermon by James Bailey; consecrating prayer by Eld. Henry P. Green; charge by Eld. N. V. Hull; right-hand of fellowship by Eld. Thomas E. Babcock; concluding services by Eld. Rowse Babcock. N. V. H.

TWO MARRIAGE QUESTIONS.—The Associate Reformed Synod of South Carolina, at its late meetings, rejected a proposition to authorize marraige with a deceased wife's sister. The Presbytery of South Carolina (O. S.) answered in the negative the question: "Is it lawful that marriage be solemnized between parties standing in the relation of nephew and aunt by affinity?"

NEW METHODIST COLLEGE.—The late Mr. Wofford, of Spartanburg, S. C., who had long been a minister of the denomination, has devised the sum of $50,000, to be held by thirteen gentlemen, mostly ministers, in trust for the South Carolina Conference, to found a College in Spartanburg district.

CATHOLICS AND PROTESTANTS.—A correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune asks what portion of this country are Catholics and what portion Protestants; to which the editor replies:—

"This question can only be answered approximately, as no census ever taken by our Government takes any account of religious opinions. The best statistics of the several denominations are contained in their several Almanacs or Registers published annually, but even these are necessarily imperfect. Our own guess is that if all the People of the United States were to-day asked what they believe with regard to Divine Revelation, about Twenty Millions would indicate attachment to one or another Protestant denomination, about Three Millions would declare themselves Catholics in faith, while at least One Million would imply a disbelief in or at least indifference to Christianity in any form."

REMOVAL OF THE BODY OF STEPHEN GIRARD.—The Philadelphia Ledger says, that the City Councils determined to cause the removal of the remains of Stephen Girard, from the grave-yard attached to the Church of the Holy Trinity, to the grounds of the Girard College for Orphans. Accordingly, the body was privately exhumed, and conveyed to the establishment of Mr. Simon Gartland, undertaker, in whose custody it now is. It will remain at this place until arrangements are made for its re-interment. The public authorities design to connect with this event suitable and imposing ceremonies, and the Grand and Subordinate Lodges of Masons will probably co-operate with them, in producing a grand demonstration commemorative of the great virtues of this public benefactor. A monument is to be placed over the remains of Mr. Girard at their final resting place.

SHOCKING PICTURE.—A young woman lodging in a cellar, No. 293 Ann Street, Boston, died from destitution and exposure to the cold. The following facts in regard to her death were elicited before the Coroner's Inquest, and present such a picture of crushing poverty, degradation, and despair, as we can hardly realize to have abiding place and existence in any community, civilized or barbarous.

I, Eliza McGilvery, being duly sworn, depose as follows—I reside in the cellar of house 293 Ann-st., have lived there two months; I hired of John Gary, and pay $1 a week; I keep a shop there, and sell small beer, cigars, &c.; my brother-in-law and Margaret Moran stop with me; he slept on the bed last night and Margaret on the floor; I sat up and watched with Margaret, who was sick; I became acquainted with Margaret in Lowell; she and I worked in the factories; Margaret drank hard and visited the dancing cellars in Ann-st.; she is 17 years old, and was born in Ireland; she came to my cellar when she came out of the Alms house, about 8 days since; she got her living by dancing in Ann-st. since she came from the Alms house; she has been sick 3 days; I bought a cent's worth of milk last night and gave her the half of it; I got up very early this morning; I found my clothes and Margaret's clothes wet and frozen; I have had no wood for two days; some was given me by the Police this morning, Margaret asked me to lift her up, I did so, and then went out for wood, and when I returned Margaret was dead; this was about 10 o'clock; I knew she could not live; I did not have a Doctor while she was sick, for I had no money; I did not tell the Police she was sick; I don't know what caused her death, except exposure and heavy drinking; all the money I have is 12 cents; I have eat nothing to-day.

General Intelligence.

Proceedings in Congress Last Week.

SECOND-DAY, Jan. 6.

In the SENATE, a message was received from the House, with 24 private bills passed by that body, which were taken up, each read twice, and appropriately referred. Mr. Smith made a speech upon the bill to provide for the ascertainment and satisfaction of claims for spoliation committed by the French prior to 1801. Mr. Mangum made a speech in defense of Gen. Taylor's removal of Gen. Lane from office in Oregon.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, an unsuccessful attempt was made to get the extra rank of Lieutenant-General conferred on Gen. Scott. A bill was reported to facilitate the carrying out of the Bounty Land Law. The House refused, by a vote of 119 to 68, to suspend the rules, and allow Mr. Julian to present the memorial of the Annual Meeting of the Society of Friends in Indiana, against the Fugitive Slave Bill, and asking its repeal.

THIRD-DAY, Jan. 7.

In the SENATE, an adverse report was presented on the House resolution, authorizing the assignment of Bounty Land warrants. Much time was spent in a partizan debate on the removal of Gen. Lane and Col. Weller.

In the HOUSE, the principal business was a debate on the contested election case between Perkins and Morrison, of New Hampshire. It seems that Gen. Wilson, a representative, resigned to go to California. Subsequent to his election, the district was altered by the Legislature. In the election to fill the vacancy, Perkins had the majority in the old district, but Morrison had the majority in the new. Morrison received the certificate, and Perkins claims the seat. Perkins is a Free Soiler.

FOURTH-DAY, Jan. 8.

In the SENATE, Mr. Seward presented petitions from inventors, praying for protection from the importation of fabrics manufactured in foreign countries by machinery patented in the United States. A number of petitions and reports were presented, mostly referring to private claims. The bill for the settlement of Land Claims in California was taken up, and Mr. Gwin addressed the Senate in opposition to Mr. Benton's amendment.

In the HOUSE, the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means reported bills for appropriations to the West Point Academy; for the payment of Navy Pensions; and the expenses of Indian and Post Office Departments for 1852. A resolution to give another slice of the Public Lands for the benefit of the Atlantic and St. Lawrence Railroad, was referred; also a bill for the payment of awards made by Mexican Boundary Commission. An effort was made to resume the consideration of the New-Hampshire contested election case, but Mr. Stanton of Ky. called attention to the fact that it was the Anniversary of the Battle of New Orleans, and thereupon the House adjourned.

FIFTHDAY, Jan. 9.

In the SENATE, the bill providing for the free navigation of the St. Lawrence River was made the special order for the 28th inst. Several engrossed bills were passed. The bill to change the places of holding U. S. Courts in Vermont was ordered to be engrossed. Mr. Gwin's bill to settle private land claims in California was taken up and discussed by Messrs. Benton and Gwin, and finally referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

In the House, Mr. Chandler asked but did not obtain leave to introduce a resolution instructing the Committee on Commerce to inquire into the expediency of diminishing the weight or increasing the proportion of alloy in American silver for the purpose of preventing its exportation. The House took up the New Hampshire contested Election Case, but without finally disposing of it adjourned.

SIXTH-DAY, Jan. 10.

In the SENATE, several engrossed bills were passed, and several new bills reported. An animated debate occurred on a bill grant-50,000 acres of the Public Lands to Wisconsin, for purposes of Internal Improvement; which bill was finally ordered to be engrossed. The report of the Secretary of the Navy on the subject of the abolition of flogging, was received, and the Senate adjourned to Second-day.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Evans of Ohio, introduced a bill granting Treasury Scrip instead of Land to those persons entitled to Bounty Land under the act of September last, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands. Several bills were introduced with a view of disposing of the Public Domain among which was one by Mr. Bennett, of New York, granting to N. Y. State Public Lands for School and Railroad purposes equal in proportion to those already granted to Illinois. The New Hampshire contested election was decided in favor of the sitting member, and the House adjourned.

SABBATH-DAY, Jan. 11.

The SENATE was not in session.

The HOUSE, in Committee of the Whole, discussed the bill to reduce and modify the rates of postage. Mr. Phelps, of Mo., advocated a charge of three cents on prepaid letters, and five cents on letters not prepaid. Mr. Matteson, of N. Y., would go for the lowest rate he could get. Mr. Dunham, of Ia., was in favor of a uniform rate of five cents.

FINANCES OF ILLINOIS.—The Governor of Illinois, in his message to the Legislature, says that the public debt amounts to $15,627,500. The unsold canal lands are estimated to be worth $4,000,000. Indiana has liquidated, as we learn by the message of the Governor, in principal and interest, by taxation alone, the sum of $2,529,156, and has paid interest on its foreign debt, including the January interest, 1851, the sum of $789,269, making a total of $3,268,425, or over $360,000 a year in addition to the ordinary expenses of the State. By the year 1852, with improvements in the revenue system, and other favorable causes, it is estimated that the Treasury will be able within that year to appropriate the sum of $100,000 to the payment of the principal of the foreign debt. The expenditures of the ensuing year, exclusive of the expenses of the Convention, are estimated at $80,000. The total value of taxable property is $137,443,565. [Tribune.

Starvation among the Overland Emigrants.

The Osceola Independent, of Dec. 14, publishes a letter from Wm. Waldo, which gives a horrible picture of the sufferings of the overland emigrants to California. The letter is dated at Truckee River, Emigrant Road, Sept. 30, and says:—

I have now been upon this horrible road more than one month, during which time I have witnessed every grade of human suffering and misery. Too often have I seen families, who, from all appearances, had been brought up in the enjoyment of every luxury, feasting upon the carcases of dead oxen. Capt. Duncan of Michigan, stated to me a few days since, that the best food he ate for sixteen days was a faithful dog that had followed him from home; that he saved him as long as he could, but finally killed him to prevent starvation, and divided the meat among about twenty men. I have seen hundreds so weak that they reeled and staggered as they walked along the road. Saw one man from St. Louis on Humboldt river, a few days since, lying by the side of the road in the last agonies of death, caused by starvation. Have just reached this point, after a ten days journey up Humboldt River, where I found many persons without one pound of provision, although four hundred miles from Sacramento City. And what makes their situation worse, they have suffered from starvation until they are so weak they can scarcely walk. These people have been robbed by the Indians, even to their blankets. Although the nights are cold and chilly, and it requires two or three blankets to keep a man comfortable, yet many of these people have neither blankets nor coats. The hostile Indians are very numerous, becoming very bold, and are killing the emigrants daily. They conceal themselves in the thickets and ravines, and fire upon the emigrants as they pass; those on foot being too weak to carry their guns, fall an easy prey to the savages.

The Indians have taken a great deal of stock from the emigrants, and are consequently well mounted; and by picking up the firearms thrown away by the weak and exhausted, they are also well armed, which makes them far more dangerous than they have been at any previous period. Many believe these Indians are headed and led on by white men, whose object is to secure the emigrants' stock. Several families have disappeared, for which no account can be given, who have either been killed by the Indians when off the road or taken prisoners.

I have only mentioned a few of the thousand calamities which have befallen the overland emigration of 1850. Such an amount of suffering never has been experienced by the American people since the settlement of the country; and I sincerely hope that it may never be my lot during life again to witness such scenes of suffering and misery. The snow is now four inches deep upon the mountain, and the rivers rising, and in fifteen days from this time, in all probability, the mountains will be covered with snow from five to ten feet deep, and in many places much deeper. There will not be a trader on this side of the mountains after the 5th of October. The greater part of them are now leaving, with their stock, for fear of being in the snow storms of the Sierra Nevada. From the best information I can get, there is yet between 100 and 200 families and probably 2,000 men in the most perfect state of destitution far back of this place, without stock or provisions, and many of them without blankets or comfortable clothing. If the winter sets in early, I cannot see any possible chance for these people to cross the mountains. I have at my command 3,000 lbs. of fat beef and 3,000 lbs. of flour, besides 30 mules and horses, which will answer for food; but the horses and mules are needed to transport the feeble women and helpless children over the mountains and across the deserts.

I have fitted out an expedition, and will leave here to-night to relieve the sufferers on the Humboldt, and shall carry back flour and beef sufficient to enable 1,000 persons to cross the Desert. We have relieved emigrants from almost every State in the Union. Those from the city of St. Louis have been the greatest sufferers. Then come those from Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, Indiana, Wisconsin, Michigan, Iowa and Missouri. Probably fifty from New York and Pennsylvania have been relieved, three families from Louisiana, and about twenty men from Georgia, and from every State more or less.

Panther Shot.

The Potsdam N. Y. Mercury, of Jan. 1, says: The well-known hunter, Mr. Charles Parmeter of this town, who has been out in the woods the last two months deer-hunting, killed a few days since in the town of Belmont, in Franklin County, a large Panther or Catamount, measuring nine feet in extreme length, and weighing 247 pounds. Mr. Parmeter came upon the track while hunting, and the next day, with a dog, started with the determination to hunt him up. After a short distance he struck the trail and soon came to where, with a single bound, he had killed and split entirely open a huge buck, apparently carried the same about 20 rods, and partly buried the carcase.

Following on in pursuit, Mr. P. soon came to a mountain ridge with huge shelving rocks, in a chasm under one of which he found the Panther's den. His dog, with hair erect and exhibiting extreme fear, refused to enter, when Mr. P., tying a rope around the dog's neck, entered himself, dragging his dog after him. The Panther fled by another entrance and took to a very tall spruce tree near by. Mr. P. now climbed the ledge of rocks overhead, and thus found himself on a level with the tree top and distant about fifty feet from the same. The Panther was almost hid in the dense top, but catching a glimpse of him he fired in quick succession two balls into his body. The Panther had now placed himself, with eye fixed on Mr. P., in the attitude of springing, when Mr. P., having quickly reloaded both barrels of his gun, fired one into the back of his neck, and the other through his body; the fourth shot brought him to the ground. The dog having now regained courage, rushed in upon him, but one bite of the dying Panther sent him back howling with pain, when springing to his feet the ferocious animal ran some 20 rods and fell dead. Mr. P., to make sure, put two additional balls into him, and then ventured to approach him.

Arrival of the Crescent City.

The steamer Crescent City, from Chagres, arrived at New York on the 8th inst., bringing 400 passengers, and $1,500,000 in gold dust on freight, and a large amount in the hands of the passengers. She was detained at Chagres 3 days, with all passengers on board, waiting the arrival of the specie train from Panama. The cause of the detention was a robbery which occurred on the 23d Dec. As the last detachment of the specie train was 7 miles out of Panama, it was attacked by a party of 16 men, all armed to the teeth. Five mules were led into the woods and $100,000 taken from them. But through the exertions of parties having charge of the train, and assistance from Panama, it was all recovered with the exception of about $6,000. Two of the robbers were taken, one badly wounded.

On Monday, Jan. 6, at 10 o'clock P. M. lat 35° 07' N. and long 73° 00' W. the Crescent City made a brilliant light bearing N. E. On running for it she discovered it to be a vessel on fire. At 12 30 M. she came up with the wreck, run as near as prudent across her stern, and lay to a sufficient time to ascertain that there were no boats immediately about the wreck. The wreck was a brig of about 230 tons; the deck raime entirely burnt off to the water's edge. The chain plates sufficed to designate the vessel's class. The bowsprit and other spars were hanging by the rigging about the bows. She appeared to be an American vessel and eastern built.

SEIZURE OF THE BRITISH STEAMSHIP NIAGARA.—The Boston Daily Advertiser says: The steamer Niagara, which arrived at this port on Sunday morning Jan. 5, has been seized by the Collector under the following circumstances. It appears that on Monday night Mr Charles R. Sturgis, Custom House watchman, who was on duty on Cunard wharf, had his attention drawn to a boat leaving the wharf. He hailed the boat, and upon boarding her, found a quantity of silks, satins and lace goods, in bags, lying on the bottom. Two officers of the Customs, who were sleeping in an office on the wharf, were called, and took possession of the goods in the boat, as well as others of similar kind which were upon the wharf. In all, nine bags of goods were recovered, and on Thursday they were removed to the U. S. storehouse. In the mean while, a posse of Custom House officers visited the steamer, and made a thorough search, but discovered nothing further connected with the matter. The value of the goods recovered, is probably not far from $5000. The boatman states that he is ignorant of the name of the man who employed him to take the goods and himself to Governor's Island. The facts being communicated to the Collector, he ordered the goods to be retained, and stationed officers on board the steamer to keep possession until the matter had been represented to the Secretary of the Treasury. None of the officers of the steamer are implicated in the transaction. Upon this fact being established in the proper quarter, the release of the vessel will probably be ordered.

THE REMAINS OF ALFRED STILLMAN, who was killed by the explosion of the Anglo-Norman, near New Orleans, reached this city last week by the ship Union, and after the usual funeral services, were interred at Plainfield, N. J.

IMPORTANT FROM CENTRAL AMERICA.—A dispatch from New Orleans, Jan. 5, says that late advices from Central America confirm the report of a declaration of war between the States of Honduras and San Salvador and Guatemala. Mr. Chatfield says officially that the British Government will interfere.

We have received important intelligence from Yucatan, by which we learn that a desperate battle had occurred between the whites and the Indians, in which the latter were victorious, and 300 of the whites killed.

SUMMARY.

Letters from Cape Haytien to December 12, received per the brig Edward Prescott, at Holmes Hole, state that Capt. Mayo, of the brig Leander of Boston, who had been imprisoned there on a charge of smuggling, had been released, the Government acknowledging that the evidence did not substantiate the charge. Mr. Wilson, the U. S. Agent, had made a claim against the Haytien Government for $3000 damages for the imprisonment of Capt. Mayo, detention of vessel, &c. but it had not been allowed and probably would not be.

A boiler in the forge works of Messrs. Ranstead, Dearborn & Co., manufacturers of locomotive cranks and car axles, at Commercial Point, Dorchester, Massachusetts, exploded Jan. 7, shortly after the operations of the day had commenced. The principal part of the boiler was projected, with fearful velocity, through the side of the building, a distance of about 300 feet. There were about forty men at work in the building, but two of whom, fortunately, were injured.

There has been an arrival at St. Joseph from Salt Lake City. They left the 22d October. They represent the Salt Lake valley as being in a prosperous condition. Eleven persons composed the party, and brought in from $75,000 to $80,000. They suffered a great deal from the recent cold weather—one night they had five mules frozen to death.

The Prairie du Chien Patriot announces, with a good deal of satisfaction, that the Winnebago Indians have all been removed by the address and efficiency of H. M. Rice, of St. Pauls, the U. S. agent—who persuaded them to leave when the U. S. troops could not accomplish it even by force—at least without bloodshed.

The Boston Traveler states that Prof. Agassiz is about to proceed to the South, intending to devote some weeks, in company with the officers of the Coast Survey, to a scientific examination of the Coast of Florida, with a particular view to the coal formations of that region.

A letter in the Journal of Commerce says that a mode of making hydrogen gas from water has been discovered at Paris. The writer gives no account of the process, but says it is very simple and easier to use than Mr. Paine's. The hydrogen is carbonized by the use of a burner of platina.

A dispatch dated Boston, Jan. 11, says that Addison Gillmore, President of the Western Railroad, fell dead at a ballroom at Watertown at 11 o'clock the previous night, of Disease of the Heart. He had been dancing but a few minutes before his death. His age was about 50.

Letters from Catskill announce the death at that place of Rev. Dr. Porter and Samuel L. Penfield, Esq., an elder of the Doctor's church. They have been associated in church fellowship for many years, and in their death are not divided, both dying on the same day, and within half an hour of each other.

The brig Vandalia, from New Orleans, arrived at Charleston, Jan. 11, having on board the officers, crew and passengers of the ship Toronto, which vessel was totally lost on Mantanilla Reef on Thursday, Jan. 2d. The sufferers had been on the wreck forty hours when rescued.

On First-day, Dec. 22, 1850, by Rev. Joseph Wood, Mr. R. B. DAVIS, of McKean Co., Pa., to Miss LOUISA A. ENSIGN, of the same place.

At New Brunswick, N. J., Jan. 1, 1851, by Eld. W. B. Gillett, Mr. AUGUSTUS S. CASE, of Princeton, to Miss EMELINE RUNYON, of the former place.

In New Bremen, on the 25th of Dec., 1850, by Wm. G. Quibell, Mr. BENJAMIN W. PECKHAM, of Watson, to Miss ANNIS STILLMAN, of New Bremen.

DIED.

In Hopkinton, R. I., Dec. 30th, HANNAH BURDICK, relict of Ichabod Burdick, aged 80 years. This aged saint was a member of the 2d Seventh-day Baptist Church of Hopkinton, and it may truly be said of her, "Here is the faith and patience of the saints." Having been called at various times to drink deep of the cup of affliction, her faith never wavered, and her submission was always cheerful. In all the intercourse of life, the Christian shone out. Her piety had won the respect of all who knew her. For more than a year she was calmly waiting for her earthly tabernacle to be dissolved in order that she might occupy that building of God, that house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. Just before her departure, she spoke of the preciousness of Jesus, that He was her all. Thus she died, full of years, and full of faith, giving glory to God. COMM.

In Plainfield, N. J., on the 3d inst., of typhus fever, MARY F. RANDOLPH, in the 23d year of her age. The subject of this notice had for a number of years been much exercised in relation to her own salvation, but that anxiety appeared to be accompanied, in her mind, by an unusual degree of diffidence, doubt, and fear; and though such as were most intimately acquainted with her were satisfied that her heart had been renewed, and urged her to confess Christ openly before men, she did not do so until a few weeks before she was called to try the realities of the world unseen. During the late revival in the Seventh-day Baptist Church in this place, she made a profession of her faith, was baptized, and became a member of the Church; and when aware that she must soon die, she rejoiced that she had done so, and only regretted that she had not done it before. And, requesting the family not to weep for her, but let her go to the Saviour who called for her, she soon departed, we trust, to be with Christ. L. C.

The Illustrated Domestic Bible.

NOW PUBLISHING IN NUMBERS, on the 1st and 15th of each month. In addition to the authorized version, this edition contains Seven Hundred Engravings, Three Steel Maps, very full References, Poetical Portions in Metrical Form, Reflections, Notes, Questions on each Chapter, Dates for every day in the year, Family Record, Chronological Order, &c., &c.

The whole Bible will be completed in 25 Numbers of 56 pages each, making when finished a volume of 1,400 pages, small quarto, of very convenient size for family or private reading. It is peculiarly valuable for Sunday School Teachers. Every Sabbath School should have a copy of it, and it should be in every family where there are children. The Engravings are not introduced for show, but are real illustrations, and serve to explain the text. This feature will render it very attractive for the young, and will serve more than any other means to fix the Sacred Word permanently in the memory.

The N. Y. Recorder says: "It strikes us as better fitted to its sphere than any other similar work. We have great pleasure in commending it to our readers."

The Christian Observer (Phila.) says: "We cheerfully commend it as one of the most complete and convenient, as well as one of the cheapest Family Bibles that has appeared."

AGENTS WANTED to obtain subscribers in New York, Brooklyn, and other places. To Ministers, Theological Students, and others who would feel an interest in circulating such a work, the most liberal terms will be allowed. Address, post paid,

Methodist Quarterly Review.

THIS Review contains 160 pages Octavo, printed on fine paper. At the subscription price of TWO DOLLARS a year, in advance, it is the cheapest Quarterly Journal now issued. The publishers issue it at this low price, in expectation of greatly enlarging its list of subscribers, which, though by no means what it ought to be, is yet, as it is believed, twice as large as that of any similar Journal.

While the theology of the Methodist Episcopal Church is the standard for the Review, its tone is large and liberal, and its range of topics, not only in Biblical but General Literature, is extensive, as its Table of Contents will show. Its contributors are among the ablest writers in this country, of various religious denominations.

In the Department of Literary Intelligence, this Journal is so unusually full and rich as to be almost indispensable to every theologian and literary man.

From its wide circulation, the Quarterly affords a most desirable medium of Literary Advertising. All advertisements, and books for notice, should be sent to the Editor, Rev. J. M'Clintock, D. D., 200 Mulberry-st.

The Publishers subjoin a few notices from the Press during the last year:—

The editor is able to make, and does make a Quarterly which deserves a cordial reception among all Christian scholars. In the department of Book Notices the Methodist Quarterly has no equal among American Reviews. [N. Y. Recorder.

As an organ of one of the most efficient branches of the Christian Church in this country, it deserves to be read by all who would preserve a thorough acquaintance with all our current national literature. [Bost. Rec.

It is altogether the most agreeable of American Quarterlies. While it is called a "Methodist" Magazine, Methodism is not the one exclusive topic. The whole field of religion, literature, and science is traversed, and a truly catholic spirit animates every article. [Philadelphia Bulletin.

Its Literary Intelligence is not surpassed in copiousness by any other Quarterly. [Independent.

A high, scholar-like, and liberal spirit pervades the work. The Review is an honor to the denomination of which it is the organ. [Louisville Examiner.

Its character as a repository of literary information is unsurpassed. [N. Y. Recorder.

The work shows the traits of learned and accomplished editorship, and is an ornament to our national journalism. [N. Y. Evangelist.

We are glad to find that the editor has made arrangements to secure a regular German correspondence, which, with the resources in his own hands, will enable him to present a record of literary movements abroad, unsurpassed by any of our periodicals. [N. Y. Tribune.

The editor's cultivated taste, comprehensive learning, and literary vigilance, admirably qualify him to give a record of intellectual progress in every civilized country, such as we look for in vain in any cotemporary periodical. [Harper's New Monthly Magazine.

Knickerbocker Magazine for 1851.

EDITED BY LEWIS GAYLORD CLARK.

IN one of the chapters of the Constitution of the State of Massachusetts, yet in force, there is a declaration, "That the encouragement of the Arts and the Sciences, and all good literature, tends to the honor of God, the advantage of the Christian religion, and the great benefit of this and the other United States of America." It has ever been the highest purpose of the Knickerbocker to elevate the standard of American Literature. It has been the medium of introducing many of our most popular authors to the public. To those who take a pride in sustaining a good American Magazine, entirely national in its character, we look for support. Men of judgment need not be told that it is impossible to get up a Magazine entirely original at the same prices at which those made up from foreign sources are sold. The unremitted efforts of the Editor and Publisher will be continued to improve the work.

SPLENDID PREMIUM TO OLD AND NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

The Publisher, grateful for the large increase of patronage which this old favorite of the reading community has received, since it passed into his hands, has determined to offer to the old patrons, and to all new subscribers, a splendid engraving recently published in this city, by Messrs. Goupil, Vibert & Co., from a painting by a well-known American artist, William S. Mount, Esq. This Print is entitled,

"MUSIC IS CONTAGIOUS."

It is 19 by 24 inches, is printed on beautiful paper, and when framed will make a valuable and elegant ornament for the drawing-room or parlor. The price of the Engraving is three dollars. It will be given to all subscribers to the Knickerbocker Magazine who pay their subscription for 1851 in advance, or, during the month of January, 1851, and to all new subscribers who commence with January, 1851, and pay in advance. To entitle subscribers to the Engraving, all payments must be made to the Publisher. Subscribers who owe for more than one year will be expected to settle all arrears and pay for 1851, to entitle them to the Engraving. The bills of specie-paying banks in all parts of the country will be received in payment. The Engraving will be rolled on a stick, and so securely done up, that it can be sent to California, or any other part of the United States, with perfect safety. The number for January, 1851, will commence the thirty-seventh volume of this work.

ST. LEDGER; OR, THE THREADS OF LIFE.

The Publisher has great pleasure in announcing to the readers of the Knickerbocker, and to the public generally, that he has effected an arrangement with Mr. RICHARD B. KIMBALL, the author of this popular and extraordinary Romance, to give the Sequel in the pages of this Magazine. The first chapter appears in the January number, and will be continued regularly until completed. This work has already passed through three editions in this country, and two in England, and has received more favorable notices from the American and English press than any work of fiction which has been issued during the last five years.

TERMS—$5 per annum, in advance. All letters on business must be addressed, post-paid, to

Miscellaneous.

December.

BY WM. OLAND BOURNE.

I have December in my heart,
And piercing winds blow cold and keen—
They rudely rend the robes apart
In which my spring-time Hope was seen.

With frosty hand I strive to wind
The scattered things around my frame—
And some broad oak to get behind
To wake my love-fire's dying flame.

In my bright greenwood I behold
The once-loved trees all stripped and bare,
And, shivering, I endure the cold,
Leafless, like them, in my despair.

The hills which once I loved to climb
In buoyant toil, with Hope in view,
Have lost the spirit's summer time,
And wear a drear, unwelcome hue.

My soul's wide fields of ripening grain,
That promised golden harvests all,
Are blighted with untimely rain,
And scorching drouths, and sere-brown fall.

The silver stream that flowed along
In June's bright day, a flashing tide,
Is frozen; and the boatman's song
Is hushed—my oar is laid aside.

The trees where once I gathered fruit
Creak with the pain of frosted limbs,
And sitting at the sapless root
The driving snow my sight bedims.

How fall Life's storms upon my way!
How pass Life's years from birth till death!
The Spring is Autumn in MY day,
And Summer brings me Winter's breath.

It is December! and erewhile
My sorrowing years shall all be past!
My dying Hope on Sorrow's isle
Asks, "Shall December always last?"

The winds sweep by nor heed my woe—
The frost makes crystals of my tears—
While all around the drifting snow
In trackless plains my grave appears.

Yet comes there, with the Old Year's toll,
In one faint gleam of Hope's pure ray,
In answer, "No! Endure, O Soul!
December shall be turned to May."

[Poems of Hope and Action.

The Mormon City.

An overland traveling correspondent of the St. Louis Intelligencer furnishes the following descriptive sketch of the Mormon capital of Utah :—

The city of the Great Salt Lake is beautifully laid out, within a short distance of the western slope of the mountain forming the eastern end of the valley. It contains eleven or twelve thousand inhabitants, who are mostly engaged in agriculture, though a portion of their time is devoted to mechanical pursuits, when understood. The streets of the city intersect each other at right angles, and each block is half a mile square, with an alley from east to west, and north to south. Each block is called a ward, and has a bishop to preside over its government, whose duties are to act as magistrates, tax collectors, and preachers, as well as street commissioners. The city and all the farming lands are irrigated by streams of beautiful water, which flow from the adjacent mountains. These streams have been with great labor and perseverance led in every direction. In the city they flow on each side of the different streets, and their waters are let upon the inhabitants' gardens at regular periods, so likewise upon the extensive fields of grain lying to the south of the city. There is a field thirty miles long by six and ten wide, a portion of which is cultivated by any who desire. This field was moving with wheat, barley and oats, nearly ready for the sickle when we were at the lake, and a finer field of wheat never grew in any country; the berry was large, full, and plump, and of a superior whiteness. We were convinced that no country in the world could produce better crops than this valley, or larger amount to the acre. The system of irrigation prevents anything like rust or smut striking the crop, to blast the expectation of the farmer. The productiveness of the soil will always secure him an abundant crop.

Within the valley and including three other settlements of this people in the vicinity, there cannot be far from 30,000 inhabitants. Forty miles south they have a village, and another 110 miles farther south, among the Utah Indians—I suppose—where fine forests of all kinds of timber abound, while little or none, for mechanical purposes, excepting pine, grows in the vicinity of the valley.

The character of this people has changed but little since their exodus from the States. The leaders and all appear to be more "free and easy," and the great body as perseveringly industrious and obedient to the higher powers as ever. Money is very plenty among them—principally gold — much of which came from the California mines. The religious character of the whole body has degenerated into mere amusement, frivolity, &c.; not even the semblance of true piety is kept up. In the vicinity of the city is a warm spring which has been brought into the city, and public baths erected. The water is highly medicinal. Each citizen has a building lot appropriated to his use, but is not the absolute owner, as he cannot dispose of it to a gentile without the consent of the church; neither can a Mormon move away or take a journey without the consent of the church. Each member is allowed to take up and cultivate as much land as he pleases, but he can only sell such improvements as he may make upon the land. One tenth of the produce of the land, or the accumulation of each individual, as well as one tenth of his time, belongs to the church, and is rigorously exacted.

The houses are mostly one story high, though some of them are neat little cottages. They have nearly completed a spacious court-house, two stories high and 40 feet square. The first story is built of freestone, and the second of sunburnt brick; houses built of these bricks are very warm in winter and cool in summer, and appear well adapted to the climate. They are about to erect a temple and other public buildings. Eber Kimball's house is a large two story stone building, some 50 feet by 25 feet, yet it is not large enough to contain one half of his numerous wives. The prosperity of this people is truly astonishing. They have flocks and herds, and most of the good things of earth in abundance. We saw about 3,000 of the finest, fattest cattle on an island in the Salt Lake, that we ever put eye upon. In the morning you may see lads driving hundrds of cows from the bounds of the city, to be herded within two or three miles and then driven back at night. The regulations of the valley in regard to stock are, that it shall be fenced, while the gardens and fields are left with a slight protection in the way of a fence.

Brigham Young is the Alpha and Omega of the sect; his word is law. He is emphatically the thinking, breathing organ of this whole people; and yet he is an ordinary-minded man, without the "hard horse" sense of Joe Smith or many of those who surround him; his quiet, good-natured disposition—in short, his amiableness of character has, and will keep him, the leader of Latter Day Saints.

This valley is capable of sustaining a population of 150,000; it is from 30 to 50 miles wide, and from 160 to 180 miles long; nearly the whole valley is fit for cultivation if irrigation be resorted to. Hemmed in on all sides by mountains, upon whose tops lie perpetual snow, one would suppose that the climate is much cooler than it really is in both summer and winter.

Randolph's Duel with Clay.

"The night before the duel," says General James Hamilton, of South Carolina, "Mr. Randolph sent for me. I found him calm, but in a singularly kind and confiding mood. He told me that he had something on his mind to tell me. He then remarked, 'Hamilton, I have determined to receive, without returning, Clay's fire; nothing shall induce me to harm a hair of his head; I will not make his wife a widow, or his children orphans. Their tears would be shed over his grave; but when the sod of Virginia rests on my bosom, there is not in this wide world one individual to pay this tribute upon mine.' His eyes filled, and, resting his head upon his hand, he remained some moments silent. I replied, 'My dear friend, (for ours was a sort of posthumous friendship, bequeathed by our mothers,) I deeply regret that you have mentioned this subject to me; for you call upon me to go to the field and see you shot down, or to assume the responsibility, in regard to your own life, in sustaining your determination to throw it away. But on this subject, a man's own conscience and his own bosom are his best monitors. I will not advise, but under the enormous and unprovoked personal insult you have offered to Mr. Clay, I cannot dissuade. I feel bound, however, to communicate to Col. Tattnall your decision.' He begged me not to do so, and said 'he was very much afraid that Tattnall would take the studs and refuse to go out with him.' I, however, sought Col. Tattnall, and we repaired about midnight to Mr. Randolph's lodgings, whom we found reading Milton's great poem. For some moments he did not permit us to say one word in relation to the approaching duel; and he at once commenced one of those delightful criticisms on a passage of this poet, in which he was wont so enthusiastically to indulge. After a pause, Col. Tattnall remarked, 'Mr. Randolph, I am told you have determined not to return Mr. Clay's fire; I must say to you, my dear sir, if I am only to go out to see you shot down, you must find some other friend.' Mr. Randolph remarked that it was his determination. After much conversation on the subject, I induced Col. Tattnall to allow Mr. Randolph to take his own course, as his withdrawl, as one of the friends, might lead to very injurious misconstructions. At last Mr. Randolph, smiling, said, 'Well, Tattnall, I promise you one thing, if I see the devil in Clay's eye, and that with malice prepense, he means to take my life, I may change my mind.' A remark I knew he made merely to propitiate the anxieties of his friend.

"Mr. Clay and himself met at four o'clock the succeeding evening, on the banks of the Potomoc. But he saw 'no devil in Clay's eye,' but a man fearless, and expressing the migled sensibility and firmness which belonged to the occasion.

"I shall never forget this scene as long as I live. It has been my misfortune to witness several duels, but I never saw one, at least in its sequel, so deeply affecting. The sun was just sitting behind the blue hills of Randolph's own Virginia. Here were two of the most extraordinary men our country, in its prodigality, had produced, about to meet in mortal combat. Whilst Tattnall was loading Randolph's pistol, I approached my friend, I believed, for the last time. I took his hand; there was not in its touch the quivering of one pulsation. He turned to me and said, 'Clay is calm, but not vindictive—I hold my purpose, Hamilton, in any event; remember this.' On handing him his pistol, Col. Tattnall sprang the hair trigger. Mr. Randolph said, 'Tattnall, although I am one of the best shots in Virginia, with either a pistol or gun, yet I never fire with the hair trigger; besides, I have a thick buckskin glove on, which will destroy the delicacy of my touch, and the trigger may fly before I know where I am.' But, from his great solicitude for his friend, Col. Tattnall insisted upon hairing the trigger. On taking their position, the fact turned out as Mr. Randolph anticipated; his pistol went off before the word, with the muzzle down.

"The moment this event took place, Gen. Jessup, Mr. Clay's friend, called out that he would instantly leave the ground with his friend, if that occurred again. Mr. Clay at once exclaimed that it was an accident, and begged that the gentleman might be allowed to go on. On the word being given Mr. Clay fired without effect, Mr. Randolph discharging his pistol in the air. The moment that Mr. Clay saw that Mr. Randolph had thrown away his fire, with a gush of sensibility, he instantly approached Mr. Randolph, and said, with an emotion I can never forget —'I trust in God, my dear sir, you are untouched; after what has occurred, I would not have harmed you for a thousand worlds.'"

The close of this passage in Randolph's career, makes too complete a picture to be omitted. Returning from his mission as Minister to Russia, broken in health, sick at heart—at death's door—he went into the Senate chamber and took his seat in the rear of Mr. Clay. That gentleman happened at the time to be on his feet addressing the Senate. "Raise me up," said Randolph, "I want to hear that voice again." When Mr. Clay had concluded his remarks, which were very few, he turned round to see from what quarter that singular voice proceeded. Seeing Mr. Randolph, and that he was in a dying condition, he left his place and went to speak to him; as he approached, Mr. Randolph said to the gentleman with him, "Raise me up." As Mr. Clay offered his hand, he said, "Mr. Randolph, I hope you are better, sir." "No, sir," replied Randolph, "I am a dying man, and came here expressly to have this interview with you."

They grasped hands and parted, never to meet more.

The termination of the life was answerable to its desolute course, alone, heirless, dependent on the aid of a poor slave, and the chance charity of strangers—at a quarter before twelve o'clock, on the 24th day of June, 1833, aged sixty years, he breathed his last in a chamber of the City Hotel, No. 41 North-Third street, Philadelphia.

Gambling in New York.

A correspondent of the Tribune, is giving to the New York public some stirring illustrations of the way in which gambling goes on in their midst. We copy one, as a specimen.

Another instance occurs to our memory. The victim was a young lawyer of handsome abilities and good reputation. His habits were unexceptionable in all respects, a regular teetotaler, a diligent man of business, and remarkable for his economy, prudence, and thrift. United by marriage to a young lady of great moral woith and of congenial disposition—sustaining a highly respectable rank in society—and reaping a rich pecuniary reward for the exercise of his talents, his lot in life seemed every way enviable and almost beyond the reach of the temptation into which he finally fell.

Soon after his marriage, he began to deposit $50 a week for safe keeping with his wife. A sum of over $2,000 was thus accumulated. In an evil hour he made the acquaintance of the proprietor of a celebrated raffling house, who applied to him for legal advice. They soon struck up an intimacy. He confided to the raffle-keeper the fact of his having saved the sum above mentioned. This the other determined to get into his own possession. He laid his trap with great art. Having everything in readiness, he closed the legal business on which he had visited the attorney, and invited him to bring his bill to his house that evening for settlement. The lawyer consented. On entering the room he found several gentlemen engaged in a raffle. He was asked to take a seat with them, and was introduced to the players. The stake was small. Each man put up two or three shillings, and the highest throw on three dice took the pool. He was induced to try his hand, and was successful, winning several pools. Elated with his good luck, he left the place, determined to make it another visit. On arriving at his home he made the usual deposit. "That night," we use his own words, "I dreamed of nothing but the raffle. I was haunted with the thoughts of my good luck. When I awoke in the morning I was impatient for the evening to come. All day I counted the hours till the clock struck the time when I could resume the game. As soon as it was fairly dark, I was again at the table. But I had lost my luck. I played late, but could not win, though my losses were small. I continued the game till my opponents closed. Returning the next night, I was again unlucky. I lost in small sums to such an amount that I was obliged to break in upon the deposit of $50, and for the first time failed to intrust it with my wife. I became more and more excited. My brain seemed on fire. I urged my companions to higher play. But all to no purpose. I seemed doomed to the worst fate. At this stage of my career, I was introduced to the Faro Table by a notorious gambler. Here I began to play, flushed with the hope that fortune would turn. My ill-luck pursued me. I lost more than ever. I played for large sums and was always unsuccessful. At length I began to encroach on the deposit. Every thing that I could earn went with it. I scraped all I could together from borrowing of my friends. But it was all in vain. I was stripped of everything. I had become a gambler and was now a beggar."

It is but a few months since this unfortunate man was employed in a suit of considerable importance and a large retaining fee placed in his hands. This was parted with at the Faro Table. He was now desperate. He succeeded in obtaiaing a loan of his client of a few hundred dollars. This went with the rest. Soon after a judgment of a large amount was obtained in favor of his client. The money was paid over to him on Friday, and before Sunday morning it was all gone. He then saw that disgrace and punishment would follow exposure. Pawning his office furniture and law-books, he raised the wind enough to enable him to leave the city clandestinely. His family was left in destitution and misery, ignorant of the cause of the cruel treatment they had received, and have since separated from him entirely.

We might multiply incidents of a similar charactor to any extent. But we need say no more to show the pernicious effects of this nefarious game, which holds such a prominent rank in the fatal series through which the gambler is hurried to irredeemable perdition.

A Siberian Winter.

The traveler in Siberia, during the winter, is so enveloped in furs that he can scarcely move, and under the thick fur hood, which is fastened to the bear skin collar, and covers the whole face, one can only draw in, as it were by stealth, a little of the external air, which is so keen that it causes a very peculiar feeling to the throat and lungs. The distance from one halting place to another takes about ten hours, during which time the traveler must always continue on horseback, as the cumbrous dress makes it insupportable to wade through the snow. The poor horses suffer at least as much as their riders, for besides the general effect of the cold, they are tormented by ice forming in their nostrils, and stopping their breathing. When they intimate this by a distressed snort and a convulsive shake of the head, the drivers relieve them by taking out the pieces of ice to save them from being suffocated. When the icy ground is not covered by snow, their hoofs often burst from the effect of the cold. The caravan is always surrounded by a thick cloud of vapor; it is not only living bodies which produce this effect, but even the snow smokes. These evaporations are instantly changed into millions of needles of ice, which fill the air, and cause a constant slight noise, resembling the sound of torn satin or thick silk. Even the reindeer seeks the forest to protect himself from the intensity of the cold. In the tundras where there is no shelter to be found, the whole herd crowd together as close as possible to gain a little warmth from each other, and may be seen standing in this way quite motionless. Only the dark bird of winter, the raven, still cleaves the icy air wtih slow and heavy wing, leaving behind him a long line of thin vapor, marking the track of his solitary flight.

The influence of the cold extends even to inanimate natures. The thickest trunks of trees are rent asunder with a loud sound, which, in these deserts, falls on the ear like a signal shot at sea; large masses of rocks are torn from their ancient sites; the ground in the tundras and in the rocky valleys cracks, forming wide yawning fissures from which the waters which were beneath the surface rise, giving off a cloud of vapor, and become immediately changed into ice. The effect of this degree of cold extends even beyond the earth. The beauty of the deep polar star, so often and so justly praised, disappears in the dense atmosphere which the intensity of cold produces. The stars still glisten in the firmament, but their brilliancy is dimmed.

An Old Writer on Slavery.

It may not be uninteresting to our readers to be reminded of what Montesquieu, just a century since, wrote of Negro Slavery. The passage quoted occurs in The Spirit of the Laws, which was first published in 1748.

"If I had to defend our rights to make Slaves of the Negroes, this is what I should say :—

"The people of Europe having exterminated those of America, they were obliged to make slaves of the Africans in order to make use of them in clearing so vast a territory.

"Sugar would be dear if the plant that produces it were not cultivated by Slaves.

"These creatures are black from head to foot, and they have such a flat nose that it is almost impossible to pity them.

"It is not to be supposed that God, who is a very wise Being, has put a soul, especially a good soul, into a body entirely black.

"The color of the skin may be determined by that of the hair, which with the Egyptians, the best philosophers, was of so great consequence, that they put to death all the red-haired men who fell into their hands.

"A proof that Negroes have not common sense is, that they think more of a glass necklace than of gold, which, among polished nations, is of so great consequence.

"It is quite impossible to suppose that these creatures are men, for if we suppose them men, it might be suspected that we ourselves are Christians.

"Some small minds exaggerated the injustice done to the Africans. But if it were as they say, would not the Sovereigns of Europe, who make so many useless conventions, have taken it into their heads to make a general one in favor of mercy and pity?"

Medical Interpretation of Dreaming.

Dreaming, as the precursor and accompaniment of diseases, deserves continued investigation; not because it is to be considered as a spiritual divination, but because the unconscious language often very clearly shows to those who can comprehend its meaning, the state of the patient. According to Albert, lively dreams are in general a sign of the excitement of nervous actions; soft dreams are a sign of slight irritation of the brain—after a nervous fever, announcing the approach of a favorable crisis: frightful dreams are a sign of determination of blood to the head: dreams about fire are, in women, signs of impending hemorrhage: dreams about blood and red objects are signs of inflammatory conditions: dreams about rain and water are often signs of diseased mucous membranes and dropsy: dreams of distorted form are frequently a sign of abdominal obstruction and disorder of the liver: dreams in which the patient sees any part of the body especially suffering, indicate disease of the part: dreams about death often precede apoplexy, which is connected with determination of blood to the head. The nightmare (incubus ephialtes,) with great sensitiveness, is a sign of determination of the blood to the chest. We may add, that dreams of dogs, after the bite of a mad dog, often precede the appearance of hydrophobia, but may be only the consequence of excited imagination.—Dr. Winslow's Journal of Psychological Medicine.

Rules for Home Education.

1. From your children's earliest infancy inculcate the necessity of instant obedience.
2. Unite firmness with gentleness. Let your children understand that you mean exactly what you say.
3. Never promise them any thing, unless you are quite sure you can give them what you promise.
4. If you tell a little child to do some thing, show him how to do it, and see that it is done.
5. Always punish your children for wilfully disobeying you, but never punish them in anger.
6. Never let them perceive that they can vex you or make you lose your self-command.
7. If they give way to petulance and temper, wait till they are calm, and then gently reason with them on the impropriety of their conduct.
8. Remember that a little present punishment, when the occasion arises, is much more effectual than the threatening of a greater punishment, should the fault be renewed.
9. Never give your children any thing because they cry for it.
10. On no account allow them to do at one time, what you have forbidden, under the circumstances, at another.
11. Teach them that the only sure and easy way to appear good is to be good.
12. Accustom them to make their little recitals with perfect truth.
13. Never allow of tale-bearing.

ECLIPSES FOR 1851.—There will be four eclipses in 1951, two of the sun and two of the moon. A partial eclipse of the moon, on the 17th of January, will be visible on this continent. An anular eclipse of the sun on the 1st of February, invisible in North America, but central and vertical in the Indian Ocean, near the Isle of Java. A partial eclipse of the moon on the 18th of July, visible throughout the United States: first contact with shadow, 1 o'clock 6 min; middle of eclipse, 2 o'clock, 35 min.; last contact with shadow, 4 o'clock, 8 min.; mean time, morn.; magnitude of eclipse, 8 2-5 digits on moon's southern limb. A total eclipse of the sun, on the 18th July, partially visible, as follows: Beginning of eclipse 7 o'clock, 30 min. A. M.; middle, 9 o'clock, 37 min. A. M.; end of eclipse, 7 min. P. M. This eclipse will be total at Baffin's Bay, Labrador, a part of Greenland, and in the Atlantic Ocean, east of Newfoundland. Eclipse on the sun's northern light.

Turkish Method of Treating Horses.

The late Commodore Porter, when envoy of the United States at Constantinople, had a horse cured of founder by a Turkish farrier, in the following manner :—"The Turk said the horse must be bled in the side of his diseased leg. He put a nipper on his nose to keep him steady—then took up the left leg, and crossing it over the right, gave it to an attendant; he then struck his lancet into the vain, a little above the fetlock joint, and took from it about three and a half pounds of blood. The vain bled freely. He now said he had taken enough; he then went to the very opposite side of the leg, and striking his lancet into a vein above the knee joint, a single drop of blood exuded, and both that and the first opened vein instantly ceased bleeding. There may be no novelty in this, but it certainly astonished me to find that opening two veins in the same limb, stopped both from bleeding; such is the fact, for I witnessed it. He desired that the horse should rest the next day—that he should then be rode with great violence until he was in a profuse perspiration —the diseased limb then to be rubbed with wet salt—(to which I added a pint of hot brandy)—then rubbed dry, and then walked about until cool, and covered with blankets; the same process to be repeated the next day—which was done, and all lameness from that time disappeared; the horse the third day was perfectly well.—North American Farmer.

Bread.

Bread, when just taken out of the oven, should never be eaten by persons of weak health, as it contains a great quantity of carbonic gas, which is given off as it cools, and its place is supplied with oxygen. This is the reason why people can eat a great deal more of new than old bread. The atmosphere is a source of food to man as well as vegetables, and the relationship of different kinds of food to the animal economy in connection with the gases ought to form a part of our studies. Those who study domestic economy, and use bread that has been cooled in an airy apartment, are to be commended as much for consulting health, as for studying the way to make "the means meet the end." Any person is able to eat more new than old bread, and this simple fact is evidence that the stomach is no mean judge between quality and quantity. Bread that is somewhat old can be refreshed by being steamed in a steamer, or dipped in water and put in the oven, after which it should be cooled before using. The less yeast that is used to make bread, it will be found to be none the worse, although a little more labor is required to make it. In this lies the grand secret of the difference in the quality of bread. The French pull all their dough and make good bread, but the same effect can be produced by using a little yeast and working the dough a number of times.

A Flower in Your Room.

A fire in winter, a flower in summer! If you can have a fine print or picture all the year round, so much the better; you will always have a bit of sunshine in your room, whether the sky be clear or not. But, above all, a flower in summer!

Most people have yet to learn the true enjoyment of life; it is not fine dresses, of large houses, or elegant furniture, or rich wines, or gay parties, that make homes happy. Really, wealth cannot purchase pleasures of a higher sort; these depend not on money, or money's worth: it is the heart, and taste, and intellect, which determine the happiness of men; which give the seeing eye and the sentient nature, and without which man is little better than a kind of walking clothes-horse.

A snug and clean home, no matter how tiny it be, so that it be wholesome; windows, into which the sun can shine cheerily; a few good books (and who need be without a few good books in these days of universal cheapness?) no duns at the door, and the cupboard well supplied, and with a flower in your room!—and there is none so poor as not to have about him the elements of pleasure.

SAUCE FOR A GANDER.—The following note, says the Worcester Tribune, of Dec. 21st, was disemboweled from a venerable gander that met with a purchaser in our market yesterday. The eater has undoubtedly found in it the necessary suggestion of patience preparatory to the work of consumption :—This old gentleman has been a faithful farmer for nineteen years seven months and ten days. His eyesight failed or you would not have been so lucky as to get him. His old wife mourns his absence, I expect—I have not spoken to her on the subject—Her health is failing and perhaps you will get her for Thanksgiving next year. Good bye!" The vender we have no doubt stuffed the gander as full of truth he did the purchaser of falsehood.

SNAGS IN THE MISSISSIPPI.—A writer in the Louisville Journal, who has given the subject much examination, states that in the Mississippi river, between Carlo and New Orleans, there are at least six thousand snags —which is less than the average estimate of the pilots and steamboat captains who are acquainted with the stream. The number of steamboats passing daily by every point between the two places named, will, it is said, average nearly twenty—each boat, with the freight, is valued at over $40,000—making in all over half a million of dollars. The crews and passengers exceed a thousand. So it is shown that the obstructions in the navigation referred to daily imperil half a million of dollars worth of property, and the lives of a thousand persons.

COLORING BLUE.—An exchange gives the following directions for a simple blue dye ready for use at all times :

Put one ounce of pulverised indigo into three ounces of oil of vitriol. The bottle should not be more than one-third full, as it sometimes ferments. Let it stand at least two weeks, the older the better. Shake it well once a day for a week or more; if too thick, add water and alum, will color any shade of blue in five minutes." Of course, plenty of water and plenty of care must be used along without it.

Solitary reading and study enable a man to gather a great deal of information, of one sort or other; but conversation enables him to make the most judicious, happy, and profitable use of it.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year of this Seminary, for 1850 and '51, will commence the third Wednesday in August, and continue forty-four weeks, including a short recess between the terms, and one of ten days for the winter Holidays.

The year is divided into three terms:—

The first, of 14 weeks, begins Wednesday, August 21st, and ends Wednesday, November 27th.

The second, of 15 weeks, begins Monday, December 2d, and ends Friday, March 14th.

The third, of 14 weeks, begins Tuesday, March 18th and ends Tuesday, June 24th.

Board of Instruction.

GURDON EVANS, A. M., President,
And Professor of Mathematics and Natural Science.
Rev. JOSEPH W. MORTON,
Professor of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, Spanish, and Moral and Intellectual Science.
Mrs. SUSANNA M. SPICER, Preceptress.
ADOLPH ROSENHAYN,
(Late of Friedrick Wilhelm College, Berlin,)
Teacher of German, Piano Forte, and Assistant in Greek and Latin.

Other competent Teachers will be employed as occasion may demand.

TEACHERS' CLASSES will be formed, as usual, at the beginning of the Fall and middle of the Winter Terms, and continue seven weeks.

In the Common Branches, classes will be formed at the commencement of each term; but in the higher, the interest of the student, as well as the welfare of the Institution, demand that a more systematic course of study be pursued.

In the Natural Sciences, Elementary Chemistry and Philosophy will be pursued during the Fall Term Agricultural Chemistry, Astronomy, and Physiology during the Winter Term; Botany and Geology during the Summer Term.

Classes will be formed in Latin, French, and German, at the commencement of the Fall Term; in Hebrew, Greek, and Spanish, at the commencement of the Winter Term, and continue through the course of study.

In Mathematics, Geometry is studied in the Fall, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, and Astronomy, Surveying, Navigation, &c., in the Summer Term.

The course of instruction in Agriculture is thorougly scientific, embracing study and recitation in the best authors. Instruction is given in a well-furnished laboratory, in the analysis of soils, ashes of plants, manures, &c. and the modes of testing for their constituent elements. The attention of farmers who wish to give their sons a practical education is especially called to this department.

Board in private families, from $1 25 to $1 50. Many students board in clubs for 60 to 75 cents.

TUITION—to be settled upon entering school—from $3 00 to $5 00. EXTRAS—For Drawing, $1 00; Oil Painting, $5 00; Chemical Experiments, $1 00; Writing, including stationery, 50 cents; Piano Forte, $8 00; Use of Instrument, $2 00; Agricultural Chemistry, including chemicals, apparatus, and fuel, (breakage extra,) $12 00.

It is very desirable that students should enter at the beginning of the term; yet they are received into classes already formed at any time.

For farther information, address Gurdon Evans, J. W. Morton, or Rev. J. R. Irish, President of the Corporation.

"CHURCH ACTION ON SABBATH DESECRATION."

At a regular church-meeting of the First Seventh-day Baptist Church of Alfred, N. Y., held Jan. 5th, 1851, the undersigned was appointed a Committee, on behalf of the church, to make a statement of its proceedings in relation to "Sabbath Desecration," in explanation of an article that appeared in the Sabbath Recorder of Dec. 26, 1850.

It is claimed by the church, that the article above referred to is not a clear exposition of its doings. It is not affirmed, that there is any misstatement or intended error in said article, but that the injustice done consists in the want of completeness or amplification touching the ground upon which the "Report" was rejected.

In the first place, the "Report" was not rejected because it condemned journeying, harvesting, sugar-making, and kindred employments, on the Sabbath. But the objection lay in this, that the Report unjustly placed "cheese-making" in the same category with the things above mentioned, as did also the resolution of the church adopted in May, 1841, (which resolution, it is said, however, was passed by a very small majority.) Hence it is said that the odium justly attached to the above named offenses unjustly attaches to cheese-making. It was argued, that there was no such parallelism existing between them as to justify such association. The dissimilarity was said to consist chiefly in this, that there is no law of nature requiring us to extract the sap or cut the hay or grain on the Sabbath. But nature does require that we extract the milk upon the Sabbath day. It was said, that if we were obliged to cut our hay or grain upon the Sabbath, the inference would be palpable, that we must also save it upon the Sabbath; especially so, if it was naturally incapable of lying over without damage or absolute loss. It was then argued, that cheese-making came under this rule. Nature requires to draw the milk upon the Sabbath as upon other days; to fail to do this, would evidently be wrong. Now, it was said, that it was unreasonable, and an altogether unknown principle, to maintain that the law of God in revelation was so opposed to his law in nature, that it required us to waste that which nature, unsought, placed in our hands—that it was utterly irreconcilable with the Savior's declaration, that "the Sabbath was made for man."

It being granted that we are required to save the milk, the question next to be considered is, How shall it be saved? In other words, to what use shall it be appropriated? Here the Report takes the ground that no works but those of mercy are to be tolerated; consequently, no use can be made of the milk except as it shall conform to this principle. The language of the Report is as follows: "In imitation of Christ, then, we may, in the shortest manner possible, labor to satisfy the common, natural demands of men and animals, and to mitigate their sufferings;" "beyond this we most firmly believe that the Bible affords no warrant for labor on the Sabbath day, and that all labor, aside from this, is forbidden by the spirit and letter of the law." It will be seen, then, that the idea of saving the milk, even by the least possible labor, is by the Report distinctly condemned; consequently, to set the milk for butter is equally a violation of the law as is cheese-making. And let it be distinctly observed, that the milk of one cow is as much subject to this rule as the milk of ten or fifty; therefore, according to the doctrine of the Report, the man who has but one cow can only use the milk—not save it. To return to the question, In what form may the milk be saved? The principle laid down, in opposition to the Report, is this, that we are to pursue that course which best excludes waste coupled with the least labor. Here, let it be distinctly undersood, the doctrine is not one of gain, but of saving; and upon this point it was maintained, by those fully conversant with the business, that cheese-making was as unobjectionable, upon the whole, as any other form. For these reasons, the Report, so far as cheese-making was concerned, was judged unsound, and therefore rejected.

Again, it was argued that the doctrine of the Report was unreasonable, as it condemned what are called works of necessity. To illustrate, suppose that by fires, or floods, or other providential and unavoidable circumstances, by cattle or otherwise, the farmer's crops are exposed to damage; he is forbidden to do fifteen or even five minutes' labor, not to earn, but to save his property. Now this, it is said, is a manifest overdoing of the subject.

Again, it was argued, that the Report was inconsistent with itself, or that it made Christ a sinner. Take the case of the impotent man whose healing is recorded in John 5: 1, 9. Here, it will be observed, that the Savior commanded him to "take his bed and walk." This, it was said, was clearly not an act of mercy. It was readily granted that the healing performed by the blessed Savior upon the impotent man was an act of mercy. But was the carrying of his bed an act of mercy also? It follows that there are works of necessity which may be done on the Sabbath. To argue that this particular act was lawful because the Savior commanded it, is equivalent to saying that Christ commanded the doing of that which, aside from the command, would be unlawful. If this be true, then Jesus came to do more than to "fulfill the law;" he came to authorize its violation. And will any man in his senses argue that Jesus Christ, in order to destroy scepticism, authorizes the violation of the law of God? Would not this utterly destroy his claim to a divine mission, and undermine Christianity? The declaration that Christ was "Lord of the Sabbath," by no means warrants us in supposing that he was above or against the law, but that he had power to determine what was lawful and what was not lawful.

The Report was further opposed upon the ground that it was an unjust interference with the lawful business of a large class of citizens, whose business was of vital importance to the community at large; that the prosperity of the farming interest was essential to the prosperity of any and every other industrial pursuit; and more, that the tendency of this course was to array class against class, which was regarded as unwise and hurtful.

Against the whole system of resolutions defining the meaning of scripture, upon which definitions discipline may be predicated, it was urged that it was pernicious in many respects. 1. Because of its uncertainty of being right, on account of the weakness of the human judgment as well as the strength of human passions and prejudices. How are the best of men exposed to error from these sources! 2. It opposes reform, because men are inclined, when they are pledged by resolutions, to defend them and the doctrines and principles they contain, with a tenacity and zeal blinded by pride of opinion, and veneration for the opinions of others, which defies even the truth! 3 Because it denies the right of private judgment, and those liberties essential to its healthy and free exercise. 4. Universal history affirms the evils attendant upon this course. For illustration, look at the Roman Catholic church. The law of God is buried and utterly lost sight of. But are its decisions and resolutions? Nay, verily. And what has become of private judgment in that church? Why, one might as well undertake to seek the body of Moses as for it! And what are her defenses against the truth of Almighty God, from which she has so long and so successfully shielded herself? Why, her decisions. And where is rational independence in that church? There is no such thing. Unmanly servility pervades the whole mass! And why is all this? Why, because they are subjected, from their infancy, to the imperious decisions of Councils and Popes, and their manhood is crushed beneath this pervading power.

It was remarked, that the true course to be pursued upon matters like these, where, from the very nature of the subject, a measure of doubt must necessarily attend our decisions, was to leave every man free to act for himself, as for himself he must give account to his God. If we attempt to enforce discipline in these cases, where men's convictions were not with us, dissatisfaction and disgust would certainly ensue, and finally divisions and strife would increase, until brethren would become alienated, and the spirit of revolt would generate a consumption which would not only weaken the church, but threaten its very existence.

The motion to rescind the resolutions of the church condemning Secret Societies, Slavery, and Intemperance, was introduced by one of the Committee whose names are attached to the rejected Report, immediately after the act of rejection occurred. And as there was manifested considerable feeling at the time, which had been excited during the discussion of the Report, it was thought best to dismiss the subject for the present.

I have thus given, as well as I am able, the arguments offered against the Report, and the reasons for rejecting it, or, rather, rescinding the resolutions of 1841. I have not attempted to give the words of the several speakers, but to represent truly their ideas. In some instances the arguments, as offered before the church, were far more lengthy than what appears in this article, and in others they were more brief; in both cases, however, I have endeavored fully to present the thought. THE RELIGION OF HAYTI.

A writer in the Journal of the American and Foreign Christian Union describes the influence of Romanism in Hayti as disgusting and horrible. The mass, processions, benedictions, and a host of other coarse superstitions, are the essential parts of religion in the island. God is almost unknown there. The virgin and saints are mainly worshiped. They have recourse to these and similar divinities in all circumstances. "Do they lose any thing? It is to St. Anthony they betake themselves. Are they sick? They begin by washing three times in holy water." We quote farther:—

About five months since, the child Jesus, Mary and Joseph, descended on a palm-tree not far from Port-au-Prince. This miracle made much noise in the island, and the prodigy is so much the more surprising that the child Jesus, Mary and Joseph, are of a black color. Moreover, Mary holds a crown which she places on the head of a man. Then come the blessings; they bless every thing, and it is here that the principal resource of the priest consists. When the curate is absent, his house-keeper, or rather concubine, gives the blessing and takes the money.

All the children wear on their breasts a leaden, pewter, or silver cross, according to the means of their parents. Gold crosses are especially held in great veneration! These unfortunate people believe that if any one has a cross of gold in his house, all is safe. I have been assured that many persons have committed theft to procure a gold cross. The church of Gonaives was robbed a few years ago, and the robber having been discovered, said that he had committed this theft only in order to get a golden cross. Nevertheless he was shot. The masses said for the dead are in great vogue in Hayti. Sometimes a hundred candles are burning during the mass. When the service is over, the parents take to music, go off to eat and drink, and then dance all the rest of the day.

IMPORTANCE OF LITTLE THINGS.

The National Preacher for November contains a sermon on the importance of little things, from the pen of Rev. Dr. Potts. Under the fourth head, the preacher groups together the following facts, as illustrative of his text, "Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth."

It was a mere trifle that prevented Oliver Cromwell, and several others who afterwards distinguished themselves as his associates, from emigrating to the colonies of the New World some time before the first steps were taken in that revolution which cost the monarch of England his head, expatriated his family, and elevated Cromwell to the seat of highest authority in the nation. Cromwell and his friends had engaged their passage to America, and were only awaiting the signal to embark, when, by some caprice of the Court, they were prohibited from leaving the country. Had any accident occurred to delay the order of the Court, until after they should have commenced their voyage to the American colonies, who can tell how different might have been the aspect of affairs over all Europe at the present hour. It is far from improbable that the destiny of the English nation and of Europe hung upon that single event, the arrival or non-arrival of the court-courier, before the change of wind to favor Cromwell's embarkation. The life of a monarch and the destinies of a proud nation hung upon the speed of a horse.

Another striking illustration of the influence of little things, is found in the history of the negro race. The celebrated Bartholomew de las Casas, a Spanish prelate, who accompanied Columbus in his second voyage to Hispaniolia, and on the conquest of Cuba settled there, moved by compassion for the sufferings of the native Indians, who were worked as slaves in the mines by the Spaniards, conceived the idea of sparing this feeble race, that were fast passing away, by substituting negroes, a much more athletic race, and that were to be obtained from the Portuguese settlements on the coast of Africa. After petitioning the Spanish government successively under Ferdinand, the regent Cardinal Ximenes, and then Charles V., he succeeded. In 1503, a few negro slaves had been sent into St. Domingo, and afterwards Ferdinand allowed the importation of large numbers. The labor of one negro was found equal to that of four Indians. Ximenes discouraged the traffic; Charles V. revived it, and conferred the privilege as a monopoly on a Flemish favorite. In 1518 the right was sold to some Genoese merchants, who reduced the traffic to a regular system. The French obtained it next, and retained it till it had yielded them a revenue of two hundred and four millions of dollars. In 1713, the English secured it for thirty years. For the last four of these years, Spain purchased the English right for five hundred thousand dollars.

Thus, through the mistaken benevolence of a Spanish priest, a measure was set on foot, which the cupidity of Christian Europe turned into a system of fearful cruelty, a system by the operation of which the commerce of the world, and the aspect of all civilized society, has been affected; a system which seems likely, in God's overruling providence, to convulse one of the mightiest nations on the globe, and eventually to return light and peace, civilization and Christianity, on the eighty millions of African tribes. How great a matter a little fire kindleth.

Another instance: In August, 1799, a French artillery officer, named Bouchard, when digging near Rosetta, in Egypt, for the foundation of a military work, came upon a huge block of basalt, marked with various strange characters and hieroglyphics. These characters were found to exhibit three inscriptions, in three different characters, one of which proved to be the Greek. This was the celebrated Rosetta stone, now in the British Museum, which has been the subject of diligent investigation by learned antiquarians of every nation in Europe; and this stone, under the ingenious labors of Young and Champollion, yielded, by a comparison of the characters found in the different inscriptions, a key to unlock the treasures of ancient wisdom, shut up for so many centuries, under the hieroglyphics of Egypt.

The discovery of a small obelisk on the isle of Philoë, in the Nile, in 1816, by Caillaud, the French traveler, on which was a Greek inscription containing the names of Ptolemy and Cleopatra, greatly aided Champollion in unraveling the mystery. Thus, as the result of the seemingly trivial event of finding an old broken stone at Rosetta, and a little obelisk, years afterwards, at Philoë, the industry of antiquarians was set to work, and that industry has been crowned with astonishing success.

The inscriptions found on the decaying monuments, and on the frail papyri of Egypt, are now quite intelligible; the ancient records of Egyptian dynasties are rapidly opening to the inspection of all men. Thence, the infidel is drawing largely his materials for renewed assault on the records of revelation; and the Christian is patiently awaiting the issue of a finished discovery among these old monuments, perfectly confident that the truth of human records, once fully made out, will fall naturally and inevitably into the train of the handmaids and supporters of revelation.

Little did the French artillery officer dream, when the men working under his direction first heaved up that dark and mutilated block near Rosetta, that around that old stone, and over its mutilated inscriptions, the friends and enemies of the ancient Jewish Scriptures would rally for a long and arduous, and possibly a final conflict, as to the truth of revealed religion. How great a matter a little fire kindleth.

And often it is seen, that some unlooked for and seemingly trivial event, baffles the foresight of men, frustrates their plans, and defeats their most important enterprises. A sudden tempest will sometimes scatter and destroy a numerous and well-appointed fleet. The fate of a battle on which are hanging the destinies of empires will sometimes be decided by a thick mist, a driving storm, or by a random shot which cuts down an experienced leader, and spreads a resistless panic through his whole army.

In private life, also, results of great magnitude flow from causes apparently insignificant. The flight of a bird, the fall of an apple from the tree, the course taken by a flash of lightning, or the singing of a tea-kettle over the fire, may give birth to a train of thought in the mind of some quiet observer, that shall lead to conclusions little anticipated, elicit new discoveries in science, and open the way for improvements in art, of the first importance to commerce, and to the practical business of life, and diffuse incalculable benefit among millions of our race.

Again, the accidental meeting of two entire strangers, may lead to an acquaintanceship that shall ripen into friendship strong and enduring—throw an entirely new aspect over the emotions, the sentiments, the pursuits, and the whole character of both, and send its influence, healthful and cheering, or the reverse, over the whole life, aye, and over the immortal interests of both, possibly even of others with them. Many a well-disposed youth has been led by the influence of a cherished companion, into scenes of gayety and pleasures of dissipation and vice. His mind has been poisoned, his principles perverted, his character degraded. While others, by the kind counsel, the cheering influence, and the gentle force of consistent example in a faithful friend, have been strengthened in virtue, habituated to what is good and honorable, and humbled even to seek to obtain the pearl of great price. "He that walketh with wise men shall be wise, but a companion of fools shall be destroyed." And it is often the merest accident, apparently, which determines whether a youth shall be the companion of wise men or of fools, whether he shall be honorable and good or base and worthless, whether he shall be saved or lost forever.

A CROSSING SWEEPER TURNED AUTHOR.

The story of the black sweeper of the crossing at St. Paul's is now going the round of the papers as an illustration of the vicissitudes of fortune. As a companion to it, that of the idiot-looking sweeper who has just written and published his moral history, deserves to be mentioned as a fine exemplification of the power of truth, and of the care of Providence. The poor man to whom we refer, was brought up in St. George's workhouse, and treated as an impracticable idiot. Wearied of the monotonous and inactive life of the workhouse, he made his escape when a boy, and wandered through the different parts of England, Scotland, and Wales, visiting the Land's End at one extremity, John O'Groat's on another, and Holyhead at a third. His accommodation for the night was often of the most humble description. He slept in sheds, empty brick-kilns, or in the straw with calves or pigs. Driven by extremity to beg, he was often thrown into prison. During his confinement on one occasion, he took up a Bible placed in his cell, and, to while away the tedious hours, read a considerable portion. The effect upon his mind was remarkable and decisive. From that time he formed habits of devotion, veracity and industry. His struggles to gain a respectable footing in society were very severe and long-protracted. Having neither trade nor friends, and clothed in rags, it taxed all his ingenuity to find the means of honest support. He began with "lucifers and cotton," tried the "docks," and for a time established himself at a "crossing." Always on the alert to gain an inch higher in the social scale, he left his station to apply for service of another kind, and put his broom behind a gate. He failed in his application, and, in the bargain, lost his broom; for some rival sweeper, or other mischievous person, had purloined it in his absence. This was a great blow and discouragement, and was followed by another still heavier—that of the robbery, during the night, of his clothes by a fellow-lodger. These simple, but, to the poor sweeper of the crossing, disastrous incidents, led to a little change of fortune. He was afterward employed in carrying boards in the streets, or, as he would term it, "giving publicity to an institution at the West End." Talking over matters one fine summer's evening in Hyde Park with a fellow "boardman," in their slow perambulations, it occurred to his companion that his "partner at home" would like to read some account of his wanderings. To oblige his friend, and to cheer his spouse, he bought a half-penny sheet of paper, and began to write the narrative, which has unfolded itself into more than a hundred pages. The style is that of Defoe, but without coarseness; and some passages in it can scarcely be surpassed for simple pathos and moral sublimity. It is likely to come out under the most favorable auspices. The Rev. J. A. James, of Birmingham, has written a recommendatory notice of the work.

THE SHADOW OF A SHADE.

That vile and abject thing, which men call fame,
The wise consider a delusive dream;
It seems as base to them as falsehoods seem,
Frail as a breath—this mockery of a name.
Bringer of grief to such as strive to claim
Before they win, its evanescent crown—
Parent of this double sorrow to the same,
When on their mountain footsteps waits renown.
Ungrateful mistress, to her lovers untrue,
Fickle, capricious, undiscerning, light,
Bestowing favors, as in jest or spite,
More on the cold than them who warmly woo.
But why should I, her humblest slave, upbraid
Fame—to my grasp the shadow of a shade.

OBJECT OF GEO. THOMPSON'S VISIT.

Ever since the pro-slavery aristocracy of Boston refused a hearing to George Thompson, Esq., the British Philanthropist, the papers have had a good deal to say about the object of his visit to this country, some of them representing that he has come in the pay of European Governments, with his "pockets lined with British gold," &c. To expose these false and malicious representations, Mr. Garrison, editor of the Boston Liberator, has published a confidential letter received from Mr. Thompson in October last, and containing the first and only intelligence of his intention to visit the United States. We copy it as an act of justice to Mr. Thompson, and to show what kind of stuff he is made of.

MATLOCK, Derbyshire, Eng., Oct. 3, 1850.

MY DEAR GARRISON:—Start not when I announce to you that I have engaged a passage to Boston in the Canada Mail Steamer, which sails from Liverpool on the 19th inst., and that, should no accident happen to me or the vessel, I hope to take you by the hand on or before the 1st of November.

Now for the objects I seek by this trip for the second time to the shores of the United States.

1. I have an ardent desire to revisit your country, and to renew my acquaintance with those who were my friends in 1835, and to become acquainted, also, with those who, since that eventful period, have become the friends and champions of the cause I advocated, and may therefore be disposed to give a not unfriendly reception to one who, like yourself, was early in the field, and did not shun either the reproach or danger to which abolitionists were exposed during the reign of mob-supremacy. Believe me, it will be most refreshing to me to mingle with the whole-hearted reformers of your city, and of the old Bay State. I gave you some reason to expect me more than two months ago. My visit at that time, however, was impracticable. Parliament was not up, and when it did rise some other engagements, as well as the state of my domestic affairs, prevented me from carrying my wish into fulfillment. I now think I see the possibility of my being absent for four months, without the disregard of any claims upon my time or labors in this country.

2. In addition to my desire to see you and the friends of our common cause, I have a project to carry out, of which America is the field. For some years before I entered Parliament, and at the time I entered it, I had been, and was, in the receipt of an income sufficient to meet all my wants, and to support the position to which I aspired. In less than three months after I became a legislator, that income wholly failed me, and for three years I have been supporting myself and my family upon that which I had hoped I should be able to leave behind me. I am now poor; but hopeful, with unimpaired mental energy, with a constitution yet sound and strong, and a character unassailable by any imputation of selfishness or corruption.

In these circumstances, my thoughts have been turned to the way in which I might, by honorable, independent and useful exertion, repair, in some degree, my shattered fortunes, and provide things honest in the sight of all men. It has occurred to me that, by a visit to the United States of America, at that season of the year when lectures are most in request, I might realize not only enough to pay my expenses, but something also to sustain me for a time after my return. I have, therefore, so far resolved to act upon this idea, as to engage a berth in the Canada, and shall try the experiment, if encouraged and aided by my personal friends in Boston. My visit, then, will be of a business character.

Were I alone in the world, I need not visit America to find the means to live. Could I bring myself to prostitute my talents to party purposes or base objects, I might live here and sustain those I love. Could I condescend to ask favors, I might perhaps find employment, and masters and dictators, as well as labor and its emoluments. I am not alone in the world—I cannot misuse my powers—I will not ask favors of those above me—and I am determined to preserve my independence and my freedom of action as long as I can. These circumstances have appeared to me sufficient to decide me on exporting myself, my lectures, and my self-supporting project, to the shores of New England. I should be truly glad if I could land in Liverpool next spring with the reflection that I was master of enough to carry me over the session of Parliament, and keep the pot boiling at home, while I rebuked the ministry from my seat as the unpaid representative of the people.

Well, in the prospect of my being speedily with you, what do I ask of you as an old friend? First, that you will receive me as the friend who, when the road to fame and fortune was open to him at the bar of England, cast in his lot with you, and took joyfully his share with you in the perils of the old campaign. That you will believe me as warmly as ever the advocate of the cause of the slave. This, let the last refugee that has come to our shore testify. That you will not believe me mercenary. I could sing in a garret, with a crust before me, if I had but myself to care for. That you will believe it is only the love of independence and of my family, and my desire to be here, the incorruptible and unpaid advocate of the people, that makes me devise this scheme for putting money in my pocket. That you will not think the worse of me, because I do not come to throw myself, as I did before, into the anti-slavery cause, exclusively; but to discourse on topics that will bring those to hear me who will not refuse to pay their 25 or 50 cents for the opportunity. Finally, that you will aid my plan. I authorize you to communicate the contents of this letter to Francis Jackson, Wendell Phillips, and Edmund Quincy, and such others as you or they may see fit to take into your counsels. I authorize you to make it known, through the most convenient channels, that I shall be willing to give lectures, if invited to do so, on the terms of other foreign lecturers. I authorize you to arrange for my beginning to lecture within one week of my landing. I can remain with you till the last day of February. If careful, I shall be equal to three lectures a week, in or out of Boston. These I should like to be able to give, and not more; to be delivered in such places, and under such circumstances, as promise the best result.

Until I am with you, I cannot decide the topics of my lectures. All branches of Indian History—the rise and progress of the British power—the resources, condition and prospects of the country, &c., I am familiar with. Lectures on the state of parties in England, the representative system, &c., you may have for the asking. But of this, when I am on the spot.

While thus pursuing with ardor my own personal ends, think not that I shall play the part of a Reed, a Cox, or a Mathews. If not committed already, enough, commit me again, until I shall not, even in the heel, be free from the baptism of ultra abolitionism; but at the same time, enter, as a brother, a father, and a friend, into my object, and suffer me to accomplish the purpose upon which I have set my heart. If the first trip answers, you may see me annually; and I know not but I may lay my bones in the soil sanctified by the footprints of the Pilgrim Fathers.

I have been working very hard lately for the reform movement. The voyage will recruit me. Farewell till we meet.

My affectionate remembrances to all around you.

Yours, dear Garrison, ever most truly,
GEO. THOMPSON.

THE DOUBTFUL HOPE.

I was called upon one day, now many years ago, to visit a gentleman, one of my congregation, who was apparently in a dying state. Not having heard of his illness before, but knowing his previous history, I felt startled and greatly distressed; for he was one who had trifled with religious convictions, and had so stifled them as greatly to abandon his religious connexion; satisfying his conscience by attending one service on the Sabbath, frequently absenting himself altogether, and seeking, in worldly associations and amusements, to silence the voice within, and bury in oblivion the remembrance of past religious impressions. On entering his dying chamber, with a look of unutterable anguish, he exclaimed, "O sir, I am lost! Your very presence condemns me! The sermons you have preached, your private expostulations, all condemn me. O, sir, what is to become of my soul—my poor neglected soul? I have just been told I cannot live! my hours are numbered! I have no pain now; but that is the precursor of death,"—(he was dying of inflammation of the bowels)—"and I shall soon be in eternity! O stifled convictions—a neglected Bible—misimproved Sabbaths—how will ye rise up in judgment to condemn me!" I endeavored to calm his mind, and told him he must not add unbelief to the catalogue of sins; that the Gospel was a revelation of mercy; that the blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin; that whosoever cometh unto him he will in no wise cast out; that he is able to save unto the uttermost all who come unto him.

"Uttermost!" the dying man exclaimed; "uttermost! then there is a gleam of hope even for me, if I had time; but, even now I feel that stage approaching which will absorb my faculties, and terminate my sad life. O! what would I give for one week! one day! O! precious time! how have I wasted it! O, my dear pastor, pity me! pray for me! my thoughts grow confused—I cannot pray myself." I then knelt down and prayed with him, in which he most fervently joined, summoning all his strength to keep awake. I shall never forget the grasp of his hand, when I alluded to the fullness and sufficiency of Divine grace. I left him with feelings which it is impossible for me to describe, and returned, according to promise, in a few hours. I found him still sensible, but evidently sinking under the power of slumber from which he never would awake. In the interval, he had been dwelling on the text suggested, and when he saw me, he feebly but smilingly said, "Able to save to the uttermost! there I must rest my hope." After again commending this dying man to the riches of Divine mercy, I left him, not without hope, but such a hope as I would not for ten thousand worlds risk as my dying solace. [Life of Dr. Fletcher.

PRAYER RECONCILED TO GOD'S WILL.—"How does your ladyship," said the famous Lord Bolingbroke to lady Huntingdon, "reconcile prayer to God for particular blessings with absolute resignation to the Divine will?" "Very easily," answered she, "just as if I was to offer a petition to a monarch, of whose kindness and wisdom I have the highest opinion. In such a case, my language would be; I wish you to bestow on me such a favor; but your majesty knows better than I how far it would be agreeable to you, or right in itself, to grant my desire; I therefore content myself with humbly presenting my petition, and leave the event of it entirely to you."

New York, January 23, 1851.

TIME OF COMMENCING THE SABBATH.

We have no desire to revive the asperities of controversy, but we wish to suggest a few thoughts for the consideration of those who refuse to acknowledge what is commonly called Friday evening as a part of the Sabbath. That the blessing of the Creator was put upon the seventh day, is not disputed; and that in this originates our obligation to keep the Sabbath, is as little disputed. In determining, therefore, at what time the Sabbath properly commences, nothing more is necessary than to determine at what time God's blessing began to take effect; or, in other words, whether his blessing was put upon the Friday evening, or only upon the Saturday. And to determine this question, we must first determine another—When did God begin to rest from his labors? For, as God is said to have "blessed the seventh day and sanctified it, because that in it he had rested from all his work," it is evident that it began to be holy time the very moment that he began to rest. Had God finished his works when Friday evening began? Or did He continue working through Friday night, till the light of the seventh day began to shine? If He had finished when the Friday evening began, his rest [Sabbath] immediately followed; for nothing more is meant by God's resting than simply that he ceased from work. The last of the Creator's works was man. If man was brought into existence before the going down of the sun on the sixth day, the rest of the Creator must have followed immediately.

As "the darkness and the light are both alike to" the All-seeing, there is no particular absurdity in supposing that He may have continued working through the night following the sixth day; and that man, the lord of this lower world, was the product of that night's work. But this is a question, concerning which it would be well to inquire whether the Scripture affords any light. We inquire, therefore, what is the sense of the term "day," as used in Moses' account of the creation? We there find, that "the evening and the morning were the first day," "the evening and the morning were the second day," &c.; and the same sense which the term has in these expressions, it is reasonable to suppose that it has in the expression, "God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it."

We maintain that, in the order of creation, night preceded day. But we do not ground this opinion upon the recorded fact, that "darkness was upon the face of the deep" before the creation of light. For that "darkness" was something very different from what is now known by the name of night. It was a darkness that was absolute, without the least intermixture of luminous rays; whereas what we call night is simply comparative darkness, or the partial absence of light. The darkness of night is never absolute, and never has been since God first said, "Let there be light." It is always more or less mingled with light. But we ground our opinion upon the fact, that the act of dividing the light from the darkness, so as to constitute what is called day, was subsequent to the creation of light. Whence we infer, that when light was first created, it was intermingled with darkness, constituting what is called night; and that it continued so during the first half of the twenty-four hours, that is, till "God divided the light from the darkness," and gathered it into that intensity of effulgence which is known by the name of day. As for the absolute, dreary darkness—the total absence of light—which rested upon chaos, it was something so different in its nature from what we now call night, that it would be scarcely in point to offer it as an argument that night naturally precedes the day. Besides, there is no telling how long that darkness had existed. If any thing is due to the speculations of geology, it may have existed for ages.

As night preceded day in the order of creation, so the historian says, "The evening and the morning were the first day;" placing the evening first, and denoting by it the whole of the night, and by the morning denoting the whole of the day. The term "day," in this place, denotes the natural day, or the period of the earth's revolution upon its axis. It is reasonable to suppose that it has the same meaning in the following verses; and that when, in reference to the seventh day, it was said that God "blessed it and sanctified it," the space of time denoted as thus "blessed" was of twenty-four hours duration, beginning with what is commonly called Friday evening. The conclusion is, that the Creator did not continue to prosecute his work through the night following the sixth day. It was all finished by the setting of the sun.

But we will now suppose ourselves to be altogether wrong in this view. We will suppose that the term "day," as employed in the first chapter of Genesis, denotes nothing but the light part of the twenty-four hours; and for proof of this we will rest, as our opponents in this controversy do, upon what is said in the fifth verse, "God called the light day," fortifying it with our Saviour's words, "Are there not twelve hours in the day?" John 11: 9. We will suppose, also, that the terms "morning" and "evening" are equivalent to forenoon and afternoon; and that the latter is mentioned first, not because it was so in the order of creation, but on the same principle that "the latter rain" is mentioned before "the former," in Hos. 6: 3. It follows, then, that in each day's history of the creation—second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth—we have no allusion to the night, or dark part of the twenty-four hours, whatever. It is simply a record of what was done during the day. Only in connection with the first day have we any allusion to night. Be it so. It follows irresistibly, then, that by the close of the light part of the sixth day God had finished all his works. "The evening and the morning were the sixth day," this verse being, according to the principles of our opponents, a record of what God did during the day; not of any thing that He did during the night, either preceding or following. For that which God called day was the light. Verse 5. Hence God's rest, or cessation from work, commenced immediately with the darkness which followed the sixth day. If God's rest commenced then, ours, being a commemoration of his, should commence at the same time.

It is recorded that "God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it." And here our opponents, availing themselves of the statement in the fifth verse, argue that only the light part of the twenty-four hours—the artificial day—was blessed. But why was it blessed? The historian tells us, that it was "because that in it God had rested from all his work." But this reason is just as applicable to the night preceding the seventh day, as to the day itself. For, according to the principles of our opponents, the Creator must have finished his works by the close of the light part of the sixth day. Therefore the blessing was actually put upon the night preceding the seventh day; and thus the very principles of our opponents furnish the proof, that the term "day," in all these places, (excepting only verse 5th,) signifies the natural day, or the period of the earth's revolution upon its axis.

There can be no question, that the Jews always understood the law to require the observance of the Friday evening. In the synagogue of Capernaum, our Savior dispossessed a man of an unclean spirit on the Sabbath day. The same day he healed Peter's wife's mother of a fever. The people at large, because they had a superstitious reverence for the day, would not bring their sick till the Sabbath was well over. But "when the sun was setting," they brought them. Luke 4: 40. This proves that they considered the Sabbath as ending at sunset. It may be objected, that this was a notion entailed by tradition, and not warranted by divine authority. But let us go back to the time when the Sabbath, both as to the day and its boundaries, was designated to them by the falling of the manna. Let us see how divine authority fixes it then. It will be observed, that the manna always fell in the night with the dew; for when the sun waxed hot in the morning it melted. Did the people gather any on Seventh-day morning? They did not; for none had fallen during the night. Did they not gather it every other morning during the week? They did. Therefore, since God himself withheld the manna on Friday night, and supplied it the following night, it is as clear as demonstration that the Sabbath then began in the evening. And when it is considered, that this was done to prove them, whether they would keep the commandments of Jehovah, or not, and that this miracle was perpetuated for forty years, what stronger evidence can be required, that the bounds of the Sabbath were fixed, by divine authority, "from evening to evening?"

When we commenced this article, our design was to offer some thoughts upon the divine wisdom manifest in this arrangement. But we have, almost unconsciously, slid into controversy. Upon review of it, we do not find that we have said any thing that has not been said before; and were it not so near the time of putting our paper to press, we would throw it aside, and give our readers something else. But as it is, we must let it stand. Different ways of expressing the same thing are sometimes useful; and if what we have written shall serve to bring any one to what we conceive to be right views on this subject, we shall feel ourselves amply repaid.

THE CASE OF WM. L. CHAPLIN.

At the Convention recently held in Syracuse, a Report was made by a Financial Committee relative to the bail and other legal expenses of Wm. Chaplin. It seems that his bail amounted to $6,000 at Washington, and $19,000 in Maryland; cost of Court, counsel fees, &c., $3,000—$28,000 in all. The Washington bail was furnished by three men there; $5,000 had been raised by subscription; $6,000 advanced in New York City, to be raised there; one gentleman in Western New York had raised on Bank paper, payable the last of February, $5,000; two individuals in Western New York had raised $1,000 on the same terms; one individual had paid in cash $5,000. It was recommended that a series of meetings be held throughout the State, with a view to raise the amount pledged by these individuals, and to arouse the sentiment of the State to the necessity of defending Wm. L. Chaplin against a requisition of the Governor of Maryland.

After the adoption of the Report, Mr. Hathaway went into a history of the cruelties and insult attending Chaplin's imprisonment and bailing. He was at first thrust into a dungeon 14 feet square, underground, with eight negroes and one white woman, where he would not probably have lived a month. His friends had to pay $90 for guarding him 30 nights, that he need not be confined in a loathsome and noisome dungeon. The sentiment of Maryland was such that the requisition would be made. The sentiment of New York must be prepared to meet such an issue.

A contribution was then taken up, in sums ranging from $1 to $50, amounting to nearly $500.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 25.

Papal Movements in England and Rome—a Jesuit assaulted in Liverpool, &c.

GLASGOW, January 3, 1851.

A London daily paper gives a list of 217 Anti-Papal Meetings, held between Nov. 6th and Dec. 21st; and the Record says this is considerably under the mark—which is propably true. At one of these, (a meeting of the county of Devon,) after an address to Her Majesty, moved by the Earl of Fortescue, had been carried, another, more decidedly opposed to Puseyism, moved by the celebrated Mr. Gorham, was carried by a still larger majority—but which last, it is said, will not be presented, as being irregular. But notwithstanding the outpouring of so much zeal, and the strong statements of the Prime Minister, it is very questionable if any measure of any real importance or efficiency will be adopted. One of the London meetings, under this impression, forwarded a remonstrance to his lordship, calling for more decisive measures. It is affirmed by the Morning Herald, that the whole will issue in the passing of a law, which the crown officers are stated to have already prepared, making it penal for any person, as a prelate, to take, as the title of a bishopric or archbishopric, the name of any place in Great Britain, leaving Ireland to their pleasure. A leading article in the Times, of still more recent date, seems to point to the same result. The penalty is to be two years' imprisonment. Meanwhile, the recently-appointed Minister to Tuscany, Mr. Sheil, a Roman Catholic, has departed, charged, it is affirmed, to offer a plan of mediation for the acceptance of the Pope.

On the part of the Papists themselves, there is the belief that the strong feeling manifested will soon subside; and they are trying to keep quiet. Several addresses to Wiseman have been presented from meetings chiefly of their clergy. Even by many of them, as well as by the larger number of their laity, he is said to be disliked. The fact that many of the Romish noblemen have withheld their signatures from such addresses, gives countenance to the idea that either the man or his measures find little favor in their eyes. He himself continues to insist on liberty of conscience—a doctrine Rome can preach in her weakness, but which it becomes treason for others to practice when Rome is in power. Another curious illustration of the accommodating character of Popery, has been exhibited through the publication, by Dr. Cummings, of London, of a letter written by Wiseman about three years ago, addressed, seemingly, to one of the Puseyite party, in which he states that the Romish Church was anxious to make some arrangement for the admission of married clergymen, converts from the Church of England. As nothing of the kind has been done, it was perhaps only one of the instances of a want of faith with heretics; but if such a measure was really designed, then it follows that what would be wrong in a Papist priest would not be so in one who had previously been a Protestant priest, or, that moral evil was to be permitted in order to encourage Puseyites to join the Church of Rome. Such are the practices of an apostate church.

It came out, somewhat inopportunely, too, that at the very time when the Papists in England are demanding liberty for the unhindered diffusion of their dogmas, (to be followed, of course, by the exercise of power over recusants when they can,) at Rome permission to worship within its walls has been refused to Englishmen, and withdrawn from Americans after having been granted. After much trouble, I indeed observe that restricted allowance has been granted to the chaplain of the American consulate to worship in Rome, on condition that Romans are not to be converted or preached to; but, so far as appears, the English are still to be confined to the old granary over the pig market, without the walls.

It is to be regretted that in Liverpool, last week, a jesuit, once an English earl, of the Spencer family, but now, as father Ignatius, making parade of his bare feet or legs, was assaulted by the mob—although he probably brought it on himself by repeating there advice given by him in Ireland to young women to engage themselves as servants to families for the express purpose of instilling papistical doctrines into the minds of the children. Whatever the provocation in this respect, we cannot condemn too strongly such outrages. At Liverpool the feeling of irritation is likely to be strong from the fact that the attack of the papists on the Protestant meeting at Birkenhead had been traced to the encouragement of the priests.

One of the effects which it is certainly most desirable the present agitation should produce, is a return to scriptural truth and scriptural order. Some few in the Church of England have been looking at the matter in this light; and an address was presented to the Archbishop of Canterbury, in which reference was made to the necessity of a revisal of the church formula. But the Archbishop, in his reply, states it as his opinion, that a revision of the ritual of the Church of England is "farther off than ever." This seems to show that Government has no intention of promoting such a reformation; as the Archbishop was appointed by the present Government, and has acted with them on all occasions. It seems to be under the apprehension of the consequences, however inconsistently, that the Bishop of Oxford, in reply to an address from the Windsor and Eton Church Union, says, "It is scarcely possible to doubt that we live in those 'perilous times' which were to 'come' in 'the last days.'" As one evidence of this, he refers to the fact that "there is among some of us a leaning towards the Church of Rome," which "saps the faith of those who yield ever so little to its first temptation." What, then, must be the condition of those who, like the Bishop himself, have yielded so much to all its temptations?

J. A. BEGG.

PROTESTANTISM IN ROME.

Soon after the present Pope of Rome came into power, the United States Government, encouraged by the liberality which characterized his early movements, appointed a Minister to reside at his Court, and look after the interests of our citizens. That minister, Mr. Cass, did not have an opportunity to present his credentials before the revolution broke out, and therefore remained at Rome a long time in a state of uncertainty as to the proper Government to address. Meanwhile, occasional opportunities occurred to serve the papal interests, which were promptly used. On one occasion, the buildings of the College for the Propagation of the Faith were in imminent danger, and were saved by the interposition of Mr. Cass with the triumviri. On his restoration, the Pope expressed warm thanks to Mr. Cass for his good offices, and also his gratitude and sense of obligation for a similar interference of an American Consul in China, by which four Catholic Missionaries had been saved from impending death. What followed may be learned from an extract of a letter to the London Daily News, dated at Rome, Dec. 6th, 1850:—

"His Holiness, desirous of giving some proof of his gratitude, thought he could afford no stronger one than that of granting Mr. Cass permission to open a Protestant chapel within the walls of Rome, for the use of American visitors, a plan which had been in contemplation for some time, and for the realization of which a conscientious and zealous clergyman, the Rev. Mr. Hastings, came hither from the United States, somewhat more than a year ago. Notwithstanding the Pope's express permission, so many hindrances arose that the chapel could not be opened last winter, and Mr. Hastings convoked his countrymen in his own apartments every Sunday morning, and conducted divine service there according to the Presbyterian rite. During the autumn of the present year, however, all objections appeared to be overcome; a suitable place was hired in the Via de Pontefici, and fitted up as a chapel, at an expense of about $300, and Mr. Hastings, fully authorized by the government, opened the chapel and commenced divine worship, just one month ago. From what has subsequently taken place, it seems that the same secret enemies, who had labored to prevent Mr. Cass's plan from being carried out, resolved to put a stop to the whole concern as soon as possible. Accordingly, last week Mr. Cass received a communication from Cardinal Antonelli, to the effect that, in consequence of the official complaint of the Cardinal Vicar, the doctrinal decisions of the congregation of Propaganda Fide, and the earnest petitions of many English and American Roman Catholic residents, his Holiness had been reluctantly obliged to withdraw the permission which he had granted with respect to the American Protestant chapel."

Another case, having some features in common with the above, and serving in like manner to illustrate the spirit of Popery in 1850, is thus narrated and commented upon by the New York Commercial Advertiser:—

"It will be remembered, that an edition of the New Testament, printed in Rome during the time of the Republic, with the sanction of the existing powers, was taken from the publishers to the American Consulate for protection, just before the entrance of the French. One of the first acts of the restored cardinals was to order the seizure of those books, in spite of consular protection. Mr. J. Freeman, artist, the acting consul, made a spirited defense of the rights of the consulate in this case, before both the police and General Oudinot, then Governor of Rome. It was agreed that the books should remain where they were for the present, with the American and Papal seals upon them, and the question of right between our Charge de Affaires and the cardinals to be carried up for decision. This was the best that could be done in the circumstances. Mr. Cass has not been lacking in efforts to have the goods removed out of the country, but he has failed of success. The government has at last decided to take them to the library of the Holy Office, where there are already immense quantities of Bibles and Testaments, published by the British and Foreign Bible Society. The American seal upon those books is thus declared to be of no value whatever. America has a Webster, who once made a splendid defense of the Bible, against the plea of those who would exclude it from Girard College as a sectarian book. Will he now, as Secretary of State, admit that the seal of the American Union cannot protect that book in the American Consulate at Rome?"

SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE OF THE M. E. CHURCH.—This body, at its recent meeting, (says the Charleston Mercury,) on motion of Dr. Whiteford Smith, adopted an important resolution touching the obnoxious section in the Methodist Book of Discipline on the subject of Slavery. An attempt was made at the last meeting of the General Conference of the Church South to carry a resolution, that the Discipline should be relieved of this section, which seems to inculcate anti-slavery as a part of Christian duty. The motion failed by a few votes, though it was generally, if not unanimously, admitted that the said section was not of binding authority.

GAMBLING IN NEW YORK.—A new species of gambling has become very popular in New York during the present winter, in the shape of "Gift Concerts," "Furniture Art-Unions," &c., at which each ticket-holder stands one chance in a hundred or a thousand of getting something worth ten times as much as his ticket cost. The practice has been carried so far, that the Board of Aldermen have thought it necessary to appoint a Committee to investigate and see what can be done to arrest it. Would it not be well for that Committee to extend their investigations to the practices at the Church Fairs? Some people are so blind that they can not see the difference in principle between the "lotteries" of Church Fairs and those which the law forbids.

THE DECLINE OF POPERY.—Two lectures upon this subject were delivered in New York last week. The first was by Rev. Nicholas Murray, D.D., of Elizabethtown, N. J., better known to the public, perhaps, by his assumed name of "Kirwan," over which he has written numerous papers relating to Romanism. He spoke at the Broadway Tabernacle on Fourth-day evening. At the conclusion, a large collection was taken to secure the printing and wide circulation of his discourse. The second was by Rev. J. F. Berg, D.D., of Philadelphia, and was delivered at the Tabernacle on Fifth-day evening. This being but a repetition of Mr. Berg's Philadelphia lecture, the drift of which we have already stated, there is no occasion for further remark.

GOOD NEWS FROM WALES.—A correspondent of the Cincinnati Christian Herald, says that the South Wales Association numbers 192 pastors, 350 churches. The statistics indicate a healthful and growing prosperity. During the year powerful revivals have been enjoyed, and the good work is still progressing. One of the Churches, "Bethania," Rev. J. Hughes, pastor, received an addition of 600 members on profession of faith in Christ. Some twenty other churches report from 250 to 400. Almost every Church has been blessed in this wonderful and glorious refreshing from the presence of the Lord. Extensive and thorough instruction in the Sunday-schools had prepared the people for this blessed visitation of mercy. This work of grace is characterized with great pungency and solemnity, with very little excitement.

EDUCATION AT THE WEST.—The Board of National Popular Education held its annual meeting at Cleveland, Ohio, on the 5th inst. when Governor Slade reported the receipts for the past year to be $5,020 50. The disbursements were $4,859 45. There was a balance on hand of $1,119 58, the whole of which is to be consumed in sending seven teachers to Oregon in March next. The Society since it was organized has sent out 199 teachers. They were distributed as follows: To Illinois, 57; Indiana, 53; Wisconsin, 21; Michigan, 16; Iowa, 11; Tennessee, 8; Western Pa. 4; North Carolina, 3; Alabama, 2; Ohio, 10; Missouri, 7; Minnesota, 3; Kentucky, 2; Texas 2. Of the whole number, thirty one are married; of these eight continue to teach, while the influence of the remainder, none can doubt, continues to be felt for good.

ANOTHER ROMAN CATHOLIC MIRACLE.—A miracle is alledged to have recently taken place in the church of Saturnin, canton and arrondissement of Apt, department of the Vaucluse, France, consisting in the flowing of blood from a picture representing the descent of Jesus Christ from the cross. The occasion was the fervent praying of a girl named Rosette Tamisier. The flux of blood from the painting has been observed and testified to by several witnesses, including an Archbishop and Clergyman, officer of gen d'armes, and a sub-Prefect. 'Rosette, on being interrogated by the sub-Prefect, said: "God had effected this miracle for the conversion of sinners, and He had specially chosen St. Saturnin, because, four years ago, this locality was the witness of a great scandal. Her conduct," she added, "had been outrageously calumniated, as also that of a priest; but she had not demanded reparation from God." The blood which oozes from the painting is said to have been analyzed by two medical men, who have declared that its chemical composition exactly corresponds with that of human blood.

EVANGELICAL PRINCIPLES.—The Asmonean says that a committee, in the New Hampshire Constitutional Convention, in preparing a Bill of Rights, made use of the above words in their report. A motion was made to strike out these words—some contending that "evangelical" had a sectarian meaning—others contending that the State, as such, has no religion, and it was wrong for the Constitution to assume that we are a Christian nation. A motion was made to substitute the words "religion and morality" for the words "evangelical principles," which failed. Finally, Prof. Sanborn, of Dartmouth College, moved to insert the words "the principles of the Bible," which was carried by a large majority.

A PASTOR'S LABORS IN CALIFORNIA.—In preaching an anniversary sermon, Mr. Wheeler stated the following facts, as reported by one who has present and heard him:

"The church and society have raised the last year, for preaching, missionary, and other purposes, twenty thousand dollars; the pastor has preached seventy-five sermons, paid upwards of four hundred strictly pastoral visits, received upwards of seventeen hundred calls, mostly from strangers, and traveled fifteen hundred miles. The church and society enlarged their place of worship 150 seats, reduced their debt two-thirds, and supported a public school for an average number of one hundred scholars."

THE CHEAP POSTAGE BILL.

On Sixth-day last, the House of Representatives passed a very liberal Postage Bill, which is now before the Senate for concurrence. Its approval by that body is confidently expected. If secured, a great step in the way of reform will have been taken. We copy the Bill.

An Act Reducing Postage.

SEC. 1. Be it enacted, &c., That letters carried in the mails of the United States shall be charged with postage as follows:—

Upon each letter not weighing over one-half ounce, three cents; and for each additional half ounce or fraction of half an ounce, three cents. Provided, That no Post Office now in existence shall be discontinued, nor shall the mail service, on any mail route in any of the States or Territories be discontinued or diminished in consequence of any diminution of the revenues that may result from this act. And provided further, That it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to establish new Post Offices, and place the mail service on new mail routes established, or that may hereafter be established, in the same manner as though this act had not been passed. And provided further, That the compensation of the Postmasters shall not be diminished in consequence of the passage of this act.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, There shall be charged upon each newspaper, pamphlet, periodical, magazine, book, and every other description of printed matter, which shall be unconnected with any manuscript or written matter, and which it may be lawful to transmit through the mail, of no greater weight than two ounces, one cent; and for each additional ounce or fraction of an ounce, one cent. Bound books, not weighing over thirty ounces, shall be deemed mailable matter under the provisions of this section: Provided, That newspapers delivered in the State where printed shall be chargeable with only one-half the foregoing rates: Provided, further, That no postage shall be charged upon any newspaper mailed and delivered within the county where printed, or within thirty miles of the place where printed.

Provided, further, That the free circulation of newspapers within the county of their publication, or the distance of thirty miles of the place of publication, as hereinbefore provided, shall be confined to actual subscribers receiving their papers from the office of publication.

Provided, further, That fifty per cent. shall be deducted from the postage on magazines, when the postage shall be prepaid.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful to coin at the Mint of the United States and its branches, a piece of the denomination and legal value of three cents, or three hundredths of a dollar, to be composed of three-fourths silver, and one fourth copper, and to weigh twelve grains and three-eighths of a grain, that the said coin shall bear such devices as shall be conspicuously different from those of the silver coins, and of the gold dollar, but having the inscription "United States of America," and its denomination and date; and that it shall be a legal tender in payment of debts for all sums of thirty cents and under.

SEC. 4 requires the Postmaster to provide suitable stamps for the pre-payment of postages.

SEC. 5 appropriates $1,500,000 to meet any deficiency that may arise in the Post Office Department.

SEC. 6 relates to the manner of publishing lists of letters not called for.

SEC. 7 authorizes the establishment of penny posts in cities.

MORE CHIVALRY.—At the last session of the Vermont Legislature, resolutions were passed in favor of Universal Peace, copies of which were transmitted to all the sister States. But from the following resolutions adopted by the Virginia House of Delegates—yeas 123, nays 0—it seems that the chivalry of that State can not treat civilly even such "peace measures:"—

1. Resolved, That the Governor be requested to return to the Governor of Vermont the resolutions of the Legislature of that State, styled "Resolutions for the promotion of Peace."

2. Resolved, That the Governor be requested to inform the Governor of Vermont, that the Legislature of Virginia declines to consider the resolutions from the Legislature of Vermont, relative to the peace of the world, until that body shall show itself careful of the peace of the Union, by conforming its enactments to the Constitution of the United States, and laws passed in pursuance thereof.

THE PRESS AND THE LEGISLATURE IN MASSACHUSETTS.—The editor of the Boston Pathfinder says he feels a little professional pride pride in the result of the recent organization of the two branches of the Massachusetts Legislature.

Gen. Wilson, who has been made President of the Senate, vacated his editorial chair just in time to assume the chair he now fills. Mr. Knapp, the new clerk of the Senate, is a printer, at Lowell, where he has a job office; he has also had some experience, we believe, of the blessedness of editorial life. Mr. Banks, the Speaker of the House, has been an editor, and Mr. Josselyn, the Clerk, is well known as the former editor of the Bay State Democrat, in this city, and as the present editor of the Bay State, published at Lynn. Quite a number of the Senators and Representatives have been or still are connected with the press.

THE U. S. MAIL STEAMER ATLANTIC.—Considerable anxiety is felt in relation to this vessel, which sailed from Liverpool on the 28th of December, and was due in New York about the 10th of January, but had not arrived on the evening of the 20th. The Washington, which sailed five days later, and the Asia one week later, arrived at New York last week, making very good time. It is supposed that some accident has happened to the Atlantic's machinery, making it necessary for her to put back or go into the Azores.

General Intelligence.

Proceedings in Congress Last Week.

SECOND-DAY, Jan. 13.

In the SENATE, Mr. Seward presented a petition of five hundred citizens of the United States in favor of the freedom of the Public Lands to actual settlers. Mr. Cooper presented three petitions from Delaware and Chester counties in Pennsylvania, asking the immediate repeal of the Fugitive Slave Law; in reference to which Mr. Cooper said, he was informed that the petitioners were highly respectable persons, but he believed that in their petition they asked that which the people of Pennsylvania generally did not desire; referred to the Judiciary Committee. Mr. Cooper also presented a number of petitions against the extension of the area of freedom, which were laid on the table. A large number of petitions and memorials were presented. The bill granting to Wisconsin a donation of the Public Lands to supply a deficiency in the former grant for purposes of Internal Improvement, was taken up and passed. The bill to cede the Public Lands of the United States to the States respectively in which they are situated, on condition that said States shall severally grant and convey said lands to actual occupants only, in limited quantities, for cost of survey, transfer, and title only, was taken up, and Mr. Felch of Michigan spoke upon it until the hour of adjournment.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, the Speaker decided that the motion made by Mr. Cobb of Alabama, a week ago, to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to suspend the rules, to enable Mr. Julian to introduce a memorial from the annual meeting of Anti-Slavery Friends of Indiana, asking for the repeal of the Fugitive Slave Law, was out of order. A resolution was adopted, directing the Committee on Commerce to inquire into the expediency of reducing the value of the silver coins of the United States, by diminishing their weight or increasing the portion of alloy in the same or both, so as to prevent their exportation. The House refused to suspend the rules to allow the introduction of a resolution declaring that it would be inexpedient and improper to repeal the law passed at the last session, entitled an Act to amend and supplementary to an Act entitled an Act respecting fugitives from justice and persons escaping from the service of their masters, approved 12th Feb., 1793. The Cheap Postage Bill was taken up, and Mr. Potter made the concluding speech in its favor.

THIRD-DAY, Jan. 14.

In the SENATE, a petition was received from Thomas Ritchie, asking to be let off from his Printing contract, or to have his pay increased fifty per cent. The joint resolution making Land Warrants assignable, was debated and laid over. The bill ceding the Public Lands to the several States in which they lie, was the theme of speeches, Mr. Felch sustaining, and Mr. Walker opposing it.

The HOUSE spent the day in Committee of the Whole on the Cheap Postage Bill. An amendment providing for a two-cents rate of prepaid letters was rejected, 67 to 89; a rate of three cents, prepaid, was rejected; a rate of two and a half cents after July, 1852, was rejected; an amendment providing that the Post Office facilities shall not be diminished in consequence of any diminution of the revenue by reason of this act, was adopted, as well as an amendment charging pamphlets and circulars with letter postage; after this a uniform rate of five cents was adopted by 88 to 84; and then it was moved to amend by making this the rate for unpaid letters, which was adopted, and the question then came up on agreeing to this amendment as amended, pending which the House adjourned.

FOURTH-DAY, Jan. 15.

In the SENATE, Mr. Clay presented three petitions from Indiana, praying that Congress would adopt some steps to remove all those free colored people in the United States who are willing to go to Africa, and that provision be made for their support for one year after their arrival there. Also, a petition from Rhode Island, signed by every member of the State Senate, most of the members of the House, by ex-Governors, ex-Senators, ex-members of Legislature, by many of the literati of the State, by many heads of Colleges, and by a great body of citizens in private life. They pray that more effectual means may be adopted for the suppression of the African slave trade. They depict the horrors of the trade in vivid colors, and represent that the measures adopted by Great Britian, France, and the United States, by keeping up squadrons on the coast of Africa, have been a failure. They represent that the only effectual method for the suppression of the African slave trade is the encouragement of establishing colonies all along the coast of Africa. The colonies now there, within their limits, have wholly suppressed the trade, and they occupy one-third of the coast. The petitioners ask that a line of steamers or of packet vessels be established to ply between the United States and the Coast of Africa. Mr. Clay advocated, with a good deal of earnestness, the prayer of the memorials, and moved their reference to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. Hale then took the floor, and said that he had a petition signed by over 300 citizens of Montgomery Co., Pa. It was not signed by any ex-Governors, or ex-Members of Congress; none of the literati were among them. He was told, however, by the Senator from Pennsylvania, that one of the signers was a brother of a man who was once candidate for Governor. (Laughter.) The petitioners pray the immediate repeal of the Act of September 18, 1850, for the recapture of fugitive slaves. He would have presented the petition, and let it take that sleep which all such petitions are doomed to take, without remark, had not the Senator from Pennsylvania a few days ago set the example by stating his opinion of petition. I believe Congress ought to repeal the law, or ought to modify it most essentially. I believe that the law is a reproach on the civilization of the age and a perfect parody on the Constitution. At this point Mr. Hale was interrupted by calls to order, and after a good deal of confusion and piquant conversation, a motion to lay the petition on the table was made and carried.

Mr. Seward then presented the petition of five hundred citizens of Hudson, N. Y., praying the immediate repeal of the Fugitive Slave Law, which was also laid on the table.

The bill to cede Public Lands to the States was taken up, and Mr. Walker finished his speech in its favor, after which the further consideration of the subject was postponed for a week in order to allow Mr. Seward to speak on it. The French Spoilation bill was slightly debated, and then laid aside for an Executive Session.

The HOUSE was engaged all day in Committee on the Cheap Postage Bill. The section relating to letter postage was finished, a uniform rate of three cents per half ounce being established. In respect to newspapers, it was agreed that they should circulate gratis in the country and within thirty miles of their place of publication. On magazines, when prepaid, a deduction of fifty per cent. was fixed on.

FIFTH-DAY, Jan. 16.

In the SENATE, several petitions were presented from Washington, Niagara, and St. Lawrence counties, New York, and from Richfield in the same State, also, from Morristown and Philadelphia in Pennsylvania, all praying for the repeal of the Fugitive Slave Law. Laid on the table. Also, a petition from Richfield, New York, praying for the abolition of Slavery in the territories of Utah and New Mexico, which was laid on the table. Mr. Seward presented a petition from the same place, praying for the abolition of Slavery in the District of Columbia; tabled.

A resolution was adopted, calling on the President to communicate to the Senate all the information in his possession touching the difficulties between the British authorities at San Salvador, the blockade of the coast of that Republic by the British fleet, the invasion of Guatemala by the forces of San Salvador and Honduras, and such other matters connected therewith as materially affect the interest of the United States, or the independence of Central America.

The bill providing for the payment of American claims for French spoilations was then taken up, and debated till adjournment.

The HOUSE had the Cheap Postage Bill under consideration. A rate of one cent for two ounces of printed matter was adopted, bound books weighing less than thirty ounces being considered mailable matter; no postage to be charged on papers within thirty miles, or in the county where published, and fifty per cent. deducted from magazine postage, when prepaid. A provision authorizing a three cent coin of mixed silver and copper to be struck, was adopted.

An amendment was adopted, establishing post routes in cities and towns, at one or two cents each, receivable and deliverable within the Post Office or town—intended to be a penny-post in New York and other places. Mr. Phelps moved a substitute for the entire bill, pending which the Committee rose and the House adjourned.

SIXTH-DAY, Jan. 17.

In the SENATE, a report was presented and ordered to be printed, from the War Department, enclosing the report of Topographical Engineers, upon the inundation of the Lower Mississippi. A petition was presented from Cornelius Vanderbilt, steamboat builder, of New York, in which he offers to place six steamers on the Chagres and San Francisco line, and to carry the United States Mail when desired, for 30,000 per annum; also to sell the same to Government in case of war. A bill was presented creating the Board of Commissioners for the examination of claims against the United States, growing out of the conquest of California. The consideration of the French spoilation bill was then resumed, and Mr. Smith concluded his speech in favor of the bill, after which the Senate adjourned to Second-day.

The HOUSE spent the whole day on the Cheap Postage Bill. Several amendments were proposed. with a view of curtailing the franking privilege, and making a difference in price between paid and unpaid letters; but they were voted down. Finally, the bill, as reported to the House, was adopted by a vote of 130 to 75.

SABBATH-DAY, Jan. 18.

The SENATE was not in session.

The HOUSE devoted the day to private bills, one of which was passed, and several others debated.

New Jersey—Governor's Message.

The Legislature of New Jersey was organized on Tuesday of last week, by the choice of Hon. Silas D. Canfield, of Passaic, for President of the Senate, and John H. Phillips, of Mercer, as Speaker of the Assembly. The Governor's Message was soon sent in.

The receipts for the last year, ending Dec. 31, 1850, were $128,583; Cash on hand, January 1, 1850, $9,961, making the available funds $138,544; Disbursements, $125,542; Balance in Treasury, $13,001.

It appears that the balance of the State Fund vested in various stocks and bonds, including surplus revenue loaned to the several Counties, paying no interest, deducting amount due School Fund, and the special loan prior to 1847, is $933,848 25, and its income will justify an appropriation of $40,000 for Common Schools.

The cause of education advances, and the public is looking for further legislative aid to Common Schools. The Governor recommends the passage of a law authorizing the inhabitants of townships and cities to determine by a vote of two-thirds of the persons present entitled to vote, whether they will establish Free Schools in their townships and cities and support them.

The Lunatic Asylum is advancing in the favor of the community. The Governor is not in favor of making an enlargement of the building at this time.

Attention is invited to the subject of taxation. No tax is now levied for State expenses; but still there may be, and are at this time, taxes levied for township, county and educational purposes, which ought to be made as equal as possible; and the passage of a law to produce that eqality is earnestly recommended.

The Governor recommends the repeal of acts making a property qualification requisite to the holding of any office, and the performance of any duty. An exemption of property from execution and distress sufficient to save a debtor from penury and want, is recommended.

Pursuant to the resolutions of the Legislature, the Governor has ready for delivery a block of stone for the Washington Monument.

The Governor believes that New Jersey will firmly stand by and maintain the Compromise measures of the last session of Congress, regarding them as wise, patriotic, and essential to the Union, prosperity, peace and progress of the Confederacy.

Twelve Days Later from Europe.

The steamship Washington, with European news to Jan. 2d, arrived at New York Jan. 16th.

From England there is no special political intelligence. The Anti-Papal agitation seems to have passed over, if we may judge by the comparative silence of the journals. On the other hand, a great deal of space is devoted to the discussion of Law Reform, the New York Code being the model of the proposed changes.

The arrangements for the Great Exhibition are actively prosecuted. Among the articles from India is a pearl robe, valued at about £7,000; and a gold mounted saddle, set with precious stones, the property of the late Runjeet Singh, valued at about £6,000. Ali Moorad has contributed most magnificently toward the exhibition in embroidered workmanship of quilts, enameled swords, &c.

In France all is quiet. The most trifling questions occupy the Assembly and the public. Paris excels itself in gayeties, and business thrives.

The commercial treaty between France and Piedmont has been renewed, with no essential change in its provisions.

The news from the Italian provinces is anything but favorable. Conspiracies have been discovered, and numerous arrests have been made in consequence. Whether all those who are executed are simply highway robbers and murderers, or whether they are guerillas, it is not possible to say; but it cannot be denied that powder and ball and the hangman's rope are committing fearful ravages in Lombardy and Venice.

Letters from Bologna state that on the 18th December a party of Austrian soldiers had a skirmish with nine banditti, headed by Il Passatore himself. A soldier was killed, and another wounded in the contest; the banditti were, however, put to flight, after the loss of one man, named Lami, on whose body articles of value were found.

TWO DAYS LATER.—The steamer Asia, with two days' later dates from Europe, arrived at New York last Sixth-day night. She brings no news worth printing.

Dreadful Disaster in New York.

On Fourth-day of last week New York was the scene of another of those disasters for which she is becoming famous. About half past one o'clock in the afternoon, six new buildings in the course of erection in Twenty-first street, between Fifth and Sixth avenues, fell with a tremendous crash, carrying with them some 30 or 32 workmen, principally masons and carpenters, who were employed on them at the time.

The workmen had just returned from their dinners, and were engaged in topping out the walls and finishing the roof. The houses were six stories high, large and handsome to outward appearance, but built with the most criminal disregard to security. The bricks in the walls seemed to have been merely touched with mortar, for there was scarcely any perceptible adhesion. This defect was the main cause of the accident.

So sudden was the crash, that but five or six of the workmen escaped, one of whom sprang from the sixth story. He alighted on a heap of sand, fortunately, and was not injured, though so bewildered by the shock and fright as to be unable to give any account of what had happened.

A large force immediately set to work, under the direction of the police, to remove the rubbish and rescue the wounded. Two men were taken out dead, seven badly injured, and twelve slightly injured. The wounded men and the families of the killed are mostly poor people, on whom this catastrophe will fall very heavily.

Mr. George Spencer, the contractor who was putting up the buildings, and his foreman named Flemming, have been arrested to await the result of an investigation before the Coroner of the causes of the accident. Spencer gave bonds in the sum of $5,000, and is at large; but Flemming, being unable to give bonds, was committed to prison

A "Fugitive" Case in Cincinnati.

A colored man was recently arrested in Cincinnati as "a fugitive," concerning whom the editor of the Commercial says:—

We yesterday saw the apprehended "fugitive," and found it to be the barber, Hamilton Jackson, of Walnut street. On Sunday night, a man who gave his name as Charles Hooker, found Jackson near his own house, and inquired of him, after some circumlocutory proceedings, where the watchmen were. Jackson showed Hooker the Ninth Ward Watch, when Hooker ordered them to arrest Jackson as a runaway slave from his father. Jackson was accordingly taken into custody, and marched to the Mayor's office, all the time supposing it was a joke, and that the parties knew him. At the Mayor's office the Chief of Police and the officers were acting in good faith, and even sent to Mayor Spencer's house for his honor, Jackson was put into a cell and locked in! He had been there some time when he began to think the joke had lasted long enough, and asked to be let out, but was then informed that the proceedings were in earnest, and that he was really imprisoned at the instigation of Hooker, and, by affidavit by him, held as a "fugitive." This was rather a serious matter for Jackson; still, he knew that he could establish his freedom, as hundreds had known him here for ten years or more, and there were persons here, also, who knew him when a child in Chillicothe. The Fourth Ward Watchmen came in during the night, and seeing Jackson confined there, and knowing him well, had him released. The officers are now after Hooker, but he is not to be found. We presume there are few men better known here than Hamilton Jackson. From what we have heard, we think that this Hooker is a Northern man, endeavoring to extort money, and as big a villain as runs unhung, and is endeavoring to hook "niggers" in by false swearing and effrontery, but he may be caught by a hook of the law without swallowing bait.

SUMMARY.

Speaking of the articles for exhibition at the World's Fair, one of our exchanges says, that a splendid collection of the leaves of the American forests, carefully prepared by Miriam G. de Bonneville of Westerly, R. I., will be sent to London. These leaves are arranged in natural order, upon sheets of Bristol board, and bound in rich garnet-colored velvet, with gold clasps and corners. The leaves are so prepared that they retain their natural color, and will make a beautiful display of the wonderful change the foliage undergoes.

Wild Cat, the famous Indian Chief, who has formed a settlement in Mexico, has been appointed a Justice of the Peace by the Mexican Government. He recently took with him from Arkansas a number of negroes and Indians. They are to have implements of husbandry, and a certain portion of land given them on condition that they cultivate it and obey the laws. Another object is to defend the Mexican Frontier from the incursions of the Camanches.

At a meeting of the Executive Committee of the N. Y. State Agricultural Society, held the 14th inst., the following Delegates were appointed to the World's Fair for 1851: Martin Van Buren of Columbia Co; Harvey Baldwin of Onondago Co; John A. King of Queens Co; Ezra P. Prentice of Albany Co; B. P. Johnson of Albany Co. The appointment is merely honorary, the Delegates bearing their own expenses.

The Government Agents have recently effected treaties with the Texan Indians, by which the Indians promise the restitution of all stolen property and the prisoners in their possession. Some tribes were not represented in the Councils, particularly the Camanches; but the Agents report strong hopes of shortly inducing them to enter into similar conditions with more faithful compliance in future.

We learn from the Central Georgian, published at Saundersville, that Willis H. Hughes of Macon, was killed in that place on Sunday night, by a Mr. Knight, a brother of the individual who was in Boston with him last summer, in search of William and Ellen Crafts, as fugitive slaves. Hughes was killed in a street fight growing out of personal differences.

The Assembly of New York, on the 14th inst., passed a joint resolution requesting our Representatives in Congress to advocate the reduction of Postage, allowing newspapers to pass free through the mails to subscribers in counties where such papers are published, reducing postage on prepaid letters to two cents, and unpaid letters three cents.

A warrant was served on Simon Waterman, of Warrenton, Va. charging him with selling a pistol to a negro slave, the property of John Smith, Esq. The negro, it seems, had bought it to stiffen his courage in a quarrel in which he was engaged. Mr. Waterman was fined $20, and required to give bond in the penalty of $1,000 for his good behaviour in future. He has appealed.

In the case of the steamship Niagara, which was formally libelled and seized by the U. S. Marshall, bonds were given for her appraised value, and she sailed on Wednesday, as usual. Robert Brownlow, the butcher of the ship, has absconded, and a reward of $200 has been offered by the Agent of the vessel for his arrest, as he is supposed to be implicated in the transaction.

A Canada corresoondent of the N. Y. Tribune says the people of Toronto have admitted women to some of the franchises, the withholding of which was greatly complained of at the Worcester Convention. The other day, at the election of School Trustees, several women voted, their right to do so having been legalized last session of the Provincial Parliament.

Francis H. Storer, a student in the Cambridge Scientific School, has discovered iodine in the ammoniacal liquor from the Boston Gas Works. The discovery is interesting as showing the probable existence of this substance in the waters which had supplied the plants which made up the coal formation.

A large meeting has been held to adopt measures to memorialize the New-Jersey Legislature to grant a charter to construct a railroad from the City of Camden, in the County of Camden, through Burlington, Ocean and Monmouth to Keyport, or some point east of it on the Raritan Bay.

The Secretary of War orders that the Commanding Officer at each military post shall, if possible, annually cultivate a kitchen garden with the soldiers under his command, to enable him to supply the hospital and men with necessary vegetables throughout the year.

Another article to be exhibited at the great Fair is a Miniature Steam Engine, complete in all its parts, made by Lyman C. Higginbotham of Vernon This was made by him without any assistance, and with no previous application to any mechanical trade, and he is but sixteen years of age.

Mr. John Low, a retired merchant of ample pecuniary means, recently threw himself from a wharf at East Boston. He remained in the water for twenty minutes, when he was picked up in a senseless condition. Mr. Low had been laboring under a depression of spirits for several months.

The Cashmere Shawls prepared by Maharajah Gonleb Sing, or Jamoo, for the Industrial Exhibition in London, are valued at £10,000, and are bestowed as a free gift on the trustees. Another chief sends a suit of steel armor inlaid with gold.

Some fishermen at Torquay caught a porpoise in the bay, and having brought it into the harbor, attached a rope to its tail and threw it overboard, when, to the amusement of many persons, it towed the boat about the harbor for some time.

At Milwaukee, last Sabbath, a large amount of property was destroyed by a fire which originated in a Ship Chandlery.

Mrs. Bailey, who is renowned for her patriotism in furnishing means for prosecuting the battles of the Revolution, was burned to death a few days since at her residence in Groton, opposite New London, Ct. She was upward of 90 years of age.

A dispatch from Charleston, S. C., dated Jan. 18, says: The brig Matamoras, from San Juan, Nicaragua, bound to New York, with 68 Californians returning homeward, put into Quarantine this morning, on account of sickness.

By brig Hayti, Capt. Cutts, we have dates from Port-au-Prince to Jan. 1. There was no news of importance. The Island remains quiet. The Coffee crop has completely failed; it is now certain there will not be one-half the usual crop.

A riot ending in two murders, occurred recently at the Hazel River Works, in Culpepper County, Va.—Irishmen were the chief actors. They first killed a negro, and then, in a fight among themselves, one of their own number was murdered.

A diamond watch, of the value of $10,000, about to be raffled for at New Orleans, was seized by the Custom House officers, on the authority of a dispatch from the Collector of New York, stating that it had been smuggled into that port.

B. F. Yard, Esq., editor and publisher of the Temperance Visitor, at Trenton, has withdrawn from the cares and perplexities of editorial life. He has lost $2,000 in the effort to maintain a temperance paper in New Jersey.

The Secretary of the Navy notifies that the frigate St. Lawrence will be in readiness for the voyage to convey articles to the World's Fair by the 1st of February, and that she will sail about that time from the port of New York.

Joseph Dollimer, sailmaker, East Boston, has been arrested, charged with being concerned in the smuggling from the steamship Niagara. The bonds given by the agent of the vessel, to release her, amount to $275,000.

Mr. B. Bateman, of the Ohio Cultivator, has an orchard of about fifty acres and five thousand trees—3,000 peach and 2,000 apple—surrounded with an Osage Orange hedge, thief proof.

The steamship Alabama brings news from the city of Mexico to the 1st inst., to the effect that Yucatan has pronounced against the Supreme Government and declared herself independent of Mexico.

It has been ascertained that Government is largely defrauded by the use of Postage Stamps. They have been used two or three times over. Stamped envelops are proposed to obviate the difficulty.

A Jesuit College is being built in New York. It will be four stories high, and will accommodate about 200 students. The final cost will be about $50,000.

The St. Charles Hotel, New Orleans, the bost building of the kind in the Southern States, was partially destroyed by fire last Sabbath.

Joseph B. Anthony, President Judge of the Eighth Judicial District of Pennsylvania, died at his residence in Williamsport on the 11th inst.

The University of Heidelberg has conferred upon Horace Dresser, of this City, the title of Doctor of Laws.

The Central Committee will not accept articles for the London Industrial Exhibition after February 1.

Rev. A. Bennett is laid aside for the present, and is under the medical care of Dr. H. W. Dean, Rochester, N. Y.

Christian Psalmody—Pocket Edition.

IN compliance with requests from various quarters, the publisher of the New Hymn Book—Christian Psalmody—has issued a second edition, on lighter paper and with smaller margins, by which the bulk and weight of the books are reduced about one-third, rendering them much more convenient for carrying in the pocket. The price is also reduced 12½ cents per copy. Those wishing books, of either edition, can now be supplied. Price of the larger edition from 75 cents to $1 50, according to the style of binding. Price of the smaller edition from 62½ cents to $1 00. Orders should be addressed to Geo. B. Utter, No. 9 Spruce-st., New York.

Leave Stonington Monday, Wednesday, and Friday. The Commodore will leave New York Monday, Wednesday, and Friday. Leave Stonington Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday.

Methodist Quarterly Review.

THIS Review contains 160 pages Octavo, printed on fine paper. At the subscription price of TWO DOLLARS a year, in advance, it is the cheapest Quarterly Journal now issued. The publishers issue it at this low price, in expectation of greatly enlarging its list of subscribers, which, though by no means what it ought to be, is yet, as it is believed, twice as large as that of any similar Journal.

While the theology of the Methodist Episcopal Church is the standard for the Review, its tone is large and liberal, and its range of topics, not only in Biblical but General Literature, is extensive, as its Table of Contents will show. Its contributors are among the ablest writers in this country, of various religious denominations.

In the Department of Literary Intelligence, this Journal is so unusually full and rich as to be almost indispensable to every theologian and literary man.

From its wide circulation, the Quarterly affords a most desirable medium of Literary Advertising. All advertisements, and books for notice, should be sent to the Editor, Rev. J. M'Clintock, D. D., 200 Mulberry-st.

The Publishers subjoin a few notices from the Press during the last year:—

As an organ of one of the most efficient branches of the Christian Church in this country, it deserves to be read by all who would preserve a thorough acquaintance with all our current national literature. [Bost. Rec.

It is altogether the most agreeable of American Quarterlies. While it is called a "Methodist" Magazine, Methodism is not the one exclusive topic. The whole field of religion, literature, and science is traversed, and a truly catholic spirit animates every article. [Philadelphia Bulletin.

Its Literary Intelligence is not surpassed in copiousness by any other Quarterly. [Independent.

A high, scholar-like, and liberal spirit pervades the work. The Review is an honor to the denomination of which it is the organ. [Louisville Examiner.

Its character as a repository of literary information is unsurpassed. [N. Y. Recorder.

The work shows the traits of learned and accomplished editorship, and is an ornament to our national journalism. [N. Y. Evangelist.

We are glad to find that the editor has made arrangements to secure a regular German correspondence, which, with the resources in his own hands, will enable him to present a record of literary movements abroad, unsurpassed by any of our periodicals. [N. Y. Tribune.

The editor's cultivated taste, comprehensive learning, and literary vigilance, admirably qualify him to give a record of intellectual progress in every civilized country, such as we look for in vain in any cotemporary periodical. [Harper's New Monthly Magazine.

Knickerbocker Magazine for 1851.

EDITED BY LEWIS GAYLORD CLARK.

IN one of the chapters of the Constitution of the State of Massachusetts, yet in force, there is a declaration, "That the encouragement of the Arts and the Sciences, and all good literature, tends to the honor of God, the advantage of the Christian religion, and the great benefit of this and the other United States of America." It has ever been the highest purpose of the Knickerbocker to elevate the standard of American Literature. It has been the medium of introducing many of our most popular authors to the public. To those who take a pride in sustaining a good American Magazine, entirely national in its character, we look for support. Men of judgment need not be told that it is impossible to get up a Magazine entirely original at the same prices at which those made up from foreign sources are sold. The unremitted efforts of the Editor and Publisher will be continued to improve the work.

SPLENDID PREMIUM TO OLD AND NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

The Publisher, grateful for the large increase of patronage which this old favorite of the reading community has received, since it passed into his hands, has determined to offer to the old patrons, and to all new subscribers, a splendid engraving recently published in this city, by Messrs. Goupil, Vibert & Co., from a painting by a well-known American artist, William S. Mount, Esq. This Print is entitled,

"MUSIC IS CONTAGIOUS."

It is 19 by 24 inches, is printed on beautiful paper, and when framed will make a valuable and elegant ornament for the drawing-room or parlor. The price of the Engraving is three dollars. It will be given to all subscribers to the Knickerbocker Magazine who pay their subscription for 1851 in advance, or during the month of January, 1851, and to all new subscribers who commence with January, 1851, and pay in advance. To entitle subscribers to the Engraving, all payments must be made to the Publisher. Subscribers who owe for more than one year will be expected to settle all arrears and pay for 1851, to entitle them to the Engraving. The bills of specie-paying banks in all parts of the country will be received in payment. The Engraving will be rolled on a stick, and so securely done up, that it can be sent to California, or any other part of the United States, with perfect safety. The number for January, 1851, will commence the thirty-seventh volume of this work.

ST. LEDGER; OR, THE THREADS OF LIFE.

The Publisher has great pleasure in annoucing to the readers of the Knickerbocker, and to the public generally, that he has effected an arrangement with Mr. RICHARD B. KIMBALL, the author of this popular and extraordinary Romance, to give the Sequel in the pages of this Magazine. The first chapter appears in the January number, and will be continued regularly until completed. This work has already passed through three editions in this country, and two in England, and has received more favorable notices from the American and English press than any work of fiction which has been issued during the last five years.

TERMS—$5 per annum, in advance. All letters on business must be addressed, post-paid, to
SAMUEL HUESTON, Publisher,
139 Nassau-street, New York.

Miscellaneous.

A City Song.

BY ELIZA COOK.

Go look into the City's face,
That spreadeth over tens of miles;
Go wander through the Merchant place
Of busy brains and countless piles.

From palace halls to cellar floors,
In broad highway and narrow street,
From beggars' dens to princes' doors,
Go look, and note what ye shall meet.

Close pent, and dim, the God of Gain
Dwells there within his home of stone,
Content with kennel and with chain,
So that he gnaw a golden bone.

Ah! gloomy are the Winter days
That close around the traffic mart,
And short-lived are the Summer rays
That fall upon the City's heart.

Yet dear Old Nature, fresh and fair,
Has worshipers, for ever true;
For ever fond; and even there
We see her sweet smile peeping through.

Common Schools of New York.

From the Annual Report of Christopher Morgan, Superintendent of Common Schools of the State of New York, recently presented to the Legislature, we copy the following paragraphs, showing the condition of the schools, and suggesting plans for their improvement.

Condition of the Common Schools.

From the returns of the several Town Superintendents, made to the County Clerks of the respective Counties, and bearing date on the first day of July last, an abstract of which will be fonnd in table A, annexed, it appears that the whole number of School Districts in the State, duly organized at that date, was 11,397, being an increase of 206 during the precedent year. Of this number 8,394 are composed of territory wholly situated in the town where the school-house of the district stands, and the remainder are joint districts, formed from two or more adjoining towns.

Reports, in accordance with law have been received by the several town superintendents from the trustees of 11,173 of these districts, leaving 124 districts from which no returns were made. These reports bear date on the 1st day of January, 1850, and refer to the condition of the several schools during the year 1849. The average period during which the schools were taught during that year, by duly qualified teachers, in accordance with law, was eight months. The whole number of children, between the ages of five and sixteen years, residing in the several districts of the State, on the 31st day of December, 1849, was 735,188; and the number of children taught during the preceding year was 794,500, being an excess of 59,312 over the number between the ages of five and sixteen, and 16,191 over the whole number taught in 1848. Of the number thus taught, 9,079 had been under instruction during the entire year; 16,455 for ten months and less than twelve; 59,315 for eight months and less than ten; 106,100 for six months and less than eight; 167,732 for four months and less than six; 193,022 for two months, and less than four, and 200,128 for a period less than two months. The period of attendance of the remaining 35,669 is not included in the reports of the trustees, which have been found very defective in this respect, from the difficulty of ascertaining the requisite data upon which to base these returns.

Expenditure of School Monies.

During the year embraced in the report of the Trustees, the whole amount of money paid for teachers' wages in the several districts from which reports were received, was $1,322,696 24, of which $767,389 20 was public money, $508,724 56 raised on on rate bills from those sending to school, $31,834 27 raised by district tax to supply deficiencies in the collection of such rate bills, and $14,748 21 raised in like manner to defray the rate bills of indigent persons, exempted by the Trustees in the mode prescribed by law. The number of children thus placed on the list of indigent exempts during the year 1849 was 18,686.

The aggregate amount of library money expended during the same year, in the purchase of books and articles of school apparatus authorized by law, was $92,456 78; and the amount raised by district taxation for such apparatus, for book cases and other purposes connected with the several district libraries, was $2,628 73, making an aggregate of $95,085 54 for library expenditures and school apparatus.

The following sums were raised by the inhabitants of the severals districts, during the year 1849, by district taxation, in addition to those above specified, for the respective purposes enumerated—viz:

For purchasing sites	$23,490 62
For building school houses	154,932 06
For renting houses or rooms for schools	2,724 67
For repairing school houses	52,090 75
For insurance on school houses	8,721 97
For fuel for school houses	62,334 29
For other purposes	49,593 13
Total	$348,886 49

District Libraries.

The whole number of volumes in the several school district libraries of the State, on the 31st of December, 1849, was 1,449,950, being an increase of 4,796 volumes during the year reported, and comprising an average of 197 volumes to each school district.

The Superintendent begs leave to renew the suggestion made in the last annual report from this Department, in reference to the expediency of supplying each district library of the State with a copy of Webster's unabridged American Dictionary.

Free Schools.

After referring to the opposition which the Free School Law has encountered, and the successful issue of the recent struggle, the Superintendent says:—

It remains for the Legislature to give efficacy to this renewed expression of the popular will, by the enactment of a law which shall definitely engraft the free school principle upon our existing system of primary education, and at the same time remove all just cause of complaint as to the inequality of taxation. District taxation has been found to be unjust, unequal and oppressive. It should, therefore, at once be abandoned, so far as the ordinary support of the schools is concerned. The funds necessary for the payment of teachers' wages, in addition to the amount received from the State Treasury, should be provided either by a State tax equitably levied on real and personal property according to a fixed and uniform standard of valuation, by a county and town tax levied and assessed in the same manner, or by such a combination of these three modes as might be deemed most expedient and judicious.

The common schools of the State should be declared free to every resident of the respective districts, of the proper age to participate in their benefits; and their support should be made a charge upon the whole property either of the State at large or of the respective counties and towns in which they are situated.

The bill which passed the Assembly at its last session, provided for the levying of an annual tax of $800,000 on the real and personal property of the State according to the assessed valuation of such property, and for the distribution of the aggregate amount so to be raised, among the several counties and towns of the State, according to the number of children, of proper school age, residing in each. This sum, together with the amount annually apportioned from the revenue of the Common School Fund, would, it was supposed, be sufficient for the support of the several schools of the State during an average of eight months in each year. The whole amount expended for teachers' wages during the year 1849, was $1,322,696 24, to which is to be added an aggregate amount of $110,000 for library purposes, making in the whole $1,432,696 24. The Superintendent, however, entertains no doubt that the amount proposed to be raised by the bill referred to, in conjunction with the State appropriation, the revenue from which is rapidly and steadily increasing, will be amply adequate to the payment of teachers' wages for the average length of time during which the schools have heretofore been taught, and to the annual and adequate replenishment of the libraries and necessary apparatus for the schools.

Under the present defectively administered system of assessment, however, such a tax will operate very unequally in different sections of the State. The standard of valuation both of real and personal property, varies, as is well known, in nearly every county of the State; while in some it is estimated at its fair and full market value, in others it is assessed at three-fourths, two-thirds, and sometimes as low as one-half its actual value. If, therefore, the existing standard of valuation is to be made the basis of the apportionment of the proposed tax, it is manifest that a very unjust and oppressive burden will be cast upon those counties where the assessment is in strict accordance with the provisions of law, for the benefit of those sections in which its requirements are evaded by an arbitrary standard of valuation.

Hydrophobia.

We find the following among the miscellaneous selections of the Charleston (S. C.) Mercury. If it is an authentic statement, and M. Buisson is a person worthy of credence, the information which it discloses is of grave importance, not only to the medical faculty, but to the whole human family. That the Academy of Sciences should have treated it with disregard so long is, perhaps, attributable to its having been anonymously communicated.

"M. Buisson has written to the Paris Academy of Sciences, to claim as his a small treatise on hydrophobia, addressed to the Academy so far back as 1835, and signed with a single initial. The particulars and the mode of cure adopted were as follows: He had been called to visit a woman, who for three days was said to be suffering under this disease. She had the usual symptoms, constriction of the throat, inability to swallow, abundant secretion of saliva, and foaming at the mouth. Her neighbors said she had been bitten by a mad dog, about forty days before. At her own urgent entreaties she was bled, and died a few hours afterwards, as was expected. M. Buisson, who had his hands covered with blood, incautiously cleansed them with a towel which had been used to wipe off the saliva that adhered with a little water. The ninth day after, being in his cabriolet, he was suddenly seized with a pain in his throat, and one still greater in his eyes. The saliva was continually pouring into his mouth; the impression of a current of air, and the sight of brilliant bodies, gave him a painful sensation; his body appeared to him so light that he felt as though he could leap to a prodigious height. He experienced, he said, a wish to run, and bite, not men, but animals and inanimate bodies. Finally, he drank with difficulty, and the sight of water was still more distressing to him than the pain in the throat. These symptoms recurred every five minutes, and it appeared to him as tho' the pain commenced in the affected finger, and extended thence to the shoulder. From the whole of the symptoms he judged himself afflicted with hydrophobia, and resolved to terminate his life by stifling himself with a vapor bath. Having entered one for this purpose, he caused the heat to be raised to one hundred and seventy degrees thirty-six minutes Farhenheit, when he was equally surprised and delighted to find himself free of all complaint. He left the bathing room well, dined heartily, and drank more than usual. Since that time, he says, he has treated in the same manner more than eighty persons bitten, in four of whom the symptoms had declared themselves; and in no case has he failed, except in case of one child, seven years old, who died in the bath. The mode of treatment he recommends is, that the person bit should take a certain number of vapor baths, (commonly called Russian) and should induce every night a violent perspiration, by wrapping himself in flannels, and covering himself with a feather bed; the perspiration is favored by drinking freely of a warm decoction of sarsaparilla. He declares, so convinced is he of the efficiency of his mode of treatment, that he will suffer himself to be inoculated with the disease. As a proof of the utility of copious and continual perspiration, he relates the following anecdote:—A relative of the musician Gretry was bitten by a mad dog, at the same time with many other persons, who all died of hydrophobia. For his part, feeling the first symptoms of the disease, he took to dancing night and day, saying that he wished to die gaily. He recovered. M. Buisson also cites the old stories of dancing being a remedy for the bite of a tarantula; and draws attention to the fact that the animals in which this madness is most frequently found to develop itself spontaneously, are dogs, wolves, and foxes, which never perspire."

Anti-Fugitive Slave Law Convention—Resolutions.

The following resolutions, introduced by Gerrit Smith, Esq., were adopted by the Anti-Fugitive Slave Law State Convention, held at Syracuse, N. Y., on the 7th, 8th, and 9th days of January.

1. Resolved, That we pour out upon the Fugitive Slave Law the fullest measure of our contempt, and hate, and execration; and pledge ourselves to resist it, actively as well as passively, and by all such means as shall in our esteem promise the most effectual resistance.

2. Resolved, That obviously and grossly unconstitutional as is this law, nevertheless, this is not the chief reason why we condemn and defy it:—for equally, whether they are constitutional or unconstitutional, do we condemn and defy all laws, which insult Him who is above all Constitutions, and which, aiming not to protect, but to destroy right, are therefore to be regarded as no laws.

3. Resolved, That horrible as is this law, we must bear in mind, that it is but a perfectly natural and not at all to be wondered at exaction of Slavery; and that hence our first and great work is to get rid, not of the law, but of Slavery—as it would be our first and great work to pursue and kill the mad dog instead of pausing until we had effected the cure of one of his bites.

4. Resolved, That between corrupt politics on the one hand, and corrupt churches on the other—between the politicians and parties who enacted this law, and the priests who are preaching its enforcement—there is no hope for this nation unless it shall very speedily be brought to prefer honesty to knavery, both in its religious teachers and civil rulers.

5. Resolved, That were the current religion of the country to be exchanged for blank infidelity, the abolition of Slavery would be comparatively easy.

6. Resolved, That inasmuch as every National party in this nation must, because it is a National party, spare if not indeed positively favor Slavery, it follows that whoever belongs to the Whig or Democratic party, or to any ecclesiastical National party, does, however unwillingly, give his influence and support to Slavery.

7. Resolved, That the time has come, and had long ago come, for gathering a Northern political party, which shall be both determined and able to carry out the principles of the Federal Constitution, and the principles of humanity and religion, in overthrowing the base and bloody system of American Slavery, and in establishing a righteous Civil Government.

8. Resolved, That we welcome the presence in this Convention of William L. Chaplin, and render thanks to Almighty God for having preserved him alive under the blows and threats of murderous ruffians, and while in the dreary prison, to which villainous and piratical Governments had committed him.

9. Resolved, That instead of rebuking and scorning, we honor and love this dear brother for having done that for which Jesus Christ will say unto him before an assembled world: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

10. Resolved, That if William L. Chaplin has done violence to the principles of Republicanism and Christianity in aiding a couple of his fellow-men to make their escape from Slavery by getting into his carriage, then are Republicanism and Christianity the deadliest enemies of humanity, and the cruelest lies that have ever been propagated.

11. Whereas, Notwithstanding the considerable amount of donations towards effecting the liberation of our brother Chaplin, he was obliged, by reason of the exorbitant bail required of him, to borrow large sums of money from various individual, Resolved, therefore, that we deeply sympathize with him under his pecuniary embarrassments, and warmly desire that the benevolent may soon relieve him of them.

12. Resolved, That the liberation of Chaplin is an occasion for remembering afresh and pitying afresh Drayton and Sayres, and calling afresh upon this hypocritical and cruel nation to set these outraged and afflicted brethren at liberty.

13. Whereas, Inasmuch as the imprisonment of Drayton and Sayres for aiding their fellow men to escape from the horrors of Slavery, is an imprisonment for what not only humanity and religion pronounce a virtue, but for what the law of the Declaration of Independence, since it declares "that all men are created equal," pronounces a virtue; and for what the law of the Federal Constitution, since it declares its object to be "to establish justice and secure the blessings of liberty," does also pronounce a virtue.

Resolved, therefore, That it would be not a lawless act, but a lawful as well as a humane and religious act, to demolish the prison of these philanthropists, and let them go free,

According to an official return just issued the total number of factories of all kinds in Great Britain is 4,330, containing 26,538,716 spindles, and 288,916 power looms. The moving power employed is 107,113 in steam, and 26,104 in water. In the silk-throwing mills, 1,727 boys and 3,910 girls, between 11 and 13, are employed. The total number of children under 13 years of age employed in factories who attend school is 19,400 boys, and 15,722 girls. The total number of males employed, between 13 and 18, is 67,294, that of females above 13 is 319,577, and that of males above 18 is 157,866. The total number of persons of both sexes employed in factories is 596,082.

In the Vice Chancellor's Court at London an application was lately made before Lord Cranworth for the discharge of a prisoner who had been in custody for contempt upwards of 15 years. In the year 1836 an order had been made discharging the prisoner, except as to the costs. The costs had been subsequently paid, but the defendant had, notwithstanding, remained in prison. The application was refused, notice not having been duly given to the other party. His lordship characterized the applicant as "a party who had obstinately remained in prison for so long a time to the scandal of the court!"

Bullfight Extraordinary.

A bullfight, worthy of the arena at Madrid or Seville, took place a short time ago near the Gruyere mountains, and is thus described by a Swiss journal:—"Two fine herds, one of which belonged to the rich commune of Montreaux, (Vaud,) grazed upon neighboring pastures. For some time the utmost harmony reigned among these two companies, which were only separated from each other by a low, weak wall, when, one day, being nearer together than usual, the two bulls, who played the part of sultans to the feminine followers, exhibited their jealousy of each other by foaming mouths and bellowing sounds bellicose. The herdsmen drove their cows to their stalls, and their lords soon followed. The next morning, however when turned out again to graze, no sooner did the bulls perceive each other than the wall was cleared, and with a roar of defiance they rushed together. So great was the shock of their meeting, that they both staggered and mutually paused: but only for a moment, and they were engaged in a combat more fierce than the Alps had ever witnessed. The affrighted cows, uttering piteous cries, formed a capacious circle around the combatants. The herdsmen, having sought in vain to separate them, stood the spectators of the fight, and growing excited with the view of the fight, encouraged by their cries their favorites to renewed exertions. Blood flowed on both sides, and the sight but served to add greater fierceness to attack and repulse. For a long time the issue appeared doubtful, when the fight promised to come to a more terrible termination than had been anticipated. During the whole contest the animals had been momentarily approaching the edge of a precipice, and that they must be dashed to pieces seemed to be their inevitable fate. At length the bull of Montreaux was dragged to the edge of the rock, and by a desperate effort on the part of his adversary, hurled over the side into the depth below: borne along by the violence of his effort, the latter likewise fell over, but succeeded in getting a footing upon a ledge which jutted out a few feet down. By great efforts on the part of the herdsmen he was extricated from his novel position; but his opponent lay a mangled mass below.

Voting Machine for Legislative Bodies.

A new machine for taking the Ayes and Nays has just been introduced in the French Legislative Assembly, at a cost to the Government of 30,000 francs. It offers the advantages of undoubted correctness and great rapidity. Each representative will be provided with a small box, on which his name will be inscribed in gold letters. This box will contain ten bulletins for voting, five white (for), and five blue (against). These bulletins consist of small oblong pieces of polished or blue steel, bearing on each face the name of the representative. The urns, which are chef's d' œuvre of mechanism, have two distinct compartments, blue and white, arranged in such manner that the bulletin of white steel cannot enter into the blue compartment, for the blue bulletins into the white one. Any error in the vote, therefore, becomes impossible. The pieces of steel, in falling into the urn, do not lie across each other in disorder, but are piled up regularly, one on the other, round a copper rod, with numbers inscribed on it, so that a single glance is sufficient to tell how many votes for or against are contained in each urn. When all the votes are collected, the ushers will withdraw the rod from each urn, and place it in a piece of machinery on the tribune, and which will immediately indicate the number of votes for or against. The secretaries have only to add them up, and when the addition is made they have only to touch a lever, and the bulletins turn, so that the secretaries who have counted the blue ones may, without moving from their seats, also count the white ones, and so check each other. The result of the vote will be thus known in a positive manner in a few minutes. By the aid of six lists, drawn up beforehand, and corresponding to a number engraved on one of the corners of the bulletins, the taking of the names for the Moniteur, which formerly occupied a considerable time, and frequently led to many errors, will be performed in ten minutes.

An Incident.

A Washington letter in the Evening Post narrates the following incident, which took place at the capital of the freest and greatest country on earth:

As the cars were departing from the Baltimore station, on Thursday evening, my attention was called to an occurrence which was in some degree parallel to Long's case, and deserves to be made public. A respectable free colored man, in appearance, had been serving as a waiter at one of the city hotels. He had recently come from Baltimore. There was no question of his freedom, none as to his character; but he was "informed upon" as a fellow who was seeking to earn his own bread by honest industry forty miles from his birth-place. He was arrested and the offense was proved.

He was ordered to give bonds in one thousand dollars for his good behavior, or to leave the place in twenty-four hours. But, like many other respectable men, he could get nobody to bind himself in the penal sum of one thousand dollars to insure the corporation, the people of Washington, for the good health, and good conduct of this black man. He sorrowfully took up his bundle and went to the Baltimore cars, to shake off the dust of his feet against the place. But he was there met with the information that he could not enter the cars to leave the District, unless he gave bond for a thousand dollars, with two sufficient securities, that he was not a slave. Here was another illustration of the advantages of being in the freest country on earth. A thousand dollars to stay, a thousand dollars to go, and the poor object of so many attentions with not half so many cents. Imprisonment is, I believe, the penalty for non-compliance with one or the other demand. What was the issue of his difficulties, I do not know.

Potato Rot.

A writer in the Boston Cultivator has suggested a thought on the subject of cultivating the potato, which may be serviceable to some of our farming subscribers. He says:—"My experience in farming for myself has been short, only of two years' duration, but since the blight first came upon the potato, I have observed it in various places, and have been led to the conclusion, that it is caused by the gases contained in the atmosphere, and I have never had any sufficient reason to change my opinion. Last spring I selected a small piece of ground, about three fourths of an acre; after ploughing, I applied a top-dressing of manure from the yard, and after harrowing thoroughly, I furrowed out the ground about three feet apart and four inches deep, and planted the potatoes in the furrow, about eighteen inches apart, and hoed once. I planted a few rows without furrowing, on the same piece, the land being quite as good. The rows planted without furrowing were nearly destroyed, seven eighths of the potatoes being good for nothing; while on the part planted in the furrows, there was not one bushel of poor potatoes in fifty."

SAGACITY OF A HORSE.—A few days since, as we were leaving our residence on our usual morning visit to the office, says the editor of the Long Point Advocate, a sorrel horse, belonging to us, galloped up and caught our arm, and made an attempt to pull us in the direction he wished to go. He then left and went off at a quick gait towards a pasture on our farm about a quarter of a mile distant from our residence. In a few minutes he approached us again, making an unusual noise, and seemed by his actions to desire us to follow him; this we did, and when we reached the pasture we observed the mate of the horse entangled in a bridge which had gone through with him. After we had extricated his companion from his dangerous position, the horse which had given notice of his companion's danger came up and rubbed his head against us, showing evident signs of great satisfaction.

SOLAR PHENOMENON.—One day last month the people of St. Paul (Minnesota) witnessed a superb solar exhibition. From sunrise to sunset, three suns, of equal brightness, and too dazzling for the naked eye, apparently arose at once in the horizon, and the ground being covered with snow, poured forth a deluge of light, far more intense than is usually witnessed. A stream of powerfully refracted rays was blazing down from the real sun in the center, like the blazing beard of a fiery comet, while on each side of the sun, like the segments which form a parenthesis thus, (.)—hung a brilliant sun-dog, with a local point in the center of each, intensely luminous; so that the two suns, the offspring of the sun by refraction, shone in equal splendor.

ANOTHER GREAT DISCOVERY.—The Germantown (Pa.) Telegraph says there has just been brought to light the application of a power which is to supersede entirely the present steam power of the world! The discovery has been made by an Eastern man, who has completed his models—one of which will be deposited at Washington as soon as patent rights shall be secured in the different European countries. The machinery is entirely perfected—the power is a motive one, and steam has no part in creating it. So simple and economical are the principle and application, that two tons of coal will be sufficient to drive the largest ship-of-the-line around the world.

MEDICINAL PROPERTIES OF THE QUINCE.—In medicine, the expressed juice, taken in small quantities, repeatedly, is cooling, astringent, and stomachic. The fruit, taken in small quantities, will restrain vomiting and hemorrhage, and is also good for dropsy and difficulty of taking breath. The flowers, fresh or dried, are good for an inflammation of the eyes; and the root was used, in former times, as a sort of charm for those afflicted with scrofula.

BALD EAGLE.—Mr. Lysander Wilson, of Romulus, Y. Y. succeeded in capturing recently a Bald Eagle measuring 8 feet and 2 inches from tip to tip of wings. He was discovered partaking of bait placed near the barn for crows, when Mr. W. leveled his gun, and firing, slightly disabled one wing; then, with the assistance of another individual and a fence rail, the proud monarch of the feathered tribe, was captured, and is now in durance vile.

WHAT SYSTEM AND DISPOSITION WILL DO.—The Southern Presbyterian mentions a missionary who has recently sent $90 to the American Tract Society, and who says that by adopting and carrying out a systematic plan of benevolence, he has been enabled, during the twenty years of his mission, to contribute for benevolent purposes more than seven thousand dollars.

About 70 members of the Quebec Bar left the Superior Court, and have refused to plead there the Court having established a scale of fees which the Bar thinks is insufficient. The Chief Justice, in announcing the scale, said that if, after three or six months trial, it was found to be inadequate remuneration, the Court would raise it. But the contingency was not palatable to the lawyers.

The Portland Advertiser learns that a shock of an earthquake was felt at Waterville and vicinity, on Friday night, Jan. 3, at half-past eleven o'clock. It was accompanied by a noise like the rumbling of carriage wheels, or like the sliding of snow from a roof, which lasted about 30 seconds. The shock was also felt at Troy, some 25 miles to the eastward of Waterville.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year of this Seminary, for 1850 and '51, will commence the third Wednesday in August, and continue forty-four weeks, including a short recess between the terms, and one of ten days for the winter holidays.

The year is divided into three terms:—

The first, of 14 weeks, begins Wednesday, August 21st, and ends Wednesday, November 27th.

The second, of 15 weeks, begins Monday, December 2d, and ends Friday, March 14th.

The third, of 14 weeks, begins Tuesday, March 18th and ends Tuesday, June 24th.

Board of Instruction.

GURDON EVANS, A. M., President,
And Professor of Mathematics and Natural Science.

Rev. JOSEPH W. MORTON,
Professor of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, Spanish and Moral and Intellectual Science.

Mrs. SUSANNA M. SPICER, Preceptress.

ADOLPH ROSENHAYN,
(Late of Friedrick Wilhelm College, Berlin,)
Teacher of German, Piano Forte, and Assistant in Greek and Latin.

Other competent Teachers will be employed as occasion may demand.

TEACHERS' CLASSES will be formed, as usual, at the beginning of the Fall and middle of the Winter Terms, and continue seven weeks.

In the Common Branches, classes will be formed at the commencement of each term; but in the higher, the interest of the student, as well as the welfare of the Institution, demand that a more systematic course of study be pursued.

In the Natural Sciences, Elementary Chemistry and Philosophy will be pursued during the Fall Term Agricultural Chemistry, Astronomy, and Physiology during the Winter Term; Botany and Geology during the Summer Term.

Classes will be formed in Latin, French, and German, at the commencement of the Fall Term; in Hebrew, Greek, and Spanish, at the commencement of the Winter Term, and continue through the course of study.

In Mathematics, Geometry is studied in the Fall, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, and Astronomy, Surveying, Navigation, &c., in the Summer Term.

The course of instruction in Agriculture is thorougly scientific, embracing study and recitation in the best authors. Instruction is given in a well-furnished laboratory, in the analysis of soils, ashes of plants, manures, &c. and the modes of testing for their constituent elements. The attention of farmers who wish to give their sons a practical education is especially called to this department.

Board in private families, from $1 25 to $1 50. Many students board in clubs for 60 to 75 cents.

TUITION—to be settled upon entering school—from $3 00 to $5 00. EXTRAS—For Drawing, $1 00; Oil Painting, $5 00; Chemical Experiments, $1 00; Writing, including stationery, 50 cents; Piano Forte, $8 00; Use of Instrument, $2 00; Agricultural Chemistry, including chemicals, apparatus, and fuel, (breakage extra,) $12 00.

It is very desirable that students should enter at the beginning of the term; yet they are received into classes already formed at any time.

For farther information, address Gurdon Evans, J. W. Morton, or Rev. J. R. Irish, President of the Corporation.

"EQUALITY OF THE RACES."

Reply to Tamar Davis.

Since my friend has expressed her intention to "entertain no farther discussion of the merits or demerits of the Fugitive Slave Law," I take this occasion to tender my sincere thanks for the assistance she has so kindly afforded in placing the subject, in its various attitudes, before the public. As the only return I can make, I now proffer my humble services in the investigation of the subject she has so ably discussed in the Recorder of Jan. 9th, viz., "The Equality of the Races."

It will be proper, in the first place, to correct the writer's misapprehensions, and consequent misstatements, of my positions, as set forth in my last article on the Fugitive Bill. She says, "It is remarkable, that any one acquainted with human physiology should fall into such an egregious mistake as to assert, that the only difference between the races is 'cutaneous.'" I have asserted no such thing. My only assertion on that point was, "that the color of the negro is cutaneous, and does not affect his character or his rights." By this I meant to be understood, that the coloring matter which gives complexion to all races of men, is a secretion from the blood, deposited on the inner coat of the cuticle, between it and the cutis vera, and that the amount of this matter deposited is no measure of character or rights. Those branches of the Caucasian race which have but little color of the skin, may, for aught I can see, possess as perfect a character, and as many rights, as those branches which are more highly favored with color—as the Jews of Cochin, who are beautifully black. I cannot perceive why the pale, deathly visage of the European may not enshroud a soul equally endowed with rights and capabilities as if it were wrapped in the shining skin of the tawny Ethiopian. Will some one, richly endowed with the prevailing prejudice against the poor blacks, unfold to us the mysteries of that philosophy by which the black is pushed from every privilege of white society, because he is black? Are the blacks of the Caucasian race less richly endowed with rights than the whites of that race? Are the whites of the Ethiopian race more richly endowed than the blacks of the same race? My only object in thus interrogating, is properly to caricature the ridiculous sentiment which infects almost every community of our country, that the color of the skin is the measure of human rights. I do not charge this sentiment upon my friend in controversy, for I believe her to be an intelligent Christian. But if we find the osseous structure of the negro to vary a little from the Caucasian, that is, if the posterior protrusion of the tarsal bones of the foot of the one, exceed by a few lines that of the other—if the anterior protrusion of the maxilaries shall be greater in the one than in the other—if the frontal, temporal, perictal, and occipital bones of the one shall unite by strait sutors, or zizag, or no sutors at all—if any difference of conformation whatever shall exist—if both belong to the "genus homo," I am totally uninstructed in the mysteries of that necromancy by which such difference adds to or subtracts from the essential attributes of character or measure of rights which naturally pertain to that genus.

Again, the writer says, "My friend also claims, and summons the history of mankind to prove, that the negro is equal, in every respect, to the Caucasian." I have made no such claim. The only claim I have yet made is, "that the negro is equal to the Caucasian in mental endowment." The proposition, that he is equal in mental development, at which the writer hurls her historical darts, I have not yet made. In elucidation of my position, I remark, that by "mental endowment" I mean the inherent faculties or potentialities of the human soul. These are sensitivity, intelligence, and will, with the secondary faculties of each. Every human being is endowed alike with these faculties at birth. The training of a thousand years can add no new faculty, nor can the want of training subtract a single one. The eternal ages of the spirit world will only develop these universal attributes of mind. They will create no new ones. If the negro possesses less of these faculties than other races, then either he had a separate creation from other races, or, if created in Adam with other races, at some period subsequent to that creation, some faculty has been annihilated. If we take the former position, and deny the unity of the human race in origin, we array ourselves against the Bible, the universal history of the world, and the tradition of numberless ages, and involve ourselves in the misty mazes of inextricable confusion. If we assume the latter, and affirm that some faculty of mind has been annihilated, and thus a kind of semi-human being has been produced in the negro, we become involved in the absurdity of mental divisibility. But, further, if by the operation of any causes one faculty of mind could be destroyed, then others could, and thus the soul of man might tumble into the dreadful gulf of annihilation. No want of development in any faculty of the human soul, can be admitted in evidence against the existence of such faculty. There was a time when every faculty of the wisest man in the universe lay undeveloped. But were there no faculties there? Does the first object which arrests the notice of the child create the faculty of perception. If matter thus acting on matter can create perception, then it can create reflection, judgment, and imagination; and thus, every faculty of the soul, created by the action of matter upon matter, must be material. And what matter can create, in can annihilate. We thus, if the doctrines of Locke be true, get a kind of wooden soul, not well adapted to exercise hopes of immortality.

But not only is the "mental endowment" of universal man equal, but those endowments are susceptible of exactly equal development—for every faculty of the human soul is susceptible of, and destined to, infinite development. In confirmation of these metaphysical facts, Harris most beautifully remarks, (see "Man Primeval," p. 26,) "The most dissimilar races are found to be psychologically identical. Tribes rashly proscribed as on a level with the brute, have in our own day vindicated their claim to a common humanity. The metropolis of civilization is not without its degraded Bushman, while the aboriginal Australian is not incapable of European civilization. As far as we know, no race of men stands in intellectual or moral isolation." Reese, in his "Elements of Zoology," p. 46, after relating the various degrees of mental development in the different negro tribes of Africa, remarks, "There can be little doubt, then, that no decided line separates the African from the European races, and that the former may, in process of time, be brought up to the intellectual and moral standard of the latter." Dr. Frichard remarks, that the Bushmen and Hottentots of South Africa present humanity in its most degraded form, and yet they are capable of European civilization. Thus I have the best testimony of the literary world, not only that the negroes, but tribes of other races immensely below him, are capable of Caucasian civilization. I shall comply with my friend's injunction, to try this question by "generalities," but first by particulars, which equally subserve our purpose.

I have already affirmed, what reason and revelation corroborate, that the various races of man are "psycologically identical," and that the human soul is destined to infinite progression. Each individual negro, then, is destined to infinite mental development, or his soul is not a human soul. But that it is a human soul is certain, from its development presenting precisely the same faculties. That these faculties are susceptible of a development equal to that of the same faculties in other races, is further demonstrated by individual examples of intellectual greatness never surpassed by other races. Such, as we have said, and shall prove, was Euclid, who was not made great by "continual contact with the Caucasian," for he was taught by negroes, and is a teacher, not only of negroes, but of the world, wherever science has shed her genial rays for four thousand years. He still teaches with a potency unrivaled by the living or dead; and the proud Caucasian, who disdains to own his injured race as brothers, can feed on the dainties wrought out by the struggles of his mighty intellect, and then, viper-like, bite the hand that feeds him. Such are Garnet, Ward, Jackson, and a host of others, as bright luminaries as glitter in the diadem of the Empire State. Let the highest diplomas of honor which our colleges can bestow—such of them as feel no shock of their Caucasian sensibility by opening the portals of knowledge to pleading Africa—let them speak in behalf of the susceptibility of the negro soul. Now, if we admit that the original susceptibilities of the negro soul are alike throughout the race, then are all the negroes susceptible of development equal to those mentioned, and consequently equal to other souls.

In elucidation of my positon, I affirm, without hazard, what is true of all places and ages, that there is as high a state of intellectual development among the negroes of New York State, in proportion to numbers and facilities, as among the Caucasians, and that those in this and other States, who have merited and received the highest literary honors, have earned them in spite of embarrassments and prejudices, before which the haughty Anglo-Saxon would flee like a whipped spaniel. The colored man is brutally crowded from our schools; our churches (save in the negro pew,) our parlors, our social circles, our counting-rooms, are closed against him; our hearts, our affections and sympathies, are bolted against him; while our ungodly prejudices drive him from every facility for improvement. Verily, the touch of the Caucasian has been to him an aspen touch, full of venom. In defiance of it, however, the negro is rising in the brightest hopes of mental emancipation. But are there no inferior mentalities among the Caucasians? Our prisons and poor-houses are filled with them. The streets of our cities are crowded with them. Our thoroughfares groan with their burden. Our public works are checkered with them. In some of our proudest States, one-third of the white population can neither read nor write their names. Thus, in this land, the proudest trophy of Caucasian mind, wretchedness, crime, ignorance and mental imbecility, look in vain for a parallel among blacks of proportionate numbers and circumstances! And what of the groaning millions of Europe, sunk in a depth of degradation and ignorance never dreamed of by the negro in his native clime, as he clasps to his bosom the dear ones of his heart, and reposes under the cool shade of his native banana? Bunce, in his "Travels in Africa," says of the various negro tribes, "To describe them justly, we should see them in their native purity of manners, among their woods, living on the produce of their own daily labors, without other liquor than that of their own pools and springs. After having been torn from their own country and kindred, and reduced to the condition of brutes, to labor for a being they never knew; after lying, stealing, and all the long list of European crimes, have been made necessary to them; after having made them monsters, we describe them as such, forgetting that they are not now as their Maker created them, but such as, by teaching them our vices, we have transformed them into." I confess that Bruce offers no very flattering comment on the superiority of Caucasian morals. [Concluded next week.

REMINISCENCE OF GOVERNOR JOHN JAY.

"The memory of the just Smells sweet and blossoms in the dust."

These lines came forcibly to my mind, not long since, when enjoying the company of some of his friends who had unexpectedly, joined our family circle, after many years of absence. The conversation turned to former days, and many pleasant reminiscences returned with freshness to our memories. Among other interesting incidents, one of the company related the following:

"My mother was left a poor widow, with a large family, and although not wanting in industry and frugality, it was with difficulty that she could supply their necessities. We resided in Westchester County, a few miles from the residence of Gov. Jay. One day, to her surprise, she received a note from William Jay, (now Judge Jay,) the son of the Governor, requesting her to call on him as soon as convenient, as he had some pleasant information for her. The curiosity of the family was great; 'What can he want of mother?' was the earnest inquiry. The difficulty was how to get a conveyance, as it was too far to walk. A kind female neighbor offered her own, which was of the most humble character, and also to accompany her. By urging and whipping the sorry animal, they at last arrived at Mr. Jay's gate. Unwilling to let him see their old horse and wagon, they tied the old nag at a respectful distance from the mansion, and went in. Addressing mother, Mr. Jay said: 'My father, before he died, requested to be buried in the plainest manner; and by so doing, said he, there will be a saving of about two hundred dollars, which I wish you to give to some poor widow, whom you and your sister shall consider the most worthy; and I want you to get the silver money and count it out before me now. And,' continued Mr. Jay, 'Mrs. B., my sister, and I, have selected you, and here is the money,' presenting a bag containing two hundred dollars, all in half-dollar pieces. The poor woman was completely overcome with surprise and gratitude; she burst into tears, and strove to express her thanks, but her words could find no utterance; she could only weep. After a short time, the two females arose to leave the house. Mr. Jay accompanied them. When they had reached the piazza, what should they see, to their mortification, but the veritable old horse and wagon paraded before the door, awaiting them, which Mr. Jay had caused to be brought in from the outer gate. He having helped them in, and laid the bag of money at Mrs. B.'s feet, her associate directed the horse to go on, but he was not disposed to obey. She at last most reluctantly had to draw from the bottom of the wagon, where she had laid it, the hickory goad, and having laid it upon his back with some force, he was induced to start, and they slowly left the grounds of Mr. Jay.

"There were happy hearts when she arrived at home, and had told her eager listeners of her unexpected fortune. It enabled her to pay off some debts, and to render herself and her family comfortable for a long time."

Some time has elapsed since this excellent woman departed to a better world; but long will that family cherish the memory of him who "caused the widow's heart to sing for joy." [Living Age.

VANITY OF LIFE.

Severus, who had been raised from an humble station to the sovereignty of the Roman world, declared, "I have been all things, and it amounts to nothing."

Phillip III., of Spain, as he approached the close of his life, desired as his last act, to see and bless his children. He told particularly the Prince, his successor, that he had sent for him, "that he might learn the vanity of crowns and tiaras, and learn to prepare for eternity."

Taking leave of his friends, Sir Philip Sidney said, "Behold in me the end of this world and all its vanities." Sir John Mason said to those standing round his bed, "I have seen the most remarkable things in foreign parts, and been present at most state transactions for thirty years together; and have learned this, after so many years' experience, that seriousness is the greatest wisdom, temperance the best physic, and a good conscience the best estate; and were I to live again, I would change the court for a cloister, my privy counsellor's bustle for a hermit's retirement, and the whole life I have lived in the palace for one hour's enjoyment of God in the chapel. All things forsake me but my God, my duty, and my prayers."

How many are arrested by death in the midst of unfinished undertakings! Thus was it with Mohammend II., a Sultan of the Turks; and the inscription on his tomb reads: "I proposed to myself the conquest of Rhodes and proud Italy." Joseph II., of Austria, exclaimed in bitterness of soul, on his death-bed, that his epitaph should be, "Here lies Joseph, who was unsuccessful in all his undertakings!" "Behold," said Cuvier, on his death bed, to a friend, "behold a very different person to the man of Tuesday on Saturday. Nevertheless, I had great things to do. All was ready in my head after years of labor and research, there remained but to write; and now the hands fail, and carry with them the head."

THE DUMB CHILD.

She is my only girl;
I ask'd for her as some most precious thing,
For all unfinished was Love's jewell'd ring,
Till set with this soft pearl;
The shade that Time brought forth I could not see;
How pure, how perfect, seem'd the gift to me!

Oh, many a soft old tune
I used to sing unto that deaden'd ear,
And suffered not the lightest footstep near,
Lest she might wake too soon;
And hushed her brothers' laughter while she lay—
Ah, needless care! I might have let them play!

'T was long ere I believed
That this one daughter might not speak to me;
Waited and watch'd, God knows how patiently!
How willingly deceived;
Vain Love was long the untiring nurse of Faith,
And tended Hope, until it starved to death.

Oh! if she could but hear
For one short hour, till I her tongue might teach
To call me mother, in the broken speech
That thrills the mother's ear!
Alas! those seal'd lips never may be stirr'd
To the deep music of that lovely word.

My heart it sorely tries
To see her kneel, with such a reverent air,
Beside her brothers at their evening prayer;
Or lift those earnest eyes
To watch our lips, as though our words she knew—
Then moves her own, as she were speaking too.

I've watch'd her looking up
To the bright wonder of a sunset sky,
With such a depth of meaning in her eye,
That I could almost hope
The struggling soul would burst its binding cords,
And the long pent up thoughts flow forth in words.

The song of bird and bee,
The chorus of the breezes, streams, and groves,
All the grand music to which Nature moves,
Are wasted melody
To her; the world of sound a tuneless void;
While even Silence hath its charm destroy'd.

Her face is very fair;
Her blue eye beautiful; of finest mould
The soft white brow, o'er which, in waves of gold,
Ripples her shining hair.
Alas! this lovely temple closed must be,
For He who made it keeps the master-key.

Wills he the mind within
Should from earth's Babel-clamor be kept free,
E'en that His still small voice and step might be Heard at its inner shrine,
Through that deep hush of soul, with clearer thrill?
Then should I grieve?—O murmuring heart be still?

She seems to have a sense
Of quiet gladness in her noiseless play.
She hath a pleasant smile, a gentle way,
Whose voiceless eloquence
Touches all hearts, though I had once a fear
That even her father would not care for her.

Thank God it is not so!
And when his sons are playing merrily,
She comes and leans her head upon his knee.
Oh! at such times I know—
By his full eye and tones subdued and mild—
How his heart yearns over his silent child.

Not of all gifts bereft,
Even now. How could I say she did not speak?
What real language lights her eye and cheek,
And renders thanks to him who left
Unto her soul yet open avenues
For joy to enter, and for love to use.

And God in love doth give
To her defect a beauty of its own,
And we a deeper tenderness have known
Through that for which we grieve
Yet shall the seal be melted from her ear,
Yea, and my voice shall fill it—but not here.

When that new sense is given,
What rapture will its first experience be,
That never woke to meaner melody,
The rich songs of heaven—
To hear the full-toned anthem swelling round,
While angels teach the ecstacies of sound!

UNIVERSAL EDUCATION.

From the Report of Christopher Morgan, Superintendent of Common Schools of the State of New York.

The idea of universal education is the grand central idea of the age. Upon this broad and comprehensive basis, all the experience of the past, all the crowding phenomena of the present, and all our hopes and aspirations for the future, must rest. Our forefathers have transmitted to us a noble inheritance of national, intellectual, moral and religious freedom. They have confided our destiny as a people to our own hands. Upon our individual and combined intelligence, virtue and patriotism, rests the solution of the great problem of self-government. We should be untrue to ourselves, untrue to the memory of our statesmen and patriots, untrue to the cause of liberty, of civilization and humanity, if we neglected the assiduous cultivation of those means by which alone we can secure the realization of the hopes we have excited. These means are the universal education of our future citizens, without discrimination or distinction. Wherever in our midst a human being exists with capacities and facilities to be developed, improved, cultivated, and directed, the avenues of knowledge should be freely opened and every facility afforded to their unrestricted entrance. Ignorance should no more be countenanced than vice and crime. The one leads almost inevitably to the other. Banish ignorance, and in its stead introduce intelligence, science, knowledge, and increasing wisdom and enlightenment, and you remove, in most cases, all those incentives to idleness, vice and crime, which now produce such a frightful harvest of retribution, misery and wretchedness. Educate every child "to the top of his faculties," and you not only secure the community against the depredations of the ignorant and the criminal, but you bestow upon it, instead, productive artizans, good citizens, upright jurors and magistrates, enlightened statesmen, scientific discoverers and inventors, and the dispensers of a pervading influence in favor of honesty, virtue and true goodness. Educate every child physically, morally and intellectually, from the age of four to twenty-one, and many of your prisons, penitentiaries and alms-houses will be converted into schools of industry and temples of science; and the immense amount now contributed for their maintenance and support will be diverted into far more profitable channels. Educate every child—not superficially—not partially—but thoroughly—develop equally and healthfully every faculty of his nature—every capability of his being—and you infuse a new and invigorating element into the very life blood of civilization—an element which will diffuse itself throughout every vein and artery of the social and political system, purifying, strengthening and regenerating all its impulses, elevating its aspirations, and clothing it with a power equal to every demand upon its vast energies and resources.

These are some of the results which must follow in the train of a wisely matured and judiciously organized system of universal education. They are not imaginary, but sober inductions from well authenticated facts—deliberate conclusions from established principles, sanctioned by the concurrent testimony of experienced educators and eminent statesmen and philanthropists. If names are needed to enforce the lesson they teach, those of Washington and Franklin and Hamilton and Jefferson and Clinton, with a long array of patriots and statesmen, may be cited. If facts are required to illustrate the connection between ignorance and crime, let the official return of convictions in the several courts of the State for the last ten years be examined and the instructive lesson be heeded. Out of nearly 28,000 persons convicted of crime, but 128 had enjoyed the benefits of a good common school education; 414 only had what the returning officers characterize as a "tolerable" share of learning; and of the residue, about one-half could only either read or write. Let similar statistics be gathered from the wretched inmates of our poor-house establishments, and similar results would undoubtedly be developed. Is it not therefore incomparably better, as a mere prudential question of political economy, to provide ample means for the education of the whole community, and to bring those means within the reach of every child, than to impose a much larger tax for the protection of that community against the depredations of the ignorant, the idle and the vicious, and for the support of the imbecile, the thoughtless, and the intemperate?

Every consideration connected with the present and future welfare of the community—every impulse of an enlightened humanity—every impulse of an enlarged and comprehensive spirit of philanthropy, combine in favor of the adoption of this great principle. Public sentiment has declared in its favor. The new States which, within the past few years, have been added to the Confederacy, have adopted it as the basis of their system of public instruction; and the old States, as one by one they are re-constructing their fundamental laws and constitutions, are engrafting the same principle upon their institutions. Shall New York, in this noble enterprise of education, retrace her steps? Shall she disappoint the high hopes and expectations she has excited, by receding from the advanced position she now occupies in the van of educational improvement? Her past career, in all those elements which go to make up the essential wealth and greatness of a people, has been one of progress and uninterrupted expansion. Her far-seeing legislators and statesmen, uninfluenced by the skepticism of the timid, the ignorant, and the faithless, and unawed by the denunciations of the hostile, prosecuted that great work of internal improvement which will forever illustrate the pride and glory of her political history. The rich results of the experiment thus boldly ventured upon have vindicated their wisdom. Is the development of the intellectual and moral resources of her millions of future citizens an object of less interest, demanding a less devoted consecration of the energies of her people, and worthy of a less firm and uncompromising perseverance?

Disregarding the feeling of the present hour, and looking only to the future, will the consciousness of having laid the foundation for the universal education of our people be a less pleasing subject of contemplation than that of having aided in replenishing the coffers of their wealth?

POWER OF KINDNESS.

"Tom! Here!" said a father to his boy, speaking in tones of authority.

The lad was at play. He looked towards his father, but did not leave his companions.

"Do you hear me, sir?" spoke the father more sternly than at first.

With an unhappy face and reluctant step the boy left his play and approached his parent.

"Why do you creep along at a snail's pace?" said the latter, angrily. "Come quickly, I want you. When I speak, I look to be obeyed instantly. Here, take this note to Mr. Smith, and see that you don't go to sleep by the way. Now run as fast as you can go."

The boy took the note. There was a cloud upon his brow. He moved away, but at a slow pace.

"You Tom! Is that doing as I ordered? Is that going quickly?" called the father, when he saw the boy creeping away. "If you are not back in half an hour, I will punish you."

But the words had but little effect. The boy's feelings were hurt by the unkindness of the parent. He experienced a sense of injustice; a consciousness that wrong had been done him. By nature he was like his father, proud and stubborn; and these qualities of his mind were aroused, and he indulged in them, fearless of consequences.

"I never saw such a boy," said the father, speaking to a friend who had observed the occurrence. "My words scarcely make an impression on him."

"Kind words often prove most powerful," said the friend. The father looked surprised.

"Kind words," continued the friend, "are like the gentle rain and the refreshing dew; but harsh words bend and break like the angry tempest. The first develop and strengthen good affections, while the others sweep over the heart in devastation, and mar and deform all they touch. Try him with kind words; they will prove an hundred fold more powerful."

The latter seemed hurt by the reproof; but it left him thoughtful. An hour passed away ere his boy returned. At times during his absence he was angry at the delay, and meditated the infliction of punishment. But the words of remonstrance were in his ears, and he resolved to obey them. At last the lad came slowly in with a cloudy countenance, and reported the result of his errand. Having stayed far beyond his time, he looked for punishment, and was prepared to receive it with an angry defiance. To his surprise, after delivering the message he had brought, his father, instead of angry reproof and punishment, said kindly, "Very well, my son, you can go out to play again."

The boy went out, but was not happy. He had disobeyed and disobliged his father, and the thought of this troubled him. Harsh words had not clouded his mind nor aroused a spirit of reckless anger. Instead of joining his companions, he went and sat down by himself, grieving over his act of disobedience. As he thus sat he heard his name called. He listened.

"Thomas, my son," said his father, kindly. The boy sprang to his feet, and was almost instantly beside his parent.

"Did you call, father?"

"I did, my son. Will you take this package to Mr. Long for me?"

There was no hesitation in the boy's manner. He looked pleased at the thought of doing his father a service, and reached out his hand for the package. On receiving it, he bounded away with a light step.

"There is a power in kindness," said the father, as he sat musing, after the lad's departure. And even while he sat musing over the incident, the boy came back with a cheerful, happy face, and said—

"Can I do anything else for you, father?"

Yes, there is the power of kindness. The tempest of passion can only subdue, constrain and break; but in love and gentleness there is the power of the summer rain, the dew, and the sunshine.

MAN RESPONSIBLE FOR HIS BELIEF.

In no circumstances, even in the thickest gloom of paganism, can man be considered irresponsible for his belief. But the existence of a revelation places mankind in an entirely new position. The heathen is accountable only for the best exercise of his understanding he may be capable of, and for the adoption of such opinions as may seem most probable and consonant to reason. But when the will of God is made known, we are responsible, for refusing to learn, and believe, and obey. We do not incur guilt by our own incapacity to discover, but by our unwillingness; to that revelation attaches the heaviest responsibility. John iii. 19. We are not permitted to cull out such truths as may square with our metaphysical notions or our imperfect conceptions of the fitness of things, and to reject the rest: the command is imperative, "Believe the Gospel." To refuse God's instruction is infinitely more irrational, and infinitely more perilous, than it would be for a mariner in an unknown ocean to reject the proffered aid of charts and compass, and trusting to the uncertain guidance of a star to profess himself unaccountable for the safety of his bark. [Rev. J. Gilderdale.

Remorse and Despair.—Charles IX, of France, was a modern Nero, as the memorable St. Bartholomew's massacre, conducted under his auspices, can testify. The day after the butchery of thirty thousand Huguenots, he observed several fugitives about his palace, and taking a fowling piece, fired upon them repeatedly. Was it strange that he died in peculiar horror? "What blood," he cried out, "what murders!—ah! I have followed wicked advice. O my God! pardon me and be merciful. I know not where I am, I am so perplexed and agitated. How will all this end? What shall I do? I am lost for ever; I know it."

During the Papist persecution in England, one Rockwood distinguished himself for his busy malignity, and in his last sickness he fell to raging, "I am utterly damned!" He was exhorted to ask mercy of God, but he roared out, "It is now too late, for I have maliciously sought the death of many godly persons, and that against my own conscience, and therefore it is now too late."

Biblical Pronouns.—Luther pronounced pronouns to be the sweetest and most consolatory expressions to be found in the word of God. What, in fact, more tenderly elevating than where the prophet Isaiah heralds peace and refreshing to the people of Israel? "Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, saith your God." No longer the "Lord God, the Lord strong and mighty;" but "your God," and "my people." And how marked the difference between saying, "The Lord is a shepherd," and "The Lord is my shepherd;" between the heathen, who acknowledges God as the Father of all things, and the ransomed of his well-beloved, who behold in the Lord, "Our Father which is in heaven;" between "The Lord will hear me when I call upon him," and "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world."

True Courage.—"Should the Empress," says Chrysostom, in his epistle to Cyriacus, "determine to banish me, 'the earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof.' If she will cast me into the sea, let her cast me into the sea; I will remember Jonah. If she will throw me into a burning fiery furnace; the three children were there before me. If she will throw me to the wild beasts; I will remember that Daniel was in the den of lions. If she will condemn me to be stoned; I shall be the associate of Stephen the proto-martyr. If she will have me beheaded; the Baptist has submitted to the same punishment. If she will take away my substance; 'naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither.'"

That was a beautiful tribute of Napoleon to the supremacy of mind over physical force in the long trial. "Do you know, Fontanes," he said, "what I admire most in the world? It is the powerlessness of force to found anything. There are only two powers in the world. The sabre and the pen; and, in the end, the former is always conquered by the latter."

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, January 30, 1851.

TIME OF COMMENCING THE SABBATH.

We observe the fourth of July, rather than the third, the fifth, or any other day, because on that day Independence was declared. So we observe the seventh day of the week, rather than the first, because on that day God rested from his labors. Fitness requires that we begin our rest at the very time of day that God began his. If God began his at the going down of the sun on the sixth day of the week, fitness requires that we begin ours then also. If we delay it for twelve hours, we do not more than half commemorate the rest that Jehovah observed. We may object to this arrangement as inconvenient, as conflicting with important duties, as being at variance with the general habits of community, as impracticable; and hence draw the inference that it is not God-authorized, for God (as we think) would surely make a wiser regulation. But if the design of the Sabbath is to commemorate God's rest, and to commemorate the whole of it rather than the latter half, it better becomes us, short-sighted creatures, to set about performing the duty, than to complain of the arrangement because it does not happen to suit our notions of wisdom. A disposition to do the will of God is generally followed by an enlightening of the eyes to see the wisdom of the doctrine He reveals to us. Perhaps it would be so in this case. At all events, we shall offer a few remarks by way of showing the advantages connected with observing the Sabbath "from evening to evening," and leave them for the reflection of our readers.

In the first place, it throws a man upon the necessity of carefully calculating beforehand how he shall best arrange all his business, so as to be found in a state of readiness for the Sabbath when it comes. Early in the week, it may be, some one calls on him, and proposes an engagement for the next Friday. Immediately he calls to mind, that the close of that day ushers in the holy rest; and he either rejects the proposition altogether, or expressly stipulates that the engagement shall not conflict with his conscience in regard to the Sabbath. Thursday morning comes. "To-morrow evening," says he, "the Sabbath begins. I must not lay out too much work for the morrow, lest I shall not be able to finish before sacred time commences. I must not, as too many do, make it the busiest day of the week. I will do as much as I can to-day, so that I shall have no difficulty in closing up my labors before the going down of to-morrow's sun. I will look around, and see what is necessary to be done, lest to-morrow I may be caught unawares." Friday morning comes. "This evening," says he, "I must begin to commemorate God's rest. I must be ready for it. I have many little chores which must be attended to, and I will be careful not to continue at my other business so long, but what I shall have sufficient time to attend to them, before the day ends." Accordingly, if it takes him an hour to attend to these chores, he quits his other business an hour before sunset. He graduates his work according to the time that he has to do it, and all with an eye to the Sabbath, which is continually uppermost in his mind. And do not such thoughts, do not such careful calculations before-hand, entering as they do into every day's plans, tend to keep the mind continually stirred up to the sacredness of the institution? Is not a man obliged, in this way, to think ten times of the Sabbath and its duties, where he would once, if he were not compelled to begin it in the evening? Could there be any plan more wisely calculated to make him "remember" the Sabbath-day? Compelled, as he is, thus to arrange all his business, so as to offer not the slightest dishonor to the institution, is there not in this way begotten in his heart, and nourished and strengthened from day to day, a reverence for it? We are well enough satisfied how these questions would be answered by any one that understands the nature of the human mind. A child taught from day to day to do every thing in obedience to the wishes of his parent, and for the sake of honoring that parent, will soon have the feeling of reverence for him. He will respect his parent, not only when he is in his presence, but constantly, habitually, and in his absence. So, if we are taught and disciplined by our daily business to honor the Sabbath, the feeling of reverence for the institution will spring up in our breasts, and be a lasting and habitual impression. Every act of shaping our business with reference to it, will help to give it strength.

In the next place, the Sabbath being designed for all mankind, it is designed for a day of public worship, as well as for bodily rest. Reason and experience both teach us, that public worship, to be profitable and edifying, must be preceded by some preparation of heart. The Christian wants to retire to his closet, that, in communion with God, he may attain to that spiritual frame of mind which will dispose him to hear and receive the preached gospel into his heart. But with mankind at large there can be but little time for this kind of preparation, unless in the evening before. Take the country people, for example, some of whom have to travel quite a distance to their place of meeting. Perhaps it is the winter season. The mornings are short. From the time they rise they are incessantly occupied with such things as must of necessity be attended to at all times; and if the previous evening has not been spent in prayer and reading the scriptures, what preparation will they have for the services of the sanctuary? In summer the case is different. The mornings being long, afford a good deal of time for private devotion. But what time is gained here is lost the previous evening, the summer evenings being almost nothing. If the Christian wishes to go to the house of God with his heart already warmed by the Spirit's influence, and hungering for more communications of grace to his soul, let him not go without having spent a good while in his closet. Let him spend the evening following the sixth day in communion with his Lord.

In the third place, those who do not keep Friday evening are often at work quite late at night, particularly the female part of the family. The men, too, because they can attend to little chores and do errands after dark, delay the finishing of their ordinary business till the day is quite spent. The result is, they are all jaded out with excessive toil. They sleep late in the morning, they rise dull and heavy, and when they go to the house of God, they are so oppressed with drowsiness that they receive but little benefit from the services, or so dull and dispirited that they cannot enter into them with becoming zeal. Is this a wise arrangement?

One thing more we will offer. Commencing the Sabbath in the evening, seems as a test by which to distinguish the spiritual-minded worshiper from the worldling. The careful preparation which a person makes, so as to be ready for the Sabbath when it comes, shows that his heart is in the duties of it. If he uniformly leaves off his work, and begins with the shades of the evening to seek the face of the Lord, it is a pretty good proof that he "counts the Sabbath a delight." A worldly-minded man is seen to act very differently. For the sake of promoting his monied interests a little more, he extends his work late in the day. He never leaves off till the day is spent, and perhaps a little more than spent. Then he goes home to attend to little things. Perhaps he has been away to some distant town. He stays there as long as he can do business with other people, and then goes home in the evening, long after the Sabbath has begun. The love of gain, and the cares of this world, have too strong a hold upon his heart to allow him to make any different arrangements; and thus, from week to week, his character is made manifest by the very institution which he pretends to keep, and he falls under condemnation as a man who serves Mammon rather than God. Is it possible to test his worldliness so well by that plan which commences the Sabbath in the morning? Can you bring him out, and determine his true character?

These considerations appear to us as so many internal evidences, that the custom of observing the Sabbath "from evening to evening" is the one which Infinite Wisdom has enjoined. We do not intend to quarrel with those who differ from us, but we sincerely wish that we could all be of one mind in the Lord.

THE FRUITLESS SEARCH.

At one of our village stations, (says the English Baptist Reporter,) the Wesleyans have preached; and on one of the occasions the minister took an unconscious babe in his arms and sprinkled it, telling his audience of the blessings that were to be expected thereupon. A Baptist friend of ours, residing there, being grieved that such errors should be taught her neighbors, endeavored to counteract the evil in the following manner: On the following morning, when she had got her class of girls around her, she told them she would give that girl a good Bible who would bring her from the New Testament the greatest number of passages to prove that sprinkling of babes was baptism. Some half dozen set to work in good earnest, and fathers and mothers were called upon to aid them in the search; but, alas! they all found it a fruitless task, for not a single text could they find in the word of God to prove that infants should be sprinkled. Then their teacher told them she would give the Bible to that girl who would bring her the greatest number of texts to prove that immersion was the mode and believers were the subjects of baptism. The same girls set to work again, and soon produced most of the texts of Scripture that are to be found upon the subject; and a beautiful paragraph Bible was presented to the successful girl, who prizes her gift the more, as it was the fruit of her own researches. The Lord grant that it may be the means of making her wise unto salvation. I believe it is the teacher's intention to present "Pike's Persuasives" to two or three of the others, who made a good effort to obtain the Bible.

☞ A correspondent sends us the foregoing, accompanied with a note stating that the editor of the Baptist Reporter "is a rank Baptist, very keen to discover and expose the errors of sprinklers, and often giving hints about the Baptists adhering so closely to the rules of Scripture in all that they do." "Could we not," continues the note, "offer a present to any one who would find the most passages of Scripture for the first day of the week being the Sabbath?" Our reply is, that we have done it repeatedly. In the Recorder of August 8, 1844, we copied from an English periodical an article offering, among other prizes, "Twenty Guineas Reward to any Protestant who will find, in the New Testament, a single instance of infant baptism administered either by deacon or apostle." To which we appended the offer of "Five Hundred Dollars Reward to any Protestant or Catholic who will point out a single passage in the Scriptures which states, either that the seventh-day Sabbath has been abrogated, or that the first day of the week is the Sabbath, or that the first day has been substituted for the seventh." This offer has been standing now some six years, and yet nobody has claimed the reward. We are quite willing to renew it for the coming six years. Perhaps we ought to say, in this connection, how near one man—a learned Baptist preacher—came to getting the prize. He was out of business, and was saying to a friend, that he would be glad to get something to do which would help "keep the pot boiling" until a door of usefulness in the ministry should open. His friend pointed him to the five hundred dollar prize, and said, "There's a chance for you." He glanced at the conditions, and replied that he had examined that subject enough to know his chance would be a slim one.

OUR CHINA MISSION.

After a long silence, we have again been favored with news from our missionaries. They are in good health. The following extract from a letter of brother Carpenter, dated Sept. 27th, 1850, will be read with lively interest:—

"Our meetings during the summer months have not been numerously attended, but we always have some—sometimes forty, sometimes ten. The rainy season, and the hot weather that succeeds it, have considerably interrupted our efforts in carrying the good news to the doors of the people. This kind of operation we are trying to resume again. Occasionally we meet with a reception that affords encouragement enough to induce us to hold on our way.

"Dear brethren, again we call on you to rejoice with us in the conversion (as we hope) of another poor heathen from darkness to God's marvelous light. Somebody must be praying. The arm of the Lord is revealed for salvation in these ends of the earth. Tong Yuen Cheau is a man of high literary attainments, of an amiable disposition, belonging to Hang Chu, of the adjoining province Che Keang. My first acquaintance with him commenced in May last. He had possessed a small patrimony, but through the perfidy of an acquaintance, whom he trusted too far, it took to itself wings. When I saw him, he was in distressed circumstances. Such cases we generally regard with some degree of suspicion, till circumstances reveal their true character. But from the first there was something, which cannot be fully expressed on paper, in the appearance of this man, which inspired the hope that he was sincere in his professions of a desire to learn the new doctrine. He came every evening, and attended family devotions with us, and was regularly at Chapel on the Sabbath. His progress in the knowledge of the Scriptures was rapid. His heart, as well as his intellect, seemed to be interested and engaged in searching for the 'pearl of great price.' About the middle of July, he was examined as a candidate for baptism, in the presence of the members of our little church, and approved of. On the 19th of the same month, he was baptized, and admitted to fellowship with us, and with the household of faith in all lands. I am glad there can be some sort of fellowship with all the true-hearted, in spite of sectarian bands. Would that pure Bible Christianity could be generally received; then would these bands be sundered like the green withs around Samson, when the spirit of the Lord came upon him. I desire to give Taung an opportunity to become thoroughly acquainted with the Book of books, hoping that God may make him a bright and shining light in this dark land; and therefore he is to be my teacher, and live in the house with us. Probably, at the close of the year, I may dismiss Lee. He (Lee) is a good teacher, and thinks he is a believer, wishing to be baptized. But we cannot accede to his request at present. There is another person waiting for us to become willing to baptize him.

"I have asked Tong to write a letter to my brethren in America, according to his own views and feelings. And I take great pleasure in presenting to you the accompanying letter, in his own hand-writing, together with a translation which will give you a tolerably correct idea of what he intended to convey. Pray for this man, that he may be kept from the power of the enemy, grow in grace, and finally, with us, be ushered into the presence of the Lord with exceeding joy. Do call upon all our brethren, who love the cause, to pray for this man, that he may become mighty in the Scriptures, a real Apollos to his dark-minded countrymen."

Translation of Tong's Letter.

"This letter is addressed to all my seniors in the churches in America, for their inspection.

"I am a native of Che Keang Province. In my youth I read the standard books of this country, and although I clearly understood the doctrine of faithfulness and righteousness as taught in them, and received the instruction of the wise men and sages of antiquity, yet I only understood the instruction that pertains to this life. I did not understand the glory of heaven and the misery of hell which come afterward; neither did I know what God was able to render men miserable or happy. Hence I used sometimes to worship false gods, did not keep the Sabbath, and practiced what was wrong. My heart was not good. And I knew not that after death there is to be everlasting and remediless woe in hell, until the spring of the present year, when I came to Shanghai, and heard that my senior C. was establishing a sacred assembly and proclaiming good news. Many came to hear; I also came and heard, and then for the first time I understood that there is a true God, who is Lord of heaven, earth, and all things, whose power and glory are without bounds, and that Jesus is the true God's only beloved Son—that he, instead of the misery of all men, with his own blood made atonement for the sin of the world—and that all my doings were blended with sin, because I had not reverenced the true God, but opposed his true doctrine, neither had believed in Jesus, but was always allured by the devil. Knowing that after death I deserved to receive endless torments in hell, my heart was deeply troubled and I was afraid.

"When I heard my respected senior C. proclaim the gospel's true doctrine, I heard it as one awaking from a dream, and as one from the midst of darkness ushered into light. Hence my joy was great, my heart was bowed with reverence, and I desired to obey the law of God, serve Jesus, keep the Sabbath day, forsake the worship of false gods, abandon all evil, pray to have my former sins forgiven, and hope for glory hereafter. Therefore, on the 19th day of the 6th month, I received baptism at the hands of senior C.

"I desire long to have in remembrance all my seniors in the churches in your honorable country. But because my body is in China, I am unable to converse with you upon the doctrine of the Bible. Nevertheless, I think that those who have believed in Jesus are all his disciples, and constitute one body, and although separated by the distance of several myriads of miles, the members of the church have one heart, and desire after death to dwell at the right hand of Jesus, and together in one place behold each other, never more to be separated.

"Reverently repenting of my former sins, praying to the true God for pardon, and in the sincerity of my heart's esteem and confidence, I come up into the presence of all my seniors in the churches, and respectfully desire for each one of my seniors happiness and peace. A disciple at a late hour,

"Tong Yuen Cheau, Greeting."

READING NOTICES ON THE SABBATH.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Permit me to call the attention of some of your able correspondents to what, in my opinion, is a "time honored" error, existing in some of our churches, which goes very far to destroy the good effect we might naturally expect from our Sabbath meetings. I allude to the practice of reading notices of church and society meetings, donation visits, meetings to repair and furnish meeting-house, taking up collections for the necessary expenses of the church, to pay for Minutes of Conference, &c., after a sermon in which we are taught to lay all secular things aside on the Sabbath, and attend to the worship of God. The minister urges us, in his sermon, to leave our farms and workshops at home, and yet, at the close of it, by reading such notices as above, calls our attention to them, in order that we may consider how much time we can spare to attend these church and society meetings, and how much money we can spare for the use of the church. In this way the proper effect of many good sermons is almost entirely lost. I would suggest whether it would not be better to read before the sermon such notices as are necessary to be read in meeting.

A Lover of Order.

Revivals in Crawford Co., Pa.—A letter from Eld. A. A. F. Randolph, pastor of the Seventh-day Baptist Church at Hayfield, Crawford Co., Pa., dated January 12, 1851, says: "The Lord in his mercy has visited us; professors have been measurably revived and strengthened, and sinners converted. The snow and ice have been no insurmountable barrier to a willing submission to the ordinance of baptism, by an interesting company of youth, whose ages vary from eleven years to twenty-one. Nine have already been added in this way to our church, and we have good reason to expect that the number will be increased. The First-day Baptist Church in Cussewago has lately had an addition by baptism of more than twenty individuals, and the work appears to be still progressing. The Methodist society in Meadville have been putting forth an effort, and it is said that many have been converted through this instrumentality. The Freewill Baptists in our vicinity have also been holding a series of meetings, which have resulted in their baptizing a few converts."

Revivals in New Jersey.—Several churches in New Jersey are enjoying seasons of revival. The Christian Chronicle says that at Canton, "some twenty-five, within a few days, indulge a hope in Christ of the pardon of their sins, and the conversion of their souls. About half that number have already been baptized on a profession of their faith. The good work is going on powerfully in the churches at Cohansey and Greenwich." From Bethel, N. J., Rev. J. Teasdale writes to the New York Recorder, that he has been attending a series of meetings there for some four weeks, and that at least one hundred have professed hope, and more than that number are inquiring the way to Zion.

An Excellent Toast.—On the occasion of a centennial anniversary of the settlement of the town of New Ipswich, N. H., an invitation was sent by the committee of arrangements to Samuel Appleton, Esq., of Boston, to be present on the occasion. Being unable to attend, he sent a letter, of which the following is an extract:—

"As a sentiment, on the present occasion, I send you the following, which I hope will meet with the approbation of all present:—

'The Literary Institutions of New Hampshire in general, and the Academy at New Ipswich in particular—and to enable that Institution to assume its former standing, and to extend its future usefulness—I, Samuel Appleton, of Boston, do hereby promise to pay to the Trustees of New Ipswich Academy, for the benefit of said Academy, five thousand dollars on demand.'

I am, gentlemen, very respectfully, your obedient, most humble servant,

Samuel Appleton."

New York Free Schools.—The people of the State of New York have once and again voted upon the Free School Question, and sustained the principle of Free Schools by respectable majorities. Still the subject is agitated. Large numbers of petitions have been sent in to the Legislature, during the present month, for a repeal of the Free School Law, the suspension of the School Journal, the abolition of the offices of State and County Superintendent, &c. It is thought, by persons well qualified to judge, that there is great danger of the repeal of the Free School Law.

A South Carolina Law.—Hon. Geo. B. Mathews, late Governor of the Bahamas, now British Consul for North and South Carolina, has officially called the attention of Gov. Means, of South Carolina, to a law of that State, which is directly in the teeth of the existing treaty stipulations, and which he trusts will be repealed forthwith. This law forbids any free negro to come within the borders of the State, under a penalty of expatriation, and ultimately of sale as a slave if he persists in staying or returning, and further provides that any colored person arriving there as a seaman, cook, or steward of a vessel, shall be forthwith sent to jail, and there confined until the vessel is ready to sail and hauled out into the stream, when he shall be reclaimed by his captain, who shall be required to pay all the expenses of his arrest and detention!

Revival at Canton, Ill.—Rev. S. G. Miner, pastor of a church at Canton, Ill., furnishes for the Watchman of the Prairies an account of a revival in that place in connection with the labors of Eld. Knapp. A series of meetings was commenced October 24th, and continued until the 8th of December, concerning which Mr. Miner says:—

"The results thus far have been most glorious. Brother Knapp and myself have baptized into the fellowship of the Baptist church 211. Of this number 80 were heads of families; 50 young men, and 81 young ladies. Some of these persons were Universalists and skeptics, and many of them ringleaders in vice and vain amusements. They have now changed the ball-room and the places of sin for the prayer-meeting, and a happier band of converts I have never seen."

The American Chapel at Rome.—The Independent publishes a note from Rev. Dr. Bacon, one of its editors, dated at Rome, Dec. 24th, in which he says:—

"The American chapel here is becoming quite an affair. The strictly ecclesiastical influence here—the influence concentrated in the Propaganda—has lately made an attack upon it, and has insisted that the permission to have such a chapel shall be withdrawn. But partly through the personal good nature of Pius Ninth, and partly through the liberality and political wisdom of Cardinal Antonelli, his Secretary of State, the action was defeated. The ordinary congregation there is less than a hundred, including English and Scotch, as well as Americans; but the American chapel at Rome is a fact (which is a great affair in this country, where new facts are scarce) and it is likely to become a fixed fact. Let God be thanked. The Christianity of the apostles is almost as free here now as it was when Paul was kept a prisoner two years, in his own hired house, waiting for a hearing before Nero."

Day of Fasting and Prayer for the African Race.—At an adjourned meeting of the Colored Clergymen of the City of New York, held in Bethel Church, Jan. 20, 1851, it was

Resolved, That we recommend the first Friday in March next to be observed by our respective charges as a day of solemn prayer and fasting, beseeching Almighty God to interpose graciously by His power in our behalf, and deliver us from our deep distress; that, as primary objects of prayer, we pray for the immediate Abolition of Slavery, with all its accompanying wickedness, in these United States; and, secondly, that Protestantism may give evidences to the world, and particularly to us as a portion of the Protestant Church of this country, that it still possesses all those vital principles of godliness that actuated the first Dissenters, and is not a mere sounding brass or tinkling symbol; that the spirit of a Luther, a Latimer, a Ridley, a Wicliff, a Wesley, a Roger Williams, still exists among us; and, thirdly, that there may be a more rapid increase of educational interest among us.

N. Y. State Agricultural Society.—This Society held its Annual Meeting at Albany week before last. The Report of the Executive Committee sets forth that under the competition excited by the Society, farms have been much improved and commendable advancement made in Dairy products, in Stock, and in Agricultural Implements. Washington and Seneca Counties have been thoroughly examined. The Committee have appropriated $400 to be awarded to such as might successfully compete at the World's Fair. The report advocates an Agricultural School. The Committee reported against holding two Annual Fairs.

The Treasurer's Annual Report was read. The receipts have been $15,116 71; expenditures $12,903 84; add value of plate on hand for premiums to be awarded, $230, leaving a balance of $2,643 07.

Rochester was agreed upon as the place of the next State Fair.

Limitation of Obedience to Civil Law.—At a recent meeting of the Buffalo Presbytery (New School,) as we learn from a Buffalo paper, the following resolutions were passed unanimously:—

1st. That some of the provisions of the Fugitive Slave Law are obviously in conflict with the law of God.

2d. That it is the duty of every man to obey the laws of his country up to the point where they conflict with the law of God, AND NO FURTHER.

New Music.—We are indebted to Firth, Pond & Co., of No. 1 Franklin Square, for three very pretty pieces of music.

The first, composed by John Blockley, author of "Love Not" and "Hearts and Homes," is called "The Spirit Child, or The Guardian Angel."

"My child, my angel child,
My beautiful, my own,
'Tis said that such fair forms as thine,
Meet round an angel throne."

The second, "composed and tenderly inscribed to bereaved sisters, by J. B. Woodbury," is called "Take me Home to Die, or The Last Request."

"You must not weep for me, mother,
For I shall happy be;
And though I cannot stay with you,
Yet you shall come to me."

The third is called "The Harvest Queen," composed by L. Lavenu, author of "On the Banks of Guadalquiver."

"From sunny fields I joyous come."

Fleeing from Slavery.—The Indiana Congregational Friends, at a Semi-Annual meeting held at Greenboro, on the 28th and 29th days of December, adopted the following stringent resolutions:—

Resolved, That it is the right and duty of the slaves of the South to escape from Slavery. And in order to accomplish this end, and to secure to themselves and their posterity the blessings of Liberty, it is their right and duty to use all such means as it is the right and duty of white men to use to accomplish similar ends.

Resolved, That we, the people of the North, one and all, owe it as a sacred duty to God, to ourselves and mankind, to incite and assist the slaves of the South to escape from Slavery—and to use all means to accomplish this end which we would use, or wish others to use, to rescue us or our children from Slavery.

Resolved, That we will do what we can to instigate the slaves of the South to escape from Slavery. And when they come among us we pledge to them that we will protect them by all such means as in our view God and nature have furnished us, against all efforts to enslave them, by whomsoever made.

Resolved, That protection to fugitive slaves is one of the most sacred duties enjoined on us by God and humanity. And we hereby pledge ourselves to the slaves and to the world, to perform this duty, regardless of all decisions of courts, of all threats of prosecution for treason, of all enactments of Congress, of all Constitutional Compromises, of all threats of dissolution of the Union, of all pretended precept of the Bible or alledged commands of God.

Resolved, That slaveholders never did have, and never can have, any rightful authority over their slaves. That the slaves owe no obedience to their masters. And that it is our duty to instigate all slaves and all men to spurn the authority and cast off the dominion of all individuals and governments that assume the right to enslave them.

Arrest of an Alledged Slave.—A Philadelphia letter-writer, gives a lengthy report of the examination of another alledged Fugitive Slave, before Mr. Commissioner Ingraham of Philadelphia. He is a colored man named Stephen Bennett, and is charged with being the personal chattel of Edward B. Gallup of Baltimore. He was arrested in Columbia, Pa., Jan. 23, by officer Conner, of Lancaster, (while sawing wood in the street,) upon a warrant issued on the 22d by the U. S. Marshal of the District. He is an able-bodied man, about 35 years of age. It was the prevailing opinion in Philadelphia, that Bennett would be sent into bondage.

Since the above was in type, we learn that the friends of Stephen Bennett, have paid $700 to Mr. Gallup, the claimant, in consideration of his manumitting him. This was formally done in the United States Marshal's office, and Stephen was set at liberty. The greater part of the purchase money was collected in Columbia.

Another Case.—The Cincinnati Nonpareil of the 21st inst. has the following:—

Last night, about 10 o'clock, a gentleman of New Orleans, named J. D. Arcy, (not Count D'Orsey,) laid claim to a respectable female of this city, who had resided for a considerable length of time near the Post-Office. The lady is of fair complexion, and was never suspected of being impregnated with negro blood. The Southern gentleman, however, claimed her as his slave, and made good his claim before a large meeting of citizens, and although we are grieved to lose so orderly, beautiful and valuable a citizen, the Fugitive Slave Law is all-powerful, and our citizens will be compelled, though reluctantly, to consent that this lovely female shall be borne away to a land of slavery. She is valued at $3,000.

Henry Long sold at Auction.—On the 18th inst., Henry Long, the reclaimed fugitive, was sold at auction, by Messrs. Pulliam & Slade, of Richmond, Va. A gentleman from the South bought him for the sum of $750. The purchaser was the only bidder, and was required to give bond and security in the amount of $3,000 as an assurance that he would remove Henry to the South, in compliance with the terms of sale. There was quite a concourse of persons in attendance at the auction room.

Central America.—An American, recently writing from Punta de Arenas, a port in Costa Rica, says:—

"The country we are now in is very pretty, but the inhabitants are the most villainous-looking set I ever laid eyes on, and were it not that I once in a while see an American or an Englishman, I would think I was in a land of heathens. As their food and clothing cost but a trifle, they are naturally an indolent people, lounging about, smoking cigars, and chatting with each other, from morning to night."

The Sabbath-School Visitor.—We send out, this week, the second number of the Sabbath-School Visitor. The churches from which returns have been received take hold of the matter with commendable zeal. It is hoped that every church will do something.

Proceedings in Congress Last Week.

SECOND-DAY, Jan. 20.

In the SENATE, after the presentation of several reports, Mr. Clay submitted a resolution instructing the Committee on Commerce to inquire into the expediency of adopting more effectual means to prevent American vessels and seamen from engaging in the African slave trade. The correspondence with the American Minister at Brazil in regard to the slave trade was referred to the Committee on Commerce The House Postage Bill was received and referred to the Post Office Committee. The French Spoliation bill was taken up, and Mr. Hunter made a speech against it.

The HOUSE refused to make five of the General Appropriation bills the special order until disposed of; also to suspend the rules to introduce a bill giving land to the landless. The bill to secure the prompt execution of the Bounty Land Law of the last session was taken up and discussed till the adjournment.

THIRD-DAY, Jan. 21.

In the SENATE, several petitions were presented and referred. A resolution was adopted, directing inquiry into the propriety of a reörganization of the State Department. The Rules were slightly amended; after which the French Spoliation bill was taken up, and Gov. Seward spoke at length in favor of paying our citizens for the property wrongfully taken from them by France, more than half a century ago, their claims for which were assumed but never paid by our Government.

The HOUSE spent a long time to no purpose in discussing the order of business. Several Senate Bills were referred. A resolution, passed by the Senate on the last Jay of the last Session, preventing the assignment of Land Patents under the Bounty Law of September, until after location, was laid on the table. A debate took place on the Senate Bill authorizing the selection of Lands given for school purposes, in place of those already granted, and which are worthless. Without disposing of the subject, the House adjourned.

FOURTH-DAY, Jan. 22.

In the SENATE, Mr. Seward presented two petitions for the repeal of the Fugitive Slave Law. Mr. Clay's resolution, directing inquiry into more effectual measures to suppress the African Slave Trade by preventing American vessels and seamen engaging in the trade, and to refuse sea-letters to American vessels trading from Brazilian ports to the Western coast of Africa, was taken up, remarks were made by Messrs. Clay, Hale, and Foote, and the resolution was agreed to. In the course of his remarks, Mr. Hale read from one of the papers the following pledge, which he understood was being signed by many members of Congress:—

"The undersigned members of the Thirty-first Congress of the United States, believing that a renewal of sectional controversy upon the subject of Slavery, would be both dangerous to the Union and destructive of its objects, and seeing no mode by which such controversy can be avoided except by strict adherence to the settlement thereof, effected by the Compromise acts passed at the last session of Congress, do hereby declare their intention to maintain said settlement inviolate, and to resist all attempts to repeal or alter the acts aforesaid, unless by general consent of the friends of the measure; and to remedy such evils, if any, as time and experience may develop; and, for the purpose of making this resolution effective, they further declare, that they will not support for the office of President, or Vice President, or of Senator or Representative in Congress, or as member of the State Legislature, any man, of whatever party, who is not known to be opposed to the disturbance of the settlement aforesaid, and to the renewal in any form of agitation upon the subject of Slavery.

The French Spoliation Bill was taken up in Committee of the Whole, amended, and reported to the Senate.

The HOUSE considered the Deficiency Bill in Committee, and ordered that the debate on the bill cease at 3 o'clock to-morrow.

FIFTH-DAY, Jan. 23.

In the SENATE, a large number of petitions were presented, and several adverse reports were made on private bills. A resolution was adopted, directing an inquiry into the expediency of suspending the Public Auction sale of Public Lands, and authorizing sales by private entry of all new lands prepared for market. The French Spoliations Bill was passed to its third reading.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Johnson of Tenn., from the Committee on Agriculture, reported a bill to encourage agriculture, commerce and manufacturers, by giving to every head of a family one hundred and sixty acres of land, provided they cultivate the same for a certain period. Messrs. Hilliard of Ala., Brown of Miss., and Green of Mo., spoke in favor of the general principle, but differed respecting the details. The subject occupied the morning hour, and then went over. The Deficiency Bill was talked about, and the debate on it closed.

SIXTH-DAY, Jan. 24.

In the SENATE, Mr. Seward presented a petition from the Quarterly Conference of the Wesleyan Methodists of New York, for the repeal of the Fugitive Slave Law. The French Spoliation Bill was ordered to be engrossed, taken up, read a third time, and passed. A Bill to grant public lands to aid in the construction of a railroad in Mississippi and Louisiana, was ordered to be engrossed. Five private bills were passed.

The HOUSE spent the day on private bills, of which it passed forty.

SABBATH-DAY, Jan. 25.

In the SENATE, a resolution conferring on General Scott the rank of Lieutenant-General, was reported. Mr. Yulee made a speech on the bill equalizing the grants of lands made to the several States in aid of internal improvements. The bill grants to Ohio, Illinois, Missouri, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Michigan, Arkansas, Florida, Iowa and Wisconsin, the aggregate amount of nineteen million and seventy-four thousand acres. The bill paying Oregon for the expenses of the Cayuse war was engrossed, also a bill creating new collection districts in the same territory. Mr. Underwood made a speech against the bill explanatory of the law granting pensions to widows of revolutionary soldiers.

In the HOUSE, a bill for the relief of Charlotte Lynch, mother of Miss Ann S. Lynch the poetess, was passed. It seems that Mrs. Lynch is the only surviving child of Col. Ebenezer Gray, of the sixth regiment of the Connecticut line, who served in the army of the Revolution. The bill provides five years' full pay, as an equivalent for the losses sustained by him by the substitution of the commutation certificates, issued in 1783, for half pay for life, to which he was entitled under the resolution of Congress of 1785.

Mexican Items.

By a recent arrival, the N. Y. Tribune has received Mexican advices to Dec. 28th, from which we clip the following:—

In Oajaca, the rebel Melendez, taking advantage of the panic created by the cholera, made an attack on Tehuantepec, on the 1st of December. The troops and populace of the place combined and compelled him to retreat. In his flight he burned several villages, and at last took refuge in the thick forests of Juchitan. At the latest dates he still lay hid. The force at Tehuantepec had been increased to 280 men, and was ready for another attack.

It appears that there died of cholera in Vera Cruz 989 persons; in Jalapa, 2,287; in Coatepec, 790; in Misanta, 457; in Orizaba, 2,811; in Cordova, 512; in Tuxtlas, 500; in Cosomaloapan, 300. Total, 8,646. All these places are in the State of Vera Cruz.

We have not, says a letter writer, had a bull-fight in Mexico for nearly twelvemonth; and I began to think that pastime had been abandoned. Yesterday, however, (Sunday, 15th) the Plaza was reöpened in great splendor, and over 6,000 persons were present. The amount of money taken at the door could not have been much less than $5,000.

A correspondent of the Picayune, writing from Vera Cruz, gives the following particulars:—

Thomas W. Allen and Frank West, two returned Californians, had a rencounter in this city, not long since, and both were killed. West died immediately; Allen lingered some time. Mr. Allen was a Georgian by birth, and appears to have been in good circumstances, as the American Consul was directed to supply him with funds to the amount of $10,000. But the Consul was not here at the time, and Allen died without means.

A Californian, on his way to the United States, died here a short time ago, leaving about two thousand dollars in gold dust in the hands of the American Consul. He belonged to Loudonsville, Ohio. Frederick Werneck, another American citizen, who died here on the 5th December, has left about fifteen hundred dollars, which is also in the hands of the American Consul.

A short time ago they had extraordinary cold weather at Vera Cruz, during which the thermometer fell to 60°. Such a thing had not been known since 1831.

Fifteen Days Later from California.

The steamships Cherokee and Prometheus, from Chagres, arrived at New York on the 21st inst., bringing intelligence from California to Dec. 15, $1,500,000 in gold dust, and a large number of passengers. The Prometheus took most of her passengers at San Juan de Nicaragua.

The cholera had very much abated at San Francisco and Sacramento City, although a long list of deaths from that disease is reported.

There was a large fire in San Francisco on the 14th of December—the sixth visitation of the kind which that city has experienced. The immense shipments of goods which have arrived at San Francisco from the Atlantic States had produced a complete stagnation of the market, bringing many kinds of merchandize below cost prices. Notwithstanding this drawback, San Francisco appears to have lost none of its marvelous energy. The grading and planking of streets, building of piers and wharves and other improvements were going on briskly, and the city was in a comfortable state for the rainy season, which had not fairly set in.

The miners, generally, had taken to the dry diggings, and were waiting patiently for the rain. Important acquisitions have been made to the mineral wealth of California by the discovery of a silver mine near Monterey, and a rich lead mine about twelve miles from Johnson's ranche, in the Sacramento Valley.

Many citizens of San Francisco had been engaged lately in purchasing bank notes at a heavy discount, and quite a number had ascertained their purchases to be valueless—counterfeit notes. Large amounts of counterfeit Missouri State Bank currency are afloat, and it is said some bankers have been deceived in their appearance. One gentleman has been taken in by these false issues to the amount of $10,000.

Seven Days Later from Europe.

By the U. S. Mail Steamer Arctic, Liverpool dates to Jan. 11, seven days later, have been received.

The English general news possesses no feature of special interest.

Property to the amount of £30,000 was destroyed by fire in Dublin on the 4th.

Great excitement had prevailed at Paris during the week in consequence of the resignation en masse of the Ministry. This was caused by the open hostility of the President toward Gen. Changarnier, who, in defiance of the earnest protestation of the Ministry, was given permission on the instant, and by a decided majority, to justify his conduct before the Assembly.

The accounts from Rome and the activity of Mazzini and other Italian Refugees, gives no reason to doubt but any serious difficulty at Paris would be instantly seized upon to unfurl the Republican banner in the Holy City, where the French soldiers have become so obnoxious that they are indiscriminately assassinated by the citizens on every public occasion.

A vigorous effort is now making in England for the abolition of the tax on paper.

A ROW IN CHURCH AT CHILLICOTHE.—On Sunday last, says the Cleveland Herald, the members of the German Evangelical Church got by the ears, and indulged in a general melee. A man named Zimmerman was badly hurt, and Mrs. Hasse, the wife of Rev. Dr. Hasse, was maltreated. The Scioto Gazette says that the walls and seats of the church gave unmistakable evidence of a violent and bloody row, and adds, "We are sure there is not an individual implicated in the difficulty, who does not feel, and would not readily avow, that the riot occurred from an indulgence in anti Christian resentments and courses of action. Undoubtedly there were many active participants (on the Christian Sabbath, in a house consecrated to the service of the Prince of Peace,) in the deplorable fight, who would readily surrender the last cent of their substance if thereby might be effaced both from the remembrance of God and man, every recollection of their unhallowed proceedings."

DAMAGES AGAINST A RAILROAD CORPORATION.—Thomas L. Chase and wife, of Boston, recovered a verdict of $1,000 in the Court of Common Pleas, at East Cambridge, against the Nashua and Lowell Railroad Corporation, for an injury done Mrs. Chase in 1848. It appeared that Mrs. Chase was riding along the highway at the Railroad crossing, Chelmsford, near Lowell, when the cars came along suddenly. The gates were not closed across the highway. The driver succeeded in preventing the horse from being run over by the engine, but the horse having approached very near the crossing before the cars were seen, became unmanageable, and rushed out of the highway down one of the tracks, while the train passed down the other, throwing Mrs. Chase out of the wagon down an embankment, and severely injuring her.

NEW JERSEY.—Geo. F. Fort, the new Governor of New Jersey, was inaugurated at Trenton, on the 2d inst., and delivered his inaugural address, in which he advocates Free Schools, Equalization of Taxes, the Abolition of Monopolies by the passage of General Laws in regard to Railroads, Manufacturing, &c.; personal liability of stockholders in Banks, Homestead Exemption, limiting a day's work to ten hours, retrenchment of public expenditures, election of Judges by the People, &c., &c. The Governor thinks the Compromise Measures are about right, including the Fugitive Slave Law—that the present Tariff is better than any which has preceded, though there should be a modification in regard to the duties on Iron—that speculation in the Public Lands should be prohibited, &c. [Tribune.

A VENERABLE PARTY.—A gathering of the "oldest inhabitants" of Southwark occurred on Thursday afternoon last, says the Philadelphia Ledger, at the residence of Mrs. Hartman in Second-st., at the celebration of the 101st anniversary of the birthday of her grandfather, the venerable Geo. Swarts. Mr. S. came to this country in the year 1772, being then 22 years of age. The party assembled numbered seventeen, whose ages were as follows: 101, 90, 90, 87, 81, 79, 76, 75, 72, 72, 70, 67, 66, 58, 52, 50, making a total of 1,216 years, and giving an average of 71½ years to each. After spending an agreeable afternoon, chatting over the days of "auld lang syne," the party sat down to a bountiful supper, and early in the evening were taken to their several homes.

SUMMARY.

A true bill has been found by a Grand Jury in Philadelphia, against James C. Mitchell, as also against Messrs. Price and Alberti, for kidnapping a free negro boy, Joel Thompson. This boy was the son of a woman, the slave of Mr. Mitchell, who ran away some years ago, and was arrested together with the boy, during the last summer, and brought to Elkton and delivered to Mr. M., who did not go out of the State to take part in the arrest.

The latest dates from Kingston are to Jan. 11. The Cholera was still raging in the different parishes of Jamaica. In Trelawny, 1,900 deaths had occurred, and the number would probably reach 2,000. In Montego Bay, there had been 870 deaths; in St. James, 994; Portland 40; Lucia, 114. The reports from St. Amis were favorable, and the disease was decreasing. The accounts from St. Thomas in the East were also more favorable.

The Secretary of State of the United States, accepts the tender of the authorities of Southampton, offering the use of that port (with free transportation of the goods to Vauxhall, within one mile of the building of the exhibition,) for conveying goods to the World's Fair. The Secretary informs Mr. Crosby, the Consul at Southampton, that orders will accordingly be issued to the Commander of the St. Lawrence.

Speaking of the robbery of the Otsego County Bank, the Binghamton Republican says: We hear that two men, Dr. Clark and the "Horse Tamer," alias something else, were arrested at Syracuse for committing the above robbery. The utensils with which they broke open the Bank, and part of the money, were found in their possession. We also hear that William Grace has been arrested on suspicion of being an accomplice.

The conflagration that occurred at New Orleans on the 8th inst., is the heaviest calamity that has befallen that city for years. The destruction of the St. Charles Hotel, which was the pride of the South, will be severely felt. In addition to the St. Charles, Clapp's Church, the Methodist Church in Poydras-st., and other buildings, were destroyed, making the loss not less than half a million of dollars.

A Mr. Rose recently arrived at Pittsburg from Wellsburg, who had recognized a mulatto boy, an apprentice for the last two years to Mr. J. B. Vashon, as his slave and claimed him. Rather than consign the child to bondage, Mr. V. with a fidelity to his principles which does him honor, by means of his own and the contributions of others, paid the owner $200, and the boy is now FREE.

Rev. J. M. Peck states that the oldest church of any denomination in Illinois, is the Baptist church at Silver Creek, St. Clair Co.; and the one next in age is the one at Bethel, Madison Co. The former of these churches has been of late much revived.

Letters from Tehauntepec to the 1st of December, state that the cholera was very violent at that place. The General-in-Chief and the Major-General of the Oaxaca fell ill, and being bled by the physician who attended them, both died. Two hundred men, from the battalion Guerrero had deserted, carrying with them the greatest part of the arms and ammunition.

A Locomotive Engine is being built at a shop near New York, which is to be something of a novelty. Nothing but Alcohol is to be used for heating the boiler. It is constructed upon a principle heretofore untried, but it is expected to be entirely successful in its operation. It is built for the Erie Railroad, and it will be tested on that road.

Judson Hutchinson has so far recovered from his recent aberration of mind as to be able to join with John and Asa for the purpose of giving a series of Concerts. The trio sang in Boston recently. The story that two of the family had become insane is not true. Sister Abby, the universal favorite, is no longer with her brothers, she having retired to private life, and become a resident of Yew York.

The Amsterdam Intelligencer states that the bridge built the last season, and recently finished, across the Mohawk, at Tribes Hill, on the Remington Plan, went down last week, being unable to sustain its weight from its immense length. We understand the cost of the company, so far, in erecting this and another bridge that fell down last year, is about $12,000.

It is said in the Messagiere of Modena, that the naked statues in the churches at Rome are to be dressed from motives of modesty. Canova's Genius of Death in the Monument to Pope Clement is to be thus adorned, and the many little cherubs which abound in various churches are no longer to be left in a state of improper exposure. The immodest pictures are also to be improved.

The census of the state of North Carolina has been fully ascertained, with the exception of the County of Mecklenburg; and assuming the number in that County to be 14,000, the total population of the State is 870,687, of which 288,500 are slaves. The increase in the entire population since 1840 is 117,268, of which increase about 43,000 is of the slave population.

A company has been formed to convey persons from Madrid to Paris and London, during the universal exhibition of Industry. The time allowed is to be one month, and the ticket will include all expenses, visiting theatres and places of amusement in Paris and London, as well as the Exhibition.

The amount of drafts made upon the Controller of New York by the Board of Education, since Jan. 1, 1850, shows a total of $374,442 99. To meet this expenditure, a sum of $315,000 was originally appropriated—requiring an additional appropriation in November last of $60,000.

At Buffalo, one evening last week, two men went into a jewelry store in Genesee-st., kept by a German, and snatched up several watches, with which they attempted to make their escape. The owner of the store immediately went in pursuit of the rascals, when they fired upon him, the ball entering his head, and wounding him fatally.

At Hobart Town, Van Deiman's Land, in August last, a public meeting, called by the Bishop of Tarmania, was held, for the purpose of facilitate the project of Sydney Herbert, for the emigration of young women who cannot obtain adequate employment in the crowded population of Great Britain.

News was received at New Orleans, on the 20th inst., that the steamboat Brilliant, when off Bayou Sara, in the Mississippi river, collapsed her flues, with a terrible explosion. Three persons lost their lives, and others were injured.

The Empire State, according to the census returns of 1850, now nearly complete, contained a population, on the 1st of June last, of nearly if not quite 3,100,000—an increase of about 650,000, or over 25 per cent. during the last ten years.

There is a proposition before the City Council of Richmond, Va., to lay heavy taxes on those who are engaged in the sale of negroes. The present income from the business of buying and selling slaves is estimated at $10,000 per year.

Bishop Hopkins, of Vermont, has been lecturing at Buffalo, on the slavery question. His plan is to devote the income from the public lands to the shipment of the surplus negroes to Africa.

The Tennessee mail, from Hopkinsville, Ky. to Clarksville, was opened on Wednesday night, the eighth instant, and $802 in bank bills, belonging to J. P. & W. A. Glass, merchants in Hopkinsville, extracted.

The contractors on the Atlantic and St. Lawrence Railway, prohibit the use of intoxicating drinks on the line of the works in progress in Canada, and think much good has already resulted from it.

The Chief of the Montreal Police recently seized 798 loaves of bread of light weight, and distributed the same among the charities of the city, according to the law in such cases.

Dr. F. J. Bradt, Dentist, of Utica, was killed by the accidental discharge of his gun, while hunting near Broadalbin, Fulton Co., on Friday, Jan. 17. He left a wife.

Rev. Walter Colton, Chaplain in the United States Navy, died at his residence in Philadelphia, recently. Mr. Colton occupied quite a high position as a man of letters.

Counterfeit gold dollars are circulating. The little deceivers can be detected, however, if examined closely, as they neither feel nor look like the genuine.

Dennis Maher, tried at the present term of the Albany County Court for the seduction of a young woman, was sentenced to two years' imprisonment in the Auburn State Prison.

The Oregon papers are discussing the subject of Postage Reform, and generally denounce the present rate of forty cents per letter as exorbitantly high.

Hon. Samuel Ward King, ex-Governor of Rhode-Island, died on Tuesday of last week, at his residence in Providence.

The Hudson Democratic Freeman, of Jan. 14, says that there is no foundation whatever for the article that is going the rounds of the press in relation to the suit commenced to test the title of George Clark to the Oriskany Patent. The suit has not been discontinued, nor will it be until the decision of the Court in the People vs. Clark relating to the Patent in Montgomery Co.

Dr. Jeremiah Dunn, Mayor of Princeton, N. J., as we learn from the Jersey City Telegraph, on his return from Trenton, Wednesday evening, January 22, was thrown from his sulky about 6 miles from Princeton and killed. He was found about 8 o'clock, in such a position as to lead to the belief that his horse took fright and threw him out violently on his head.

A Company has been organized under the General Railroad Law to build a railroad from Schenectady to Utica, on the South side of the Mohawk. Azariah C. Flagg is at the head of the Company, and is associated with several capitalists of New York, Troy, the Mohawk Valley. Title of the Company, "Mohawk Valley Railroad Company." Capital, $2,000,000.

The first meeting of the Pennsylvania State Agricultural Society was held in Harrisburg last week, and adjourned after the members had signed a Constitution, handed in subscriptions, and drafted a memorial to the Legislature for a charter and legislative aid. The body declined sending delegates to the World's Fair.

At a Ball, in Fultonville, Montgomery Co., N. Y., Jan. 22d, a drunken row occurred, in which a man named Ferguson stabbed another, named Ireland, cutting out his eye, and brutally lascerating him. The man Ireland was thought to be dying at last accounts. Ferguson has been arrested.

Among the countless wonders which are to be exhibited at the World's Fair, there is one article of luxury that will be a curiosity in its way. It is a musical bed, which, the moment it is pressed, begins to play soft and soothing airs, that "lap" the sleeper "in Elysium."

A warrant for the arrest of Gov. Quitman, of Mississippi, for participation in the Cuban Expedition, has been issued by Judge Gholson in New Orleans. It was to be executed on the arrival of the U. S. Marshal, Mr. Davis. An application for a writ of habeas corpus, was contemplated, which it is believed will be refused.

Mrs. C. M. Kirkland writes from England for Sartain's Magazine, concerning Queen Victoria, "that she is well understood to be a person of very limited intellect, not wholly sane at present, and liable to complete aberration as she grows older."

The brig Desdemona, belonging to Abernethy, Clark & Co., made the quickest trip but one ever made from New York to Astoria. She left New York the 16th day of May, and arrived at Astoria the 20th day of October.

Christian Psalmody—Pocket Edition.

IN compliance with requests from various quarters, the publisher of the New Hymn Book—Christian Psalmody—has issued a second edition, on lighter paper and with smaller margins, by which the bulk and weight of the books are reduced about one-third, rendering them much more convenient for carrying in the pocket. The price is also reduced 12½ cents per copy. Those wishing books, of either edition, can now be supplied. Price of the larger edition from 75 cents to $1 50, according to the style of binding. Price of the smaller edition from 62½ cents to $1 00. Orders should be addressed to Geo. B. Utter, No. 9 Spruce-st., New York.

Methodist Quarterly Review.

THIS Review contains 160 pages Octavo, printed on fine paper. At the subscription price of TWO DOLLARS a year, in advance, it is the cheapest Quarterly Journal now issued. The publishers issue it at this low price, in expectation of greatly enlarging its list of subscribers, which, though by no means what it ought to be, is yet, as it is believed, twice as large as that of any similar Journal.

While the theology of the Methodist Episcopal Church is the standard for the Review, its tone is large and liberal, and its range of topics, not only in Biblical but General Literature, is extensive, as its Table of Contents will show. Its contributors are among the ablest writers in this country, of various religious denominations.

In the Department of Literary Intelligence, this Journal is so unusually full and rich as to be almost indispensable to every theologian and literary man.

From its wide circulation, the Quarterly affords a most desirable medium of Literary Advertising. All advertisements, and books for notice, should be sent to the Editor, Rev. J. M'Clintock, D. D., 200 Mulberry-st.

The Publishers subjoin a few notices from the Press during the last year:—

As an organ of one of the most efficient branches of the Christian Church in this country, it deserves to be read by all who would preserve a thorough acquaintance with all our current national literature. [Bost. Rec.

It is altogether the most agreeable of American Quarterlies. While it is called a "Methodist" Magazine, Methodism is not the one exclusive topic. The whole field of religion, literature, and science is traversed, and a truly catholic spirit animates every article. [Philadelphia Bulletin.

Its Literary Intelligence is not surpassed in copiousness by any other Quarterly. [Independent.

A high, scholar-like, and liberal spirit pervades the work. The Review is an honor to the denomination of which it is the organ. [Louisville Examiner.

Its character as a repository of literary information is unsurpassed. [N. Y. Recorder.

The work shows the traits of learned and accomplished editorship, and is an ornament to our national journalism. [N. Y. Evangelist.

We are glad to find that the editor has made arrangements to secure a regular German correspondence, which, with the resources in his own hands, will enable him to present a record of literary movements abroad, unsurpassed by any of our periodicals. [N. Y. Tribune.

The editor's cultivated taste, comprehensive learning, and literary vigilance, admirably qualify him to give a record of intellectual progress in every civilized country, such as we look for in vain in any cotemporary periodical. [Harper's New Monthly Magazine.

Knickerbocker Magazine for 1851.

EDITED BY LEWIS GAYLORD CLARK.

IN one of the chapters of the Constitution of the State of Massachusetts, yet in force, there is a declaration, "That the encouragement of the Arts and the Sciences, and all good literature, tends to the honor of God, the advantage of the Christian religion, and the great benefit of this and the other United States of America." It has ever been the highest purpose of the Knickerbocker to elevate the standard of American Literature. It has been the medium of introducing many of our most popular authors to the public. To those who take a pride in sustaining a good American Magazine, entirely national in its character, we look for support. Men of judgment need not be told that it is impossible to get up a Magazine entirely original at the same prices at which those made up from foreign sources are sold. The unremitted efforts of the Editor and Publisher will be continued to improve the work.

SPLENDID PREMIUM TO OLD AND NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

The Publisher, grateful for the large increase of patronage which this old favorite of the reading community has received, since it passed into his hands, has determined to offer to the old patrons, and to all new subscribers, a splendid engraving recently published in this city, by Messrs. Goupil, Vibert & Co., from a painting by a well-known American artist, William S. Mount, Esq. This Print is entitled,

"MUSIC IS CONTAGIOUS."

It is 19 by 24 inches, is printed on beautiful paper, and when framed will make a valuable and elegant ornament for the drawing-room or parlor. The price of the Engraving is three dollars. It will be given to all subscribers to the Knickerbocker Magazine who pay their subscription for 1851 in advance, or during the month of January, 1851, and to all new subscribers who commence with January, 1851, and pay in advance. To entitle subscribers to the Engraving, all payments must be made to the Publisher. Subscribers who owe for more than one year will be expected to settle all arrears and pay for 1851, to entitle them to the Engraving. The bills of specie-paying banks in all parts of the country will be received in payment. The Engraving will be rolled on a stick, and so securely done up, that it can be sent to California, or any other part of the United States, with perfect safety. The number for January, 1851, will commence the thirty-seventh volume of this work.

ST. LEDGER; OR, THE THREADS OF LIFE.

The Publisher has great pleasure in announcing to the readers of the Knickerbocker, and to the public generally, that he has effected an arrangement with Mr. RICHARD B. KIMBALL, the author of this popular and extraordinary Romance, to give the Sequel in the pages of this Magazine. The first chapter appears in the January number, and will be continued regularly until completed. This work has already passed through three editions in this country, and two in England, and has received more favorable notices from the American and English press than any work of fiction which has been issued during the last five years.

TERMS—$5 per annum, in advance. All letters on business must be addressed, post-paid, to

Miscellaneous.

O'Connell's Grave.

No monument is raised to the memory of the great Liberator over his remains at Glasnevin Cemetery, near Dublin. A gentleman who has recently visited the spot, thus describes what he saw:—

"Neither age, name, when or where he died, is to be seen. The coffin rested on tressels, over which was an iron sheet, erected to prevent the water oozing through the earth dropping on the coffin. The coffin is covered with silk velvet, originally said to be puce color, with gold ornaments and handles. At the foot of the coffin rested a handsome wreath of silver and gold flowers, with an inscription indicating it was for 'Ireland's best of patriots.' The doorway was barred with iron, and the wreath, from its position, seemed to have been thrown on the coffin through the bars. Whoever the party was who offered it at the shrine, it possessed a melancholy interest, for it was the only relic visible from a people who at one time acknowledged no other sway but O'Connell's."

The following colloquy passed between the party and guide: "Is this the spot where the national monument is to be erected?" "No; there is other ground set apart for that." "You can't tell when the monument will be erected?" "Indeed I can't." "Is it possible that his friends would not be permitted to remove the coffin?" The guide shook his head, and replied in the negative. The answer so astonished the party, that they inquired the reason, when the guide replied: "The fact is, gentlemen, there is a deal of money due on the coffin!" He was pressed to explain, when he stated, "That it was the Committee of Glasnevin burial place, that went to the expense of bringing over the coffin from Genoa. Now, until that money is paid the coffin will not be allowed away!" Having thanked the guide for his attention, who, for his class in life, was shrewd and intelligent, the party got on the car and proceeded to Merrion Square, to see the residence occupied during the life time of him whose coffin was just seen. The house looked gloomy and desolate, amidst the stir and bustle that surrounded it. Large printed bills on the windows announced: "To be Let!" It may be here stated, that the £350 which had been subscribed in Cork towards the erection of a national monument to O'Connell, has been diverted from its original purpose, and expended in the purchase of a stained glass window, which has been put up in Father Mathew's new chapel in that city.

Daring and Silly Feat of Horsemanship.

At the steward's ordinary, at the White Hart Hotel, Aylesbury, after the aristocratic steeple chases yesterday week, the conversation turning on the feat of bringing a horse up into the dining room in which the company were then assembled, which was once done by Lord Jocelyn and Mr. Ricardo, during the meeting of the Royal Hunt some few years ago, Mr. Charles Symonds, of sporting notoriety at Oxford, offered to bring a grey horse of his up stairs, and lead him around the table. No sooner was this said than done, for off he started, fetched the animal, from the stable, and very shortly announced his progress by a loud clattering on the old oak staircase. In a few minutes the horse was gazing on the assembled company. His owner then led him over a flight of chairs, which he jumped beautifully. Nothing then would satisfy the company but that he must jump the dining tables. Mr. Fowler, proprietor of the hotel, fearing lest some serious accident might occur, as the room is of great antiquity, having been built by the Earl of Rochester in the time of Charles II., made strong objections; but he was overruled, and the horse was led over the tables, every thing standing. The champaigne glasses rattled, the plates quivered, the candlesticks shook, but nothing was displaced; back again he went, clearing every thing at a bound; whereupon a most ardent sportsman, Mr. Manning of Wendover, volunteered to ride him barebacked over, and, to the astonishment of all present, he accomplished it without bridle or saddle. The celebrated gentleman jock, Captain Barlow, next essayed, and managed to make a smash of one table with its contents. This was only a temporary check, for, in the face of a tremendous fire, and the cheering of all present, he achieved the feat gallantly. It was now time to desist, and to get the horse down stairs; this was sooner said than done, for the stairs and passages being kept polished, the gallant grey slipped about dreadfully, and was evidently afraid of the descent. At length, at the suggestion of a worthy baronet, he was blindfolded, and thus descended into the entrance hall, but managed to break about a dozen of the carved oak bannisters in his progress. [Buck's Chronicle.

Heat and Cold.

We find the body capable of resisting a temperature sufficient to decompose dead matter. Animals as well as men have been exposed to a degree of heat exceeding that of boiling water, and without injury; when at the same time a thermometer placed under the tongue has indicated an elevation of a few degrees only above the natural standard. The power of resistance is of short duration; for the nervous influence is exhausted by so extraordinary a demand. Chemical agents come into play, and matter is resolved into lifeless form. As regards cold, the same law prevails, and the limits are the same. However great the power may be of resisting it, as soon as the nervous energy is exhausted, the system is subject to injury.

I have witnessed the effect of cold too long endured upon the little postillions, who are barbarously exposed to it in the winter season, at St. Petersburg. The lads bear it for a time, as they sit on their horses, clapping their hands, and singing to keep up their courage; but this fails them by degrees, and finally, benumbed, they fall from their saddles, in a state of torpor, which nothing but rolling them in the snow will overcome. There is seldom a fete given at St. Petersburg, in the extreme cold weather, that occurrences of this sort are not recorded. In very cold nights the sentries are frequently frozen to death if not relieved at short intervals. As long as nervous excitement can be kept up, the resistance of cold is very great. General Piroffsky informed me, that in the expedition to Khiva, notwithstanding the intenseness of the cold, the soldiers marched along singing, with the breasts of their coats open, but only as long as they were flushed with the hope of success.

Where there is nothing to excite, and where exposure to the cold takes place only under the common routine of parade, its depressing effects are lamentably felt by those long exposed to it. In the time of the Grand Duke Constantine, a regiment of horse was marched from Stelna to St. Petersburg, a distance of twelve miles and upward. He marched at their head at a foot pace all the way. He had well wadded himself, and smeared his face over with oil. It was the gratification of a whim to expose the soldiers to a great degree of cold. They arrived at the square before the palace, and were dismissed to their barracks. The following day one-third of the regiment was in the hospital, attacked by a nervous fever, of which many died. There was no stimulus of necessity in this case, but the moral feeling aggravated the physical suffering.

Anecdote of a Singer.

Signora Grassini, the great Italian singer, died a few months since at Milan. She was distinguished not only for her musical talents, but also for her beauty and powers of theatrical expression. One evening in 1810, she and Signor Crescentini performed together at the Tuileries, and sang in "Romeo and Juliet." At the admirable scene in the third act, the Emperor Napoleon applauded vociferously, and Talma, the great tragedian, who was among the audience, wept with emotion. After the performance was ended, the Emperor conferred the decoration of a high order on Crescentini, and sent Grassini a scrap of paper, on which was written; "Good for 20,000 livres—Napoleon."

"Twenty thousand francs!" said one of her friends—"the sum is a large one."

"It will serve as a dowry for one of my little nieces," replied Grassini quietly.

Indeed few persons were ever more generous, tender, and considerate toward their family than this great singer.

Many years afterward, when the Empire had crumbled into dust, carrying with it in its fall, among other things, the rich pension of Signora Grassini, she happened to be at Bologna. There another of her nieces was for the first time presented to her, with a request that she would do something for her young relative. The little girl was extremely pretty, but not, her friends thought, fitted for the stage, as her voice was a feeble contralto. Her aunt asked her to sing; and when the timid voice had sounded a few notes, "Dear child," said Grassini, embracing her, "you will not want me to assist you. Those who called your voice a contralto were ignorant of music. You have one of the finest sopranos in the world, and will far excel me as a singer. Take courage, and work hard, my love; your throat will give you a shower of gold." The young girl did not disappoint her aunt's prediction. She still lives, and her name is Giulia Grisi.

Bridge between France and England.

A late Paris paper, the Seicle, contains the following account of a remarkable project, which, if it should be successful, will astonish the age in which we live: "The Academy of Sciences has at present under consideration a plan of a most extraordinary character, being neither more nor less than a suspension bridge between France and England. M. Ferdinand Lemaitre proposes to establish an acrostatic bridge between Calais and Dover. For this purpose he would construct strong abuttments, to which the platform would be attached. At a distance of every hundred yards across the channel, he would sink four barges, heavily laden, to which would be fixed a double iron chain of peculiar construction. A formidable apparatus of balloons, of an elliptical form, and firmly secured, would support in the air the extremity of these chains, which would be strongly fastened to the abuttments on the shore by other chains. Each section of one hundred yards would cost about three hundred thousand francs, which would make eighty-four million francs for the whole distance across. These chains, supported in the air at stated distances, would become the points of support of this airy bridge, on which the inventor proposes to establish an atmospheric railway. This project has been developed at great length by the inventor."

American Tea.

The tea grown here, turns out far more highly and deliciously flavored than that imported, being in all respects like that drank by the wealthy in China, the grand difference between the American grown and the imported, being in the loss of flavor occasioned by the sea voyage. Latitude 34 north, in Alabama, Georgia, and North Carolina, proves better suited for the cultivation of the plant than any other region. Dr. Davis, of South Carolina, who originated the experiment, is already realizing handsomely by the sale of his young trees, which are eagerly bought up at any price by Southern agriculturists.

There are persons yet living, who can recollect when the Cotton plant was only seen in flower pots, in which it was cultivated on account of its lovely blossom; one of the prettiest flowers in the calendar of horticulture. Observing men in the South, who know the history of the cotton-raising business of this country, are generally of opinion, that tea-growing is about to become quite as important to us, in even less time than it has taken us to become the great cotton-producing country of the world. The character of soil and climate adapted to the growth of the tea plant, are not such as to make it interfere at all with the production of cotton—tea lands and cotton lands—those which produce these plants best, being as different in all their attributes as they well can be.

"Slavery among the Mormons."—We feel it to be our duty, (says the Frontier Guardian, the organ of the Mormons,) to define our position in relation to the subject of Slavery. There are several men in the Valley of the Salt Lake from the Southern States, who have their slaves with them. There is no law in Utah to authorize Slavery, neither any to prohibit it. If the slave is disposed to leave his master, no power exists there, either legal or moral, that will prevent him. But if the slave chooses to remain with his master, none are allowed to interfere between the master and the slave. All the slaves that are there appear to be perfectly contented and satisfied. When a man in the Southern States embraces our faith, and is the owner of slaves, the church says to him, If your slaves wish to remain with you, and to go with you, put them not away; but if they choose to leave you, or are not satisfied to remain with you, it is for you to sell them, or to let them go free, as your conscience may direct you. The church on this point assumes not the responsibility to direct. The laws of the land recognize Slavery; we do not wish to oppose the laws of the country. If there is sin in selling a slave, let the individual who sells him bear that sin, and not the church. Wisdom and prudence dictate to us this position, and we trust that our position will henceforth be understood.

Remarkable Intelligence and Affection of a Dog.

I passed a day and a night, last week, at a friend's house under the Palisades, opposite Spitedevil's Creek, about nine miles from the city. A fine hound-like dog came into the room where we were sitting, of whom the family related the following instance of sagacity and canine affection, which had occurred a few days before. He and another dog were in the practice of going out together to hunt squirrels on the mountain. His companion, in pursuit of some game, got his head fast between two rocks, from which he could not extricate himself—he remained in this situation eight days—during this time, his associate, Watch, fed him daily. Watch was observed to whine and to show signs of great uneasiness; he would seize upon every bone and bit of meat he could find, and hasten up the mountain, reserving for himself only the crumbs which were shaken from the table cloth. He also often went to the master of his friend, and by signs endeavored to induce him to follow him. At length the master began to notice the conduct of the dog, and one day said to him, "Watch, do you know where poor Alonzo is?" The dog, appearing to understand him, sprang upon him with so much force as almost to throw him down, and by other signs induced him to follow him. Watch, elated beyond measure, conducted him to his imprisoned companion. The poor dog was found to have suffered greatly; in addition to being nearly starved, in his efforts to extricate himself, he had worn the skin from his neck and shoulders. He was soon liberated, and with care is in a fair way of recovery. Fragments of the bones which Watch had brought him, lay around the place of his confinement. [Post.

Curious Remedy for Short-Sightedness.

The London Literary Gazette chronicles a new remedy for short-sightedness, said to have been discovered by Dr. Trumbull. It says:—We have all of us probably noticed that short-sighted people very often partially close their eyelids, in order to make distant objects more clearly perceptible. The doctor, in making this observation, began to reflect on the physiology of the case; and as the iris, in such instances, is more or less unusually dilated, it occurred to him that any medicinal agent that would act upon the iris so as to cause it to contract, would correct the defect. He also naturally enough reflected, that as the cause of short-sightedness depends on the convexity of the cornea, as well as on the convexity of the lens, the effect of contracting the iris would be to extend the axis of vision, thereby diminishing apparently the convexity of the cornea; the effect of which must be to make the rays of light pass in a direct line through an approaching plane, and thus bring distant objects within its range. The truth of this theory was established by the result. The doctor found that the tincture of pepper, made of a certain strength, and rubbed over the forehead, according to his directions, produces contraction of the iris; and after this has been applied, and the plan of treatment he prescribes persevered in, short-sighted persons have completely overcome the imperfection, and been enabled to lay permanently aside their concave glasses. The value of this discovery is greatly enhanced by its simplicity, and it certainly deserves a fair trial by the profession.

Forests.

It must be apparent to the slightest observer, that the forests of the State are rapidly diminishing, and that wood every year is scarcer and dearer. Considering the value and necessity of woodlands to future generations, a farmer connot do a better service to his posterity, and to the State, than to perpetuate the forests. To accomplish this object, the woods now standing must be carefully guarded, and cut with caution. Only the oldest trees should be selected, leaving the others to improve by standing. The high price of wood leads our farmers often to cut off all the timber of some piece of land, whose soil, rocky situation, or position on a side hill, prove that it is of no service but for wood. A little care of such tracts would lead to their perpetuity, and to their constant increase in value. All woodlands should be securely fenced, that cattle should have no access. A little care will protect the very young trees from the growth of underbrush. But there is one thing, hitherto neglected by our farmers, to which we wish to call their attention, and that is, the sowing of the various nuts that will preserve the forest to posterity. It is on this subject that the present generation have been the most careless, and have shown the least regard to the benefit of the future, because they may suppose the present will derive no advantage from it. Let, therefore, our farmers, every year, scatter acorns of different species, especially of the white oak, beach nuts, hickory nuts, of the kind most serviceable for fuel, and in places adapted to the tree, chestnuts, if they wish a supply of fencing, maple and ash keys, &c., and they will be doing as much service to their grand-children as if they laid up money for them at ten per cent. interest.

[Hartford Courant.

Ventilation.—A new method, devised by Sir John Waltham, has been tried with success in some of the Union Workhouses of England. Zinc tubes, three inches in diameter, and perforated with small holes along the sides near the bottom, are carried across the rooms at the ceiling, at distances of about ten feet, and extended on both sides to the open air, the end most exposed to the weather being shielded by a conical cap. It has had the effect of cleansing the air in the old men's rooms, and in the sick ward, without producing any inconvenience of taking cold by currents of air.

Vandyke and Rubens

"A curious anecdote is told concerning Ruben's Descent from the Cross." It was said that while Rubens was painting this masterpiece, his pupils bribed his servant to admit them to their master's painting room, one day when he had gone into the country, and was not expected to return till the evening. One of them pushed by his companions, fell against the picture, and rubbed out the Magdalen's arm, and the Virgin's cheek and chin, which Rubens had just finished. Great was the consternation, and all sought to escape; but the servant, who would naturally have to bear the responsibility of the accident, as he alone was entrusted with the key of the painting room, locked the door and declared that no one should leave till Magdalen's arm and the Virgin's cheek were restored to their pristine state. No objection could be urged to this, for it was but just; and as the pupils were prisoners they capitulated. A general vote was taken, in order that the election might fall upon the most competent of their number, and one of them was chosen, who trembling seized his master's palette and brushes, and encouraged by his fellow pupils, repaired the damage with such perfection that Rubens not only failed to discover the accident, but while casting a satisfied glance on the morrow upon his performances of the preceding day, remarked, pointing to Magdalen's arm and the Virgin's head—"That head and arm are not the worst part of my yesterday's work." The young man entitled to a share of Rubens' self-paid compliment was Vandyke.

Steam on the Pacific.—Z. W. Potter, U. S. Consul at Valparaiso, has addressed a letter to the Baltimore Patriot, calling the attention of American capitalists to the expediency of the immediate establishment of a line of steamers on the Pacific coast, with San Francisco and Valparaiso for the termini of the route—touching at the intermediate ports of Callao, (in Peru,) Guayaquil, (in Eucador,) and Panama, (in New-Grenada,) to connect with another line to ply between San Francisco, Canton, and Japan, by way of the Sandwich Islands. He is "clearly of opinion that, had our people a just conception of the impetus and fast growing importance given to the trade of the Pacific since the discovery of gold in California, we should have a line of American steamers along this coast, and across the ocean, in less than twelve months." An English steam navigation company has had the monopoly of the coast for the last ten years, but their charter having recently expired, the governments that granted it, Mr. Potter remarks, "are now unwilling to renew it, cherishing the hope that our countrymen will give it a fierce opposition, by opening the coast to free trade and a fair competition." This line of English mail steamers, running from Valparaiso to Panama, is in the receipt, from the Government of Great Britain, of $100,000 annually.

Treatment of Scarlet Fever.—Dr. Lindsey, of Washington, in a letter to the Boston Medical and Chirurgical Journal, strongly recommends the mode of treatment of scarlet fever resorted to by Dr. Shuceman, physician to the King of Hanover. It is as follows, and exceedingly simple:—

From the first day of the illness, and as soon as we are certain of its nature, the patient must be rubbed morning and evening over the whole body with a piece of bacon, in such a manner that, with the exception of the head, a covering of fat is everywhere applied. In order to make this rubbing somewhat easier, it is best to take a piece of bacon, the size of the hand, choosing a part still armed with the rind, that we may have a firm grasp. On the soft side of this piece slits are to be made in order to allow the oozing out of the fat. The rubbing must be thoroughly performed, and not too quickly, in order that the skin may be regularly saturated with the fat. The beneficial results of the application are soon obvious; with a rapidity bordering on magic, all, even the most painful symptoms of the disease, are allayed; quiet sleep, good humor, appetite returns and there remains only the impatience to quit the sick room.

A Family Voyage round the World.—There is at present lying in the Mersey, says the Liverpool Times, a ship called the Hannah, which will leave this port with the first fair wind under novel and peculiar circumstances. The Hannah is a fine frigate-looking vessel of four hundred and eighty tons, which has been purchased by a Manchester gentleman, named Gardner, who has had her fitted up in a first rate style for the accommodation of himself and family, as well as several friends. The between decks have also been made exceedingly comfortable for the reception of a posse of servants. Mr. Gardner, who is a gentleman of fortune, intends making a voyage round the world, and has made preparations for sailing from country to country, for the space of five years. The vessel, which is in first-rate order, carries everything necessary for the perfect enjoyment of Mr. Gardner's novel and lengthy voyage, and is commanded by Capt. Moodie, who has engaged a crew of picked men.

The New Capital of California.—At the late election in California, the citizens decided upon Vallego as the permanent seat of Government. The capital is a city laid out on the Bay of San Francisco, about twenty-five miles from the City of San Francisco. It is the proposition of a Spanish speculator, who consents to give to the Commonwealth 156 acres of land, divided into the necessary lots and ground for the Government buildings, University, Charitable Institutions, &c., and to expend in the erection of some twenty-five public buildings, including $125,000 for a State House, an aggregate of $370,000, to be paid over within two years. His associates in this country are said to be General Thomas J. Greene and Hon. Robert J. Walker.

Disinfecting Agent.—Rooms in which, from any cause, there arises an unpleasant odor, may be freed of the obnoxious effluvia, by placing a few kernels of coffee on a hot shovel, and allowing the aroma, or smoke, to be freely disseminated. It will dispel, effectually, the most powerful odor arising from putrid animal or vegetable matter. It has been much used, and with excellent success, in localities infected by cholera.

New Plan of Cultivating Potatoes.—The Germans have recently taken a particular fancy to raising potatoes. The following is their method of cultivation: "The potatoe is planted whole, without any preparation, only allowing a little more space than usual. When the plants have attained the hight of the hand, they are also cleaned and hoed as usual. When, however, the time for drawing up the earth around them has arrived, the following practice is adopted instead: 'The green stalks are divided and laid down by the hand on the flat soil, in the form of the spokes of a wagon wheel, and covered with the neighboring earth—the operation being readily performed by placing the foot on the plant. Some weeks later, the leaves begin to push through the soil, when they are again laid down and covered with four inches of earth. This is all the labor required, and occupies about the same time as the ordinary hoeing-up process, but it produces six times more fruit. The subterranean stalks are covered with potatoes in the form of a wreath or chaplet.'"

Chloroform.—A discovery of another property of Chloroform has just been announced by two French gentlemen, who simultaneously, and without any consultation with each other, found that chloroform is an antiseptic of marvelous virtue, preventing animal decomposition after death, or promptly checking it if already commenced. Muscular flesh and all animal tissues, when subjected to its action, become fixed for a long period of time in the precise form and condition in which they may happen to be at the precise moment of application, and natural colors, even to the slighest and most delicate shades, are preserved without the slightest change. The French Academy of science is about to make some further investigation to verify this remarkable discovery, from which so many benefits may be expected in the preservation of military and naval stores, animal food in sea voyages, and its application to a variety of other useful purposes.

A Sad Case.—We learn from the State Gazette, that an old lady, about 84 years of age, died on Saturday evening, Jan. 11, in the cars on their way from the Trenton to the South Trenton station, N.J. Her two sons were with her at the time, and did not suppose that any thing was the matter with their mother until they found her dead. She had arrived but a short time ago in the city of New York from Ireland, and her children living in South Trenton, had every thing in readiness for her reception on Saturday. A sister remained at home while the two brothers went to New York to bring her on. It is impossible to describe their sudden transition from joy to grief and affliction. The dead body was immediately removed from the cars, and conveyed to the room prepared expressly by the daughter's affection for the comfort of the aged and long absent mother.

Bellows Pump.—A tolerable substitute for a pump may be made out of a common pair of bellows on an emergency, by attaching to the valve hole a hose or tube, in an air tight manner, and using them as in blowing a fire. The end of the hose or tube must be placed in the water, which will be drawn into the bellows instead of air, and discharged through the muzzle into any vessel placed to receive it.

There are at present 125 establishments of baths in Paris, not counting those on the river. The number taken in them each year is 1,818,500, to which, if 297,800 be added for the establishments on the river, a total will be found of 2,116,300, or 2.23 baths per annum for each inhabitant. The establishments of baths are principally in the wealthier quarters of the capital; the price being on an average 12 American cents the bath. The lowest price is 8 cents, and the highest 16 cents.

Our money, said John Timon, is breeding an abundance of fine dancers, neat moustaches, and excellently dressed men; it is possibly refining such with capital judgment about a polka or an aria; but as for that sort of masculine development which makes the will earnest, and the soul big with manly intent, and with the purpose to make itself felt on the mind, and not merely on grooms or tailors, it would be troublesome to find specimens who are heirs to wealth.

Experiments have shown that a man's finger nails grow their complete length in four months and a half. A man living 50 years renews his nails 186 times. Allowing each nail to be half an inch long, he has grown seven feet and nine inches of finger, and on fingers and thumbs, an aggregate of 77 feet and six inches.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year of this Seminary, for 1850 and '51, will commence the third Wednesday in August, and continue forty-four weeks, including a short recess between the terms, and one of ten days for the winter holidays.

The year is divided into three terms:—

The first, of 14 weeks, begins Wednesday, August 21st, and ends Wednesday, November 27th.

The second, of 15 weeks, begins Monday, December 2d, and ends Friday, March 14th.

The third, of 14 weeks, begins Tuesday, March 18th and ends Tuesday, June 24th.

Board of Instruction.

GURDON EVANS, A. M., President,
And Professor of Mathematics and Natural Science.
Rev. JOSEPH W. MORTON,
Professor of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, Spanish, and Moral and Intellectual Science.
Mrs. SUSANNA M. SPICER, Preceptress.
ADOLPH ROSENHAYN,
(Late of Friedrick Wilhelm College, Berlin,)
Teacher of German, Piano Forte, and Assistant in Greek and Latin.

Other competent Teachers will be employed as occasion may demand.

TEACHERS' CLASSES will be formed, as usual, at the beginning of the Fall and middle of the Winter Terms, and continue seven weeks.

In the Common Branches, classes will be formed at the commencement of each term; but in the higher, the interest of the student, as well as the welfare of the Institution, demand that a more systematic course of study be pursued.

In the Natural Sciences, Elementary Chemistry and Philosophy will be pursued during the Fall Term Agricultural Chemistry, Astronomy, and Physiology during the Winter Term; Botany and Geology during the Summer Term.

Classes will be formed in Latin, French, and German, at the commencement of the Fall Term; in Hebrew, Greek, and Spanish, at the commencement of the Winter Term, and continue through the course of study.

In Mathematics, Geometry is studied in the Fall, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, and Astronomy, Surveying, Navigation, &c., in the Summer Term.

The course of instruction in Agriculture is thoroughly scientific, embracing study and recitation in the best authors. Instruction is given in a well-furnished laboratory, in the analysis of soils, ashes of plants, manures, &c. and the modes of testing for their constituent elements. The attention of farmers who wish to give their sons a practical education is especially called to this department.

Board in private families, from $1 25 to $1 50. Many students board in clubs for 60 to 75 cents.

Tuition—to be settled upon entering school—from $3 00 to $5 00. Extras—For Drawing, $1 00; Oil Painting, $5 00; Chemical Experiments, $1 00; Writing, including stationery, 50 cents; Piano Forte, $8 00; Use of Instrument, $2 00; Agricultural Chemistry, including chemicals, apparatus, and fuel, (breakage extra,) $12 00.

It is very desirable that students should enter at the beginning of the term; yet they are received into classes already formed at any time.

For farther information, address Gurdon Evans, J. W. Morton, or Rev. J. R. Irish, President of the Corporation.

"EQUALITY OF THE RACES."

Reply to Tamar Davis. [Concluded.]

Time will not allow me to contrast farther the present condition of the two races. "To history, then, be the decision referred." I have shown already, that the negro has the common endowments or mental faculties of the human race, and that was my first affirmation. My proposition now is, what my friend supposed me to make before, viz: that the negro race has attained as great intellectual development, and consequent advancement in the arts of civilization, as ever the Caucasian race did. Farther, I propose, that those Caucasian nations which have stood at the head of Caucasian civilization, derived that civilization from negro nations more civilized than they.

My friend has told who the Caucasians are. It belongs to me, then, to tell who the negroes are, and what mighty nations they have constituted. Were I to adopt either the literal definition or the common acceptation of the term negro, from the latin niger, I should call all black persons negroes, by which I should probably offend some of my Caucasian brethren; for, according to the classification of most naturalists, many of them are niger, black. If I ask of the Greeks, they reply "Æthops." By this appellation, which means "black-faced," the Greeks designated all black men, and called their country "Æthiopia." If I ask the Hebrews, they reply "Cush" or Ham. But this means nothing else than black. Thus I am well sustained in saying that the negroes are "black men." But, lest I be charged with indefiniteness, I will call them the children of Ham, and trace them in their most prominent development, not pursuing the minor tribes which shot off from the parent stock. The first notice which I make of these Cushites or Hamites, I read of them in the early Hebrew writers, called "Cush," and translated into Greek, by the translators of the Septuagint, by the term "Æthiopes." This people at that time inhabited the east side of the Red Sea. Subsequent Hebrew writers mention this same Cush as having passed over into Africa; but the remnant of the race left in Asia were still called Cush. Hence arose the distinction of Eastern and Western Æthiopians. At length, both by Hebrew and Greek writers, the term Æthiopes was applied to the Æthiopians of Africa, and the Eastern Cushites pass out of notice. The Ethiopians, then, were the veritable children of Ham—the despised negro race. Let the highest authority speak in testimony. See Anthon's Classical Dictionary. After abundant reference to numerous ancient authors, he says, "On the whole, it may be considered as clearly established, that the Cush are the genuine Ethiopian race, and that the country of Cush in Scripture is that part of Africa which lies above Egypt. In support of these positions may be cited not only the authority of the Septuagint, and the writers already mentioned, but the concurring testimony of the Vulgate, and all other ancient versions, with the testimony of Philo, Josephus, Eupolemus, and all the Jewish commentaries and Christian fathers." Upon this evidence I might safely rest my position, that the Ethiopians are the children of Ham, the negroes. But let me pursue it a little father. In describing the Ethiopians, the Greeks spoke of them as we do of negroes, as if they were the blackest people in the known world. "To wash the Ethiopian white," was a proverbial expression among the Greeks, applied to any hopeless attempt. If other nations were called Ethiopians, it was because of their resemblance to these genuine negroes. Strabo speaks of them as black and curly-haired, and cites the opinion of Theodectes that the black skin and curly hair of the Ethiopian was attributable to his proximity to the sun. Heroditus expressly affirms, that "the Ethiopians of Africa have the most woolly hair of all nations." The Hebrews, who could not fail to know the proper application of the term Cush, had a proverbial expression similar to that of the Greeks. "Can the Cush (Ethiopian) change his color, or the leopard his spots?" Jeremiah 13 : 23. Thus it appears, that the Ethiopians were the darkest and most curly-haired people known to the Greeks and Hebrews. I have been thus particular to substantiate the identity of the Ethiopians and the children of Ham, in order that no one may rise up and say that they were not negroes, when I show them in the height of national greatness and refined civilization.

What, then, was the national character and intellectual development of this nation of negroes? "To history be the decision referred." Heroditus says that the country of this people "includes the countries above Egypt, the present Nubia and Abyssinia." Anthon says that "Ethiopia was an extensive country of Africa to the south of Egypt, lying along the Linus Arabicus, and extending far inland. Meroe was the metropolis of Ethiopia, situated about 80 miles above the junction of Astaborus with the Nile. They had many other cities, but Meroe was the heart of the nation. We may now let history unfold the character of this negro nation.

Taylor's Manual of History says, "There was a civilized Ethiopian people, dwelling in cities, possessing a government and laws, acquainted with the use of hieroglyphics, the fame of whose progress in knowledge and the social arts had, in the earliest ages, spread over a considerable portion of the earth." "Along the whole course of the Nubian valley, is a succession of stupendous monuments, rivaling those of Thebes in beauty, and exceeding them in grandeur." "The pyramids of Meroe surpass those of Egypt in architectural beauty, and the sepulchres evince the greatest purity of taste. But the most striking proof of the progress of the Ethiopians in the art of building, is their knowledge and employment of the arch. Mr. Hoskins has stated that these pyramids are of superior antiquity to those of Egypt. The Ethiopian vases, depicted on the monuments, display a taste and elegance of form, that has never been surpassed. In sculpture and coloring, the edifices of Meroe rival the choicest specimens of Egyptian art."

Russel's Nubia and Abyssinia says: "If we except the Egyptians, there is no aboriginal people of Africa, who have so many claims to our attention as the Ethiopians—a nation which, from the remotest time to the present, has been regarded as one of the most celebrated and mysterious. In the earliest traditions of nearly all the civilized tribes of the East, the name of this remarkable section of mankind is to be found—and when the faint glimmering of fable gives way to the clearer light of history, the lustre of their character is still undiminished. They continue the object of curiosity and admiration, and the most cautious and intelligent writers of Greece hesitate not to place them in the first ranks of knowledge and refinement."

The praise bestowed on the Ethiopians by Homer, is familiar to every classic reader. If we go to southern Ethiopia, the eye of science is invited to the stupendous testimonials of the superior civilization of nations whose names have not been enrolled on the eternal tablets of history. "In Nubia," says a foreign writer, "numerous and primeval monuments proclaim loudly a civilization earlier than that of Egypt." The Ethiopians assisted Shishach "with many chariots and horsemen;" and sixteen years afterwards, went against India with a million men. (Chronicles 14 : 8, 13.) The kingdom must have been very flourishing to have supported such an expedition. Pliny says, "Ethiopia was powerful and illustrious as far back as the Trojan war, when Memnon reigned, at which time she numbered 250,000 soldiers and 400,000 artificers." Eratothenes mentions one Ethiopian commander who penetrated into Europe, and as far as the pillar of Hercules, (714 B. C.,) and 200 years later, Zerah, the Ethiopian, went out against Asa, the great-grandfather of Solomon, with an army of 100,000 men and 300 chariots. As this was 900 years B. C., and since such an empire could not have been new, we are carried back to the time of Solomon in the History of Ethiopia, and from this period her monuments begin to speak. The name of Thutmosis has been found on one of these monuments, who lived not less than 1500 B. C. But a nation that could construct such monuments must have been old. We thus approach the Mosaic period, with the history of Ethiopia. Verily what nation of Caucasians has ever maintained national greatness so long?

I need not dwell longer on the national character of this people. I may simply add, as an introduction to my next proposition, the remark of Heroditus, that "the capital of Ethiopia stood as the parent of civilization and art and religion. Piety and rectitude were the first virtues of a nation whose dominion was founded on religion and commerce, not on oppression." What Caucasian nation of ancient or modern times can boast such a fame? What, then, is the answer given by history to the question submitted for its adjudication? It presents us a nation of negroes, shut out from all other nations by impassable deserts, by its own native energy advancing for more than a thousand years in the arts of civilized life, and attaining to a perfection in mechanical skill, and all the arts of civilization, never attained by a Caucasian nation since the first Cythian placed his foot on the soil of northern Germany.. While yet Egypt, Greece and Rome slept in embryo, the clatter of Ethiopia's 400,000 artizans was heard, carving with consummate skill those majestic monuments of art, which now rear their unscathed heads, eternal rebukes to the guilty slanders heaped upon a race that has given civilization to the world.

I come now to my second proposition, that the most civilized Caucasian nations have derived their civilization from Ethiopia. My friend has placed Egypt on the list of illustrious Caucasian nations. Well, Egypt derived its civilization from Ethiopia. "To history be the decision referred." I have already shown the civilization of Ethiopia to have been older than that of Egypt.

Anthon's Classical Dictionary says, "From the observation of travelers who have carefully examined the ruins of Meroe, we arrive at the important deduction, that this region was once inhabited by a people equally far advanced in refinement as the Egyptians, and whose styles of architecture and religious ceremonies bear a close resemblance to those of Egypt. All this is extremely interesting, when we call to mind what is stated by many of the ancient writers, that Meroe was the cradle of the religious and political institutions of Egypt, that here the arts and sciences arose, that here hieroglyphic writing was discovered, and that temples and pyramids had already sprung up in Ethiopia, while Egypt was ignorant of their existence. Every thing seems to favor the opinion that Meroe gave religion and civilization to the valley of the Nile. 1st. The concurrent testimony of the ancient writers. 2d. The progress of civilization in Egypt from south to north. 3d. The improbability that an Arabian colony would have crossed Syria, from Babylon to Suez, and wandered so far south to found their first colony. 4th. The exact analogy of the Egyptian and Ethiopian languages. 5th. In almost all the temples of Egypt are paintings, representing Ethiopians in the habits of priests, conferring the implements of the sacerdotal office upon Egyptians."

"This representation," says Mr. Hamilton, "which is repeated in nearly all the temples, may be supposed to commemorate the transmission of social and religious institutions from the Ethiopians to the Egyptians."

Again, the Ethiopian divinity Isis, and the Egyptian Osiris, are often painted together, and invariably the Ethiopian Isis appears the older and superior divinity; which, says Hamilton, indicates the same as the other paintings. Diodorus asserts that the learned language of Egypt was the common tongue of Ethiopia. From this mass of evidence, it appears as certain that the civilization of Egypt flowed down the Nile from Ethiopia, as that the waters of that majestic river bear fertility to her soil.

But, farther, Egypt was a nation of negroes, a colony from the negro land. "To history be the decision referred." 1st. In the Hebrew Scriptures Egypt is called by the prosaic writers "Mitzraim," and by the poets "Harets Cham." The general opinion of historians is, that Egypt was called Mitzraim after the second son of Ham. Calmet says, "It denotes the people as sons of Ham." Josephus, the Septuagint translators, Eusebius, and others, adopt this appellation. The poetical name, "Harets Cham," used in the Psalms, means literally, "Lord of Ham." It is a tradition as old as the time of St. Jerome, that Egypt was so named after the son of Noah, whose descendants inhabited it.

Let us now examine the physical character of the Egyptians, and see if they look like the sons of Ham, as their name indicates. From the more northern latitude of Egypt, and its maritime climate, the features of the people must essentially change. The same law is at work all over the world. The blacks are turning white, and whites are turning black, and that by a law known to the very novice in physiological science. Hence modern accounts make the Egyptians chocolate color, and the paintings of the Egyptians represent a gradual turning from black to chocolate. The most ancient accounts make them black, woolly-haired, and thick-lipped. Herodotus, who traveled much in Egypt, and who is noted for accuracy of description, in describing the people of Colchis, calls them black and woolly-haired. He makes this statement to prove that they were an Egyptian colony. The same historian, in numerous passages, describes the Egyptians as Ethiopians. Pindar says of the same Colchians, that they were black-visaged, and that this was due to their descent from the Egyptians. Eschylus, in mentioning the crew of an Egyptian bark, says, "They were Egyptians, for they appear with black faces shining out from their white robes." Lucian thus describes a young Egyptian, "Besides being black, he had projecting lips, and was slender in the legs, and his hair brushed up in curls." Elian says that a striking Ethiopian feature of the Egyptians is the robust constitution of the females.

The second class of data is the paintings of the Egyptians on the monuments and temples. Before the Egyptian colonies had attained to a degree of civilization sufficient to rear these mighty monuments of art, their complexion must have been materially changed. Hence we find the chocolate color assigned to the Egyptians; but, as Belzoni remarks, these figures are accompanied with black figures, always represented as conferring on the red ones the symbols of civilization. These very paintings are a history of themselves, indicating in living light the origin of the Egyptians. Hamilton, in his "Description de l'Egypte," has well remarked, that "these pictures can mean nothing else than that the red Egyptians were in fact the descendants of the black Ethiopians." If we refer to the paintings and traditions of the Ethiopians, we invariably find the same thing demonstrated.

My third class of evidence is the osteological character of the Egyptians. And here allowance is to be made for changes incident to climate and modes of life. There is abundant evidence that the peculiarities of scull, as well as of color, of any one race of men, are resolvable into those of another by external causes. (See Harris' "Primeval Man," p. 27.) Blumenhack, who has collected much valuable information by the examination of mummies, remarks, that the Egyptian race consists of three varieties, the most prominent of which is the Ethiopian; secondly, the Hindoos; and, thirdly, the Berbers. There are many nations of Africa, known to be descendants of the negroes, whose cranial development resembles the original much less than that of the Egyptian. Denan says, in describing the female Egyptians, "The cheeks are round and thick, the lips full, the mouth large, displaying, in short, the African character, of which the negro is the original type." The term "curly haired," is applied by the Greeks alike to the Egyptians and Ethiopians. Anthon remarks, from an extensive review of historical evidence, "We may consider it tolerably well proved, that the Egyptians and Ethiopians were nations of the same race.

I may remark, then, that no point of history is clearer, than that both these nations were of the tribe of Ham, the son of Noah. But what of all this? and I have only given a moiety of the evidence which lies open before me in favor of my position, (and I am willing to grant that I find some in opposition to it.) What, then, is the decision of history? It tells of nations of negroes, whose magnificent attainments form the theme of eulogy for the pen of the historian and song of the poet. Ethiopia and Egypt still live in those stupendous monuments of art, before which the achievements of the proudest era of Caucasian glory bow in admiring adoration. The renewal of the lost arts of Egypt has defied the utmost stretch of Caucasian invention. Greece derived her civilization and arts from Egypt, and Rome from Greece, and the world from both. Ethiopia and Egypt rear the majestic engine of mental development, Greece and Rome purchase its priceless commodities, and, refitted, it rattles on over the world. From the dark jungles of Ethiopia the negro rings the shrill clarion of progression; he bears it adown the Nile; it reverberates from the plains of Memphis; it rings from the hundred gates of Thebes; it touches the cloud-capped top of the eternal monument, and flies away to Greece; the Caucasian catches the strain; he echoes it, and cries, "Great is Diana!" I have not become a "champion of a race that could never vindicate its own honor," but to hurl back the arrows, dipped in the venom of an unholy prejudice, hurled at him. He is fallen, and so are Greece, and Rome; Edom, Gaza, Tyre and Sydon, are fallen; Babylon, Ninevah, Sodom, and Herculaneum, slumber beneath the dust of ages; and the negro lies not lower than the Greek, on whose neck the ruthless barbarian has trodden for centuries. Ethiopia forgot the religion taught her by the "Christian father" whom Philip converted and baptized. Rome and Greece, though numbering their myraids of gods, fell for want of a knowledge of the true God. Egypt, though taught the beauties of science by Euclid, would not obey the living God. (Euclid, according to Anthon, was Professor of Mathematics in Alexandria, the capital of Egypt, 28 B. C., and he is supposed to have been a native of that city; there is no doubt that he was an Egyptian, and consequently a negro.) Athens, though taught the quaint maxims of Æsop, knew not the living God. (Æsop, according to the authority of Dr. Cheeny, predicated on extensive historical researches, was a negro; according to universal testimony, he was a slave to four successive masters in Athens.)

In conclusion, I may ask, why this effort to stamp upon the negro the odium of inferiority? Why has Josiah Priest wasted much paper and ink to prove him a baboon? Why, but to justify his abuses? For, says this writer, the thickness of the skull evinces that God designed the negro's head for the club of the master! If he be a brute, in the name of humanity we demand for him that kindness due to other brutes. If he be human, and inferior, then, in the name of the God of the helpless, we demand SUPERIOR protection and kindness. Shame on such a somerset of religion, as that which pleads the negro's infirmities in palliation of the most unmitigated wrongs that ever blistered the human soul. If he be noble and strong, let him be loosed that that nobility may shine forth. If he be weak and ignoble, every human soul, uncorroded by a cancerous prejudice, cries out, "Let him up," that he may become strong and noble. He will be let up; for the God of Heaven is on his side, and will blow a blast of destruction upon his oppressors and their apologists.

D. E. MAXSON.

THE REFORMER ZWINGLE.

From the American and Foreign Christian Union.

Zwingle was born at Wildhaus, in the District of Tockenburg, Switzerland, on the New Year's day, 1484. At the age of twenty-two, he became a parish priest in Glarus, when he first became familiar with the Word of God, and commenced that faithful study of it, which led him to gradual discoveries of the pure religion of the gospel. He copied the epistles of St. Paul in the original Greek, and even committed them to memory; an acquisition which afterwards proved of great service to him in his public discussions.

In 1516, Zwingle became preacher of the convent of Einsiedlen, the celebrated shrine of the Virgin Mary, to which, even in more modern days, multitudes of pilgrims have resorted from the Roman Catholic parts of Switzerland. It was not long before his mind became sufficiently convinced of the abuses and idolatry practiced by the votaries of the "miraculous image;" and soon Zwingle raised his voice in bold warning and denunciation against the superstitions manifested around him. "Christ alone saves, and he saves everywhere," was, in the words of Merle d'Aubigne, the great theme of his discourses.

The fame of Zwingle soon spread to the city of Zurich, where the election of a preacher in the cathedral occupied the attention of the citizens. After much opposition, he was elected to that office; and on entering upon it, he commenced, on the first day of the year 1519, his preaching against the errors and abuses of the Romish Church. His projects for the purification and reformation of religion were gradually developed in his own mind by the study of the Scriptures, and by intercourse with the other reformers. His efforts were seconded by the magistrates of Zurich; and by the year 1525 that city witnessed the establishment of a pure evangelical form of worship, and the free circulation and preaching of the Word of God.

The portrait of Zwingle is thus drawn by the well-known author we have already named:—

"His character and behavior towards all men contributed no less than his sermons to win men's hearts. At once a true Christian and a true republican, the equality of all men was no cant phrase in his mouth; but, as it was written on his heart, so it displayed itself in his life. Powerful and energetic in the pulpit, he was affable towards all whom he met on the streets, or in the public haunts; he would often be seen at the places where the trades' corporations met, explaining the chief heads of Christian doctrine to the burgesses of the city, or engaged with them in familiar talk. Peasant or patrician were received by him with equal cordiality."

Zwingle perished in the year 1551, in a contest between the Canton of Zurich and the Roman Catholic cantons. He died calling upon his countrymen to trust in God. It was the error of his times to believe that truth might be defended with the sword. Yet Zwingle, though not the most talented, was perhaps the most moderate, charitable, and purely evangelical, of the Reformers of his day. His last great mistake was one which he expiated with the sacrifice of his own life.

BY J. G. SAXE.

"Ah! well I mind me of a child,
A gleesome, happy maid,
Who came with constant step to church,
In comely garb arrayed,
And knelt her down full solemnly,
And penitently prayed.

"And oft, when church was done, I marked
That little maiden near
This pleasant spot, with book in hand,
As you are sitting here—
She read the story of the Cross,
And wept with grief sincere.

"Years rolled away—and I beheld
The child to woman grown;
Her cheek was fairer, and her eye
With brighter lustre shone;
But childhood's truth and innocence
Were still the maiden's own.

"I never rang a merrier peal,
Than when a joyous bride,
She stood beneath the sacred porch,
A noble youth beside,
And plighted him her maiden troth,
In maiden love and pride.

"I never tolled a deeper knell.
Than when, in after years,
They laid her in the churchyard here,
Where this low mound appears—
(The very grave, my boy, that you
Are watering now with tears!)

It is thy mother! gentle boy,
That claims this tale of mine—
Thou art a flower whose fatal birth
Destroyed the parent vine!
A precious flower thou art, my child—
TWO LIVES WERE GIVEN FOR THEE!

"One was thy sainted mother's, when
She gave thee mortal birth;
And one thy Saviour's, when in death
He shook the solid earth;
Go! boy, and live as may befit
Thy life's exceeding worth!"

The boy awoke as from a dream,
And, thoughtful looked around,
But nothing saw, save at his feet
His mother's lowly mound,
And by its side that ancient Bell
Half hidden in the ground!

INFLUENCE OF THE NEWSPAPER PRESS.

From an article in the Christian Review, by Rev. Dr. Adams.

The times of which we are writing are remarkable for the extension of periodical literature, especially for the ubiquity of the Newspaper. The authors of the Spectator, the Tattler, the Rambler, had no conception of the modern newspaper. It seems like putting the gravity of our readers to the test; when we name this as one of the most wonderful and powerful agents of our times. It is made of rags, ropes, rushes, and lampblack. Great pains are taken in fitting up the visitant to make a respectable appearance in our mansions; but in its best trim, its pretensions are very humble. It is dumb, yet it tells us of all which is done upon the earth. It bears in its own name the initials of the four points of the compass, N. E. W. S., news. Reeking, in hot haste, as if out of breath, it delivers its message, and then is crumpled up and thrown into the paper basket to ignite the morning's fire. Yet is there nothing more worthy of preservation: for it is the great dial-plate on the clock of time. Go to the archieves of an Historical Society, and consult an old newspaper; let it be a file of the Boston News Letter, commenced in April, 1704, the first ever published on this Western Continent, supposing it to be complete, and extended to the present time. Read of African Slaves in the town of Boston—perhaps a fresh cargo of stout-limbed Guineamen have arrived in a Newport ship in Virginia; turn rapidly over the leaves of the volume; your eye catches a succession of great names and events, Benjamin Franklin resisting the censorship of the press and making the lightning of the skies a pastime for himself and his son, the stripling surveyor George Washington roaming over the spurs of the Alleghanies and along the banks of the Shenandoah, tribute money, unjust taxation, mutterings and rebellion, Lexington, Bunker Hill, Revolution, independence, confederacies and constitutions, Fulton's humbug, commerce, arts, peace, prosperity, enterprise, expansion. May we not rightly call the smutty chronicle the index finger of Providence pointing to the hours of the chronometer of history? An artist expends great time and labor in painting a panorama, and crowds find delight in gazing upon the canvass; yet is it of a limited space, a ruin, a river, a city, Thebes or Jerusalem, the Nile, the Hudson, or the Mississippi. But a newspaper is a daguerreotype of the whole world, its warrings and diplomacies, its buyings and sellings, its governments and revolutions, its marryings, parturitions and dyings. A newspaper is a real microcosm, the world made smaller, held in the hand, and brought under the eye. The huge telescope of Sir John Herschel is so swung that it reflects all the distant wonders of the sky, which sweep across its lenses, upon a small horizontal table under the eye of the observer; and, analogous to this, a newspaper brings all the occurrences of remote continents, incidents at the north pole and the antipodes, under the light of your reading-lamp, and within the space of your parlor table. The evening has come, the damp sheet is spread out before you, and with an ill-concealed impatience you sit down to see what new spectacle "Time, the scene shifter," has prepared for your astonished and delighted eye. The whole world is in motion before you. This is no small gossip about what took place under your own windows in Cock Lane; but as Isaiah, in the visions of prophecy, beheld the concourse from all quarters of the earth, the dromedaries from Midian and Ephah, the ships of Tarshish, and the forces of the Gentiles, hastening to the rendezvous, so, in sober fact, the most remote and improbable agencies, from the four winds under heaven, are hurrying through the air and over the sea, to deliver their separate tidings in that small sheet of paper which you now hold in your hand. Camels, those "ships of the desert," are now traversing the arid wastes of Egypt and Arabia; steamers are now entering or leaving the harbors of Bombay, Odessa, Constantinople, Suez, Naples, Genoa, Hamburg, Cadiz, Southampton and Liverpool,—ponderous engines of speed and power, "instinct with life,"

> "Tramp, tramp, along the land they ride, > Splash, splash, across the sea;"

the Laplander with his deer, the Esquimeaux with his dogs, the electric wires at Paris, Berlin and London, every instrument that can convey thought, every agent that can communicate intelligence, in every land, on every sea, in every city, and in every wilderness, on every road and every river, all are i[illegible]ion, at the top of their speed, to open their budget, and entertain you, an humble looker-on at home, with the shifting panorama of the whole earth. Sometimes we weep, sometimes we laugh; we pity, we are indignant, we fear, and we hope by turns, and are always wondering what will come to pass next.

The newspaper, then, is the peculiarity of an age of intercommunication, an agent of human sympathy. What else lies at the bottom of this conception but a just idea of man's fraternal relations? It is the cheap correspondence carried on between all members of the human family. What a man puts into a newspaper on the other side of the globe, is on the supposition that it will interest the rest of the family on this continent. As we learn more of our fellow men, we feel a kindlier interest in them. We rejoice in their prosperity, sympathize in their calamities, and cheer on their struggles for the right and the good. There are now too many newspapers abroad to allow a man to live like a snail. They enlarge the world to our knowledge and our love. Why is anything made public but on the belief that it will be of interest to many others? Why is it announced in your paper that Isaac and Rebecca were married on a certain day last week, but on the supposition that it will give you pleasure to know it? And when, lower down on the sheet, under that startling word Deaths, your eye runs along, always with apprehension lest it fall on some well known name, and reads that the aged father, the young child, the beloved wife, the rich, the poor, the admired, the honored, and the beautiful are gone, is it not taken for granted that even the strangers will heave a sigh for the afflicted, and the world respond in sympathy to the incursions of a common foe? Read in this light, the commonest advertisements which crowd our papers have a kindly odor about them. Say not with a cynic sneer, as though you were doubtful whether there was anything honest in the world, when a store-keeper advertises his wares, that it is all sheer selfishness; for if it is pleasant to one to announce a fresh supply of tallow or wool, hardware or muslins, is it not just as pleasant to some other one who wishes to know it? When a brace of young partners in trade insert their virgin advertisement, informing the world how happy they shall be to wait on customers, can you read it without entering into their fresh hopes and giving them your blessing in their career? Business advertisements! Waste paper! You know not what you say. Those ships which are to sail to every harbor in the world, those fabrics which have arrived from every commercial mart on the earth, this iron from Russia, tea from China, wool from Smyrna, fruit from Malaga, coffee from Cuba, cotton from Georgia, sugar from Louisiana,—do they not preach to us at the corners of the streets, at the entering in of the gates, on our docks, and in our customhouses and exchanges, sermons on the mutual dependance of mankind?

SCLAVONIC GOSPELS.

The following interesting paragraph is from the Lectures on the Religious History of the Sclavonic Nations, by Count Valerian Krasinski:—

It is a curious fact, that the Gospels upon which the Kings of France took their oaths at their coronation in the Cathedral at Rheims, are Sclavonic, written partly in the Glagolite characters. This circumstance was discovered for the first time by Peter the Great, when he visited Rheims in 1717. A history of the manuscript was published in 1846 at Prague, illustrated with fac-similes, etc., by the well-known Sclavonic scholar Hanka; we extract from the work the following details: "This manuscript was presented by the Emperor Charles III., King of Bohemia, to the convent of Emmaus, as a precious relic, in the hand-writing of St. Procopius, Abbot of the convent of Savaza. It was taken by the Hussites from that convent, which they, however, spared from destruction on account of the great veneration which its inmates entertained for the Sclavonic ritual. It afterwards found its way to Constantinople, in a manner which has not been ascertained; but it is supposed that it was sent there as a present by the Hussite King of Bohemia, to George Podiebrad, at the time he negotiated a union with the Greek Church, on account of its beautiful binding, ornamented with gold, precious stones, and relics of saints. After a lapse of about a century, it was brought, in 1546, by a painter of Constantinople, named Palcokapas, who dealt in costly objects, to the Council of Trent, where it was purchased by the Cardinal of Loraine, who made a present of it to the Cathedral of Rheims, of which he was the archbishop. It disappeared during the first revolution; but was discovered a few years ago by a learned Russian, Alexander Turguenoff, in the municipal library of Rheims, where it had been deposited under the consulate of Napoleon, but stripped of the beautiful binding to which it owed its place amongst the French regalia."

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, February 6, 1851.

SIGNS OF PROGRESS.

Our readers have been made acquainted with the fact that, in Philadelphia, the Mayor's Court is open every Sunday morning for the hearing of criminal cases. That the religious presses of that city would protest against the practice, as a violation of good order, was to be expected. Accordingly, the Presbyterian, the Christian Observer, the Christian Chronicle, and we know not how many others, are doing their utmost to make the Mayor feel that he is a sinner above all others that dwell in the city of Brotherly Love. Whether His Honor's eyes are open to see the force of their rebukes, we are not informed; nor do we know what his principles are in regard to the Sabbath. We presume that those who denounce him consider him but little better than an infidel, this being their usual method of dealing with those whom they cannot convince of the holiness of the Christian (?) Sabbath. It appears, however, that the Mayor has some defenders. Some uphold his practice on the ground of its being a work of mercy to those who, peradventure, may be innocent of the crimes charged against them; others, on the ground that the Christian Sabbath is a fiction, and that one day is not any more holy than another. Among these last is a writer in the Episcopal Recorder; and because this paper has admitted the writer's article without comment, the editors are strongly suspected of favoring the doctrine which it advocates. The article was immediately copied into the Sunday Globe with approbation, and that, of course, places Tray in bad company; for editors of Sunday papers are set down as bona fide servants of the devil. They are not supposed capable of giving utterance to any wholesome truth, unless they should happen to blunder into it by mistake. We see not, therefore, but that the Recorder and its correspondents will have to become a little more orthodox, unless they can consent to be put under the ban of excommunication by those that are not in the Church.

In the mean time, quite an interesting discussion is going on in the columns of the Christian Chronicle. One of the writers takes the anti-sabbatarian view of the question, and states his points, we think, with about as much strength as we have seen them stated by any writer. He is reviewed with signal ability, however, by another correspondent, who maintains the perpetuity of the law of the Sabbath, but displays the usual weakness of those who attempt to found upon it an obligation to keep holy the first day of the week. We are glad to see this discussion, and if the Chronicle would permit it to be continued, we should hope that it would do good. But, from a notice in the last number, we see that the door is to be closed, as soon as the one who has undertaken to uphold the Fourth Commandment has finished his reply to his opponent. We are sorry to see this; not that we have the least sympathy with anti-sabbatarianism; but the editors having once opened their columns to an advocate of that doctrine, we think candor requires that they hold them open, as long as their correspondent writes in courteous language, and does not burden the discussion with unnecessary repetitions. We, of course, believe that both of the disputants are wrong. Yet we see that each one tells the other some valuable truths; and could they be permitted to go on with the discussion, we should hope that light enough would grow out of it to guide some of the Chronicle's readers into true sabbatarianism. Perhaps this is what the Chronicle is afraid of. The searching manner in which its anti-sabbatarian correspondent shows up the fallacy of the old Puritan doctrine of a transfer of the Sabbath, will unsettle the minds of our good Baptist brethren in Pennsylvania, some of whom are already suspicious of the soundness of the platform on which they are standing, and therefore the subject must be hushed up again. True, the editors intimate that they "may feel induced to express their own views, and yet without the slightest regard to favoritism towards either individual who has already spoken." But if the editors' object is truth rather than victory, it would be better compassed by free discussion, than by shutting out from their readers every thing that does not harmonize with their own preconceived views. However, the little taste their readers have already had will perhaps start inquiry with some of them. We hail every thing of the kind as an omen of good.

We are particularly glad to see that Sabbath discussions cannot be prevented in Pennsylvania, the State which so recently disgraced itself by subjecting honest and upright Seventh-day Baptists to fines for working on the first day of the week. The Christian Sabbath they call it, and claim Christ as the author of it. Query—If Christ was the author of it, was he not also the author of that saying, "My kingdom is not of this world?" And does he thank the kingdoms of this world for compelling people to keep his Sabbath? But the march of truth is onward, and the time is not far distant when such odious civil statutes, and the decisions of Courts under them, will be repudiated by a free people.

We shall keep our readers advised of the progress of things in Pennsylvania, as well as elsewhere; and as soon as we can conveniently, we shall publish the discussion which has appeared in the Chronicle.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 26.

Sunday in France—American Slavery—Papal Aggression—The Crystal Palace.

GLASGOW, January 10, 1851.

An effort was recently made in France for the enforcement of Catholicism in a compulsory observance of Sunday and the other Festivals of the Papal Church. M. de Montalembert, who rejoices in what he calls the blessings of the Inquisition, and who glorifies that institution, brought in a Report to the French Chambers on Sunday Observance, which some of our religious journals have treated as an omen for good for that land! A correspondent of the Christian Times, in reference to this measure, says, that on their return to France, the Bourbons ordered the observance of the Sunday and the Festivals of the Church. The law, he adds, was, however, never observed. The State itself, even in its public works, has seldom if ever done so. The new project, he concludes, notwithstanding of great softening down, will not meet with a better reception. It has been sent to the Council of State, and it is supposed that the majority intend to stifle all discussion on the subject.

Our own Postmaster-General has issued Regulations, that any person may have his letters and newspapers (and not the one without the other) retained in the Post Office till Monday, on giving an order to that effect, duly signed—such order being for three months at least, nor afterwards to be withdrawn without a week's previous notice. This seems a judicious regulation. It interferes not with the will or superstition of any; while, by the required notice and the extension of the order over at least three months, it will render it less liable to be used for mere factious purposes.

Glasgow, as well as Edinburgh, has been visited by Crafts and his wife, the escaped slaves who lately fled from Boston on the passing of the recent melancholy law of the United Stated. They have also the company of Brown, another escaped slave, who delivers illustrated lectures on the horrors of slavery. The popular feeling in this city on this subject has long been conspicuous; and the graphic account of the escape of poor Crafts and his wife from Georgia, was heard with much interest and sympathy. Oh, if the indulgence of the sin had not deadened the conscience, surely even those of the South could scarcely fail to feel that, independently of scriptural moral obligations, slavery is a sad blot on the escutcheon of a land vaunting as the United States does the liberty it gives. The inconsistency and the sin seem to me so monstrous, that the blinding power of iniquity alone seems sufficient to account for the possibility of its countenance and extension. Were it a mere question of politics, I should have avoided writing thus much concerning your peculiar institution; but being a question, the moral and religious aspects of which alone concern me, I take leave to add what I anticipate as the issue. History, civil and sacred, shows that the sin of nations (as of individuals) is very often, in the Providence of God, made the instrument of their punishment. Looking at American slavery in the light suggested, I expect that the down-trodden, degraded slaves, as also the red Indians, will be used as the avengers of their own manifold wrongs. By diminishing the hope that may have been long cherished in many a bosom of those who still are in bondage, as well as withdrawing rights which previous law had accorded of safety in the free States to those who have escaped from it, the Fugitive Slave Bill, it is to be feared, will tend to hasten on a crisis which probably is not very remote. Such at least are the painful anticipations of one seeking to forecast the destiny of a mighty people; with some of whom he is united in bonds of faith and love, and with others of whom he is united in nearest consanguinity. To such he ventures not to prescribe the path of duty in and to the land of their birth or adoption, farther than that they be not partakers of her sins, that they be not partakers also of her plagues.

The Papal Aggression is still with us the leading topic—but without further indication of what shall be the issue. Thirty-one out of one hundred and five Irish M. P.'s have this week put forth a resolution expressive of their interest in the cause of civil and religious liberty. As most of them are Papists, this is to be interpreted of such civil and religious liberty as Rome has been wont to accord to all over whom it had the power. These Parliamentary Resolutionists have, however, left the kind and extent of liberty to which they refer undefined, as if conscious that any attempt at definition was fitted to awaken unfavorable comparisons between the liberty they enjoy under Protestant rule, and that which is enjoyed, even by Papists, in Popish lands. But they cannot prevent others from making the observation. If, indeed, there was an honest avowal of the unquestionable claims of their church, they would find less favor. But no morality prevents the practice of deception in the time of powerlessness. And many suppose the system to be changed rather than under restraint. Great efforts are also being made to swell their apparent number; and chapels and convents are being erected to aid this view. To-day it is announced that a building has been purchased in Glasgow, to be converted into or used as a nunnery. In these establishments, they can more secretly instil their dogmas than in churches—from some of which, in Ireland, of late, the soldiers have been withdrawn by their officers, by reason of the treasonable harangues of the priests.

The London Crystal Palace, which it was originally stipulated should be finished with the year, is not expected to be completed before the end of this month, in consequence of the enlargement of accommodation demanded. More work was finished, it is stated, than the original specification included, within the time therein fixed. J. A. BEGG.

GLIMPSES OF DOMESTIC LIFE IN CHINA—NO. 8.

SHANGHAI, Sept., 1850.

You have already heard much of the exemplary zeal of the Chinese for their religion, and the tenacity, as well as apparent sincerity, with which they cling to its ceremonies, and observe its rites. Whether, as in the State Religion, the universe as a whole is worshiped; or, as at the head of the State, the "Son of Heaven" kneels to his only superiors, Heaven and his imperial ancestors, (in point of exaltation equal;) or whether, in the descending series, the earth, (called also imperial,) the temple of ancestors, or the individual divinities enshrined in each; still, all are religious, all are devout. Yet not all; for heathen China, as well as Christian America, has many exceptions to its general rules, many an apostate from its national religion, many an infidel to the prevailing faith. Living in gloomy self-seclusion, these die as the fool dieth, and their memory is blotted from the earth. One such case have I witnessed. True, the poor man was not deserted at his death, or neglected at his funeral. His lifeless form was well supplied with clothing; fold after fold was wrapped around his person; the whole covered with a crimson quilted shroud and hood, the color being considered important as making up, in some way, for the failure of life's purple tide, which could no longer supply him with vital heat. The heavy shoes were drawn on; nicely packed girdles were laid by his side, to supply those necessities which are sure to overtake the traveler to a distant clime, and to prevent that poverty which would otherwise come upon him as an armed man. There was a fan to cool his burning brow, and an umbrella to shield his fainting head—every thing was supplied for his daily wants, even a light for his dark dwelling, in the form of a small metalic mirror, which was fastened at the coffin's foot, and all was sealed up with many a rite, and many a farewell token for the departing one. The last banquet was served at the coffin's head, of which only the spiritual part was abstracted, the grosser residuum being strewn to the winds, or scattered upon the tiles, or strewn upon the house top, to be devoured at the pleasure of its capricious participants. Then the gilt paper, (tsz-din,) the coin current used in such cases, was burnt at the street door, quantities were entrusted to the bearers, to be spent on the way to the tombs, burning handfuls being scattered along the road; and thus was the sojourner to an unknown clime removed from the place that should know him no more forever. "How long will his coffin remain above earth?" I inquired. "Only three days," was the answer. "And after he is buried, how often will offerings of money be made at his tomb?" "Never, because he, during his life, had no faith in such worship." "Did he believe in any god?" "No, he believed in nothing beyond the present life, so it would be useless to make offerings on his behalf, they could not avail him." And therefore is he left to his fate, and his memory will perish when the hearts that cherished him are cold, for their affections constitute his only monument. I thought, here is a lesson for the fame-seeker. Would that my countrymen also might heed the instruction, that the mournful lamentation of the prophet might cease to be echoed in their streets, "The righteous perish, and no man layeth it to heart;" while with equal truth it might be said of those who forget God, "And they were forgotten in the cities where they had so done"—"Thou hast made all their memory to perish."

In their family devotions, also, I have thought these idolaters showed more wisdom in their generation than the children of light. A striking illustration of this came under our observation a few days since. A family from an adjacent city came to reside in this, and secured for present occupation several rooms in the house of a friend of ours. We chanced to call just as the "kah-sang" (household goods) were being deposited in their several apartments. No meal had yet been partaken—no arrangements completed—yet the family altar was already erected, the thank-offering deposited, the flame kindled, and the incense already ascending to the household god, who had been the first installed in his new habitation. I passed from room to room, and found all alike consecrated, every place a temple, and every altar glowing with its newly-kindled fires. I could not but feel the reproof; for, senseless and heartless as I have learned to consider the worship of the Chinese, still, I remembered how many a Christian householder was put to shame by those who, knowing nothing of a true religion, could thus cling to the false, ever mindful of its rites. In the bustle of business, they had found a time and a place for devotion—amid all the novelty of a change of location, season and opportunity for the attitude as well as the voice of prayer.

That the heathen do pray, is undeniable, often using language which a casual hearer might mistake for the worship offered to the one true God. They often tell us, at the close of our petitions, "You use just such language as we do." Yet how great is the difference! They know not Him who is a Spirit, and who seeketh such to worship him as worship in spirit and in truth. "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned."

Their altars are erected every where. Not only in the different rooms of the house, but at the corners of the streets, by the wayside, in the public places and the quiet by-ways; and, as every place may be consecrated to their worship, so every available object may serve them for an altar. A table, a shelf, a niche in the wall, or even the unoccupied corners of the brick fireset, wherever there is room for the idol, be it wood, clay, or stone, or the still more common but more unpretending picture, in every varying shade, from the rudest outlines of humanity to the exquisitely finished divinity, the shrine is sure to have a place. Nor is that shrine the least important item in the affair, being generally in the form of an ark, perhaps rather a miniature temple, with its triple gateway, a fair representation of idolatry on a small scale.

Among the most revered, are those to the household divinities; and with all our preconceived opinions of the stupidity of such worship, we are hardly prepared for the stupid exhibitions which are sometimes met. A friend writes me, "I find it difficult to believe, that men and women can worship mere pictures, and pictures without any reading on them either." How could that same friend find it easy to believe, that men and women can worship a lock of cotton? Yet such have we actually seen. We were at the house of mourning, and asked permission to accompany a bereaved sister to the ancestral hall. The altar was laden with its accustomed offerings of rice and fruits, meats and vegetables, for the hungry ghost, recently removed from this life, and all its dear enjoyments. Candles were burning, and incense smoking, with whatever could lure him to the proffered feast, or testify the love that had prepared it. The sister took a mourning habit, drew it carefully about her person, buttoned and folded it smoothly down, stepped to the "pah-tah," (prayer mat,) in front of the altar, performed her "keh-duh," consisting as usual of kneelings and prostrations, then arose, took off her mourning apparel, and came to us again. I stepped to the table, and saw for the first time the object to which she had paid her homage. A long untwisted roll of cotton wool had been knotted up, (as children tie pocket handkerchiefs at home,) with something of a human form, the two ends hanging footless down, and the figure fastened against a small tablet, which stood on the backside of the altar. I called her attention to it, asking what it was. With the most reverential air imaginable, she informed me that it was the spirit of her deceased brother! Finding me incredulous, she became more earnest, assuring me there was no mistake about it. Another altar, which stood near by, contained a similar image, the ghost of a departed uncle, as she asserted. Yet this was a woman of decided superiority and cultivation, although she had probably never been taught the first principles of the doctrine of Christ, or even the existence of the One True God. One needs to see such stupidity in order to believe that it can exist. L. M. C.

THE SUNDAY IN COLOGNE.—A correspondent of one of the religious papers, writing from Germany, gives the following account of Sunday-keeping in Cologne. It is just what we might expect in a region where the Sabbath is abandoned, and the true character of the Sunday, as a church festival, is understood.

"From morning until a late hour at night, the round of gaiety and amusement was unceasing. The day was one of the brightest and pleasantest of that mild climate, and every one who could escape from the cellar, or the counting-house, or the parlor, hastened out to enjoy it. Every restaurante, and gost-hof, and coffee-garden, was filled with gay parties, and a merry, social crowd poured constantly through all the parks and walks about the city. In the afternoon the dancing rooms echoed with the quick feet and the lively music, and in the evening the theatres and the concerts had the fullest houses of the week. It was evidently one of the merriest days of the year, and the people of Cologne were making the most of it. Churches, at least all the latter part of the day, were apparently voted useless, and the great object seemed to be to have the most enjoyment out of that pleasant holiday."

RESPECT FOR THE "JEWISH SABBATH."—The paragraph below shows that on the continent of Europe the civil courts respect the feelings and rights of those who respect what is called the "Jewish Sabbath." It would be well if the courts of this country would learn the lesson.

"BERLIN, 3d November.—Mr. Holdheim, the author, who had to appear yesterday before a jury, to take his trial for an offense against the law of the Press, refused to do so, on the plea of its being the Jewish Sabbath. The jury, taking cognizance of the objection, did not adjudge him in contumacy."

ENDOWING A BAPTIST COLLEGE.—Upon Franklin College, Indiana, which has struggled hard to maintain its existence, a brighter day seems to be dawning. A correspondent of the Ohio Journal says that of the sixty thousand dollars which it was recently proposed to raise as an endowment, over ten thousand has already been pledged, on a comparatively small portion of the field.

BAPTIST MISSIONS.—The Baptist Missionary Magazine for January gives an encouraging account of Missionary operations in Siam, where several persons have recently been baptized, and others are candidates for the ordinance. A second edition of the New Testament in Siamese has recently been printed. Mr. Goddard is engaged in translating the Bible into Chinese, and has completed Genesis, of which 4000 copies have been printed. Mrs. S. E. Waldo York, who was formerly connected with the Greek mission, died on the 9th of January, at Charlestown, Mass. The Baptist Missionary Union is somewhat straitened for funds, and has to raise fifty thousand dollars in the coming three months.

REVIVAL IN GENESEE, N. Y.—For a few weeks past the First Seventh-day Baptist Church in Genesee has been enjoying a revival season. Nine have been baptized and received as members of the church, and several more give evidence of a work of grace in the heart. The work is still progressing, in a quiet and powerful manner. The Holy Ghost is manifestly the leading influence, and so far as its workings are followed, souls are benefited. No extra means have been employed, nor has there been any of that excitement which sometimes attends special efforts for a revival. It is God's doing, and is marvelous in our eyes. J. B.

REVIVALS.—The New York Weekly Chronicle publishes a letter from Salem, N. J., dated Jan. 27th, which says that a protracted meeting has been progressing in the second Baptist Church since January 4th, and that thirty-six individuals profess to have found the priceless pearl, of whom thirty-two have been baptized. The same paper contains a letter from Middletown, N. J., giving the pleasant information that there about fifty persons were to be baptized on Fifth-day, Jan. 30.

THE PROTESTANT CHAPEL IN ROME.—Rev. Mr. Hastings, preacher at the much-talked-of Protestant Chapel in Rome, and an agent of the American and Foreign Christian Union, has written to the Secretary of that organization, Rev. Dr. Baird, under date of Dec. 10th, a letter which is published in the Union's Magazine. He ascribes the excitement against the American Chapel to the efforts of "an American citizen," recently arrived from the United States, who has addressed a letter of remonstrance to the Pope, averring that Mr. H. is "a mere Presbyterian Propagandist," and he sustains his charge by alledging that the religious papers in America call it the "Presbyterian Mission to Rome."

UNION THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.—The Catalogue of the Officers and Students of the Union Theological Seminary, in the City of New York, for 1851, gives the names of 76 students, of whom 10 are graduates of the New York University, 31 are from the State of New York, and 16 from New England. The Seminary is open for the admission of students from every denomination of Christians. Every student is subject to a charge of $10 a year for the general expenses of the Seminary, but no farther charge is made, either for rooms, library, or instruction. The library contains 18,000 volumes. The Professors are Rev. Dr. Robinson, Rev. T. H. Skinner, and Rev. Henry B. Smith.

SOUTHERN RIGHTS ASSOCIATION.—A "Central Southern Rights Association" has been organized at Richmond, Va., to promote nonintercourse with the North. At present the number belonging to it is small, but it is proposed to enrol a large portion of the business men of the State. An Address to the South has been put forth, which speaks very feelingly of the case of Henry Long, and thanks those "citizens of New York" who paid in full Dr. Parker's expenses in New York, (supposed to have been $600 to $800,) but says this is "no guaranty that the expenses in all the future cases of the 15,000 to 20,000 fugitive slaves to be caught, will be paid." Among other things, the Address proposes a discontinuance of patronage to all northern papers or periodicals that even concede "slavery to be a sin."

THE WIDOW OF MR. JUDSON.—Mrs. Judson, the widow of the late Dr. Judson, the missionary, writes home to a friend, under date of September, 1850, that it was the wish of her late husband that she should return to America, collect his scattered family, and assume the guardianship of his children; but she conceives that she might remain at Maulmain a few years longer without disregarding his wishes, if God should preserve her health, so that she might be useful.

A SAD ANNIVERSARY.—The 4th of February, 1850, was a sad day to many residents of New York, in consequence of the memorable explosion in Hague-street. This year the sufferers and survivors of that event resolved to suspend business on the 4th, and observe the day as one of prayer and thanksgiving for the preservation of their lives. In the evening a public meeting was appointed, at which a Baptist minister, Thomas Armitage, was requested to deliver an address suited to the occasion.

DEDICATION AT SHILOH, N. J.—The New Meeting House at Shiloh, N. J., will be dedicated to the worship of Almighty God on Fifth-day, Feb. 13, 1851, at 10 o'clock, A. M. W. M. J.

RETURNING FUGITIVE SLAVES.—The First Presbyterian Church of Chicago, Ill., recently passed a series of strong resolutions in opposition to the Fugitive Slave Law. They argue that the forcible return of persons to bondage, after they have escaped from it, is in all cases wrong; and a repetition of the original wrong of enslaving them; and not a whit less criminal than the first stealing or buying them on the coast of Africa. The reasons put forward in support of this proposition are:—

First: Slavery is based upon might, not right; men being made slaves, and continued so by force alone, whether that force be legalized or lawless. And inasmuch as that force can beget no right, the condition of slavery ceases whensoever the slave escapes from the territory where slave-law exists; as an Algerine captive in 1805 would cease to be a captive the moment he escaped from the Algerine territory; and for Tunis or Tripoli to have given up such an escaped captive would have been no less an outrage than the first capture.

Secondly: That such enslaving of men is directly opposed to the law of love, since no man can force back a fugitive into slavery in the exercise of love and good will to him.

THE STEAMER ATLANTIC.—The Canada, which reached Halifax on Sunday night last, brings no news of the Atlantic. It was supposed that the three weeks between the sailing of the Atlantic and the Canada, would have sufficed for the former to return to England in case she had got short of coal, or had broken her machinery. But failure to receive the desired intelligence gives occasion for the worst fears. There is still a possibility that she may have gone into the Azores, or that she came nearly across the ocean before a deficiency of coal was ascertained, and then found her sails were not sufficient to carry her westward in the face of the prevailing winds, and consequently had to make her way slowly back to England, where she did not arrive in season to be reported. The following is the list of passengers of the Atlantic:—

Mr. W. A. Wheelock and lady, New York; Mr. W. E. Case and lady, New York; Mr. James H. Easter, Baltimore; Mr. R. H. Harris; Mr. L. Pottinger; Mr. C. C. Hatch and lady, New York; Mr. H. P. Walker; Mr. Butterfield; Mr. Sutton; Mr. E. H. Griffin; Mr. D. Rankin; Mr. G. B. Reese, Philadelphia; Mr. Abbott Lawrence, Jr., Boston; Mr. Charles Schrader; Mr. Schileman; Mr. Klaener; Mr. W. Benjamin, Jr., New York; Mr. G. Mackenzie; Mr. J. S. Lowry; Mr. Alexander and servant; Mr. M. Goldstein; Mr. G. A. Curtis; Mr. J. J. Loring.

TRAVEL WESTWARD.—The editor of the N. Y. Tribune, says that persons traveling hence to Auburn, Rochester, Upper Canada, Buffalo, or further West ought to be apprized, that the Erie Railroad is at once quicker and cheaper than any other. Starting West from this city in the morning, you have a fair night's rest at a good Hotel in Geneva, and reach Rochester or Buffalo in the same train with the passengers via Albany, who have had no chance for rest. Coming this way, you leave Buffalo at 8 P. M., and reach our City at 10 next evening, (or at 9 if you choose to take the Ramapo road from Suffren's at an extra cost of 62 cents;) while by way of Albany you do not get in till midnight. Coming the Erie way, you pass three or four hours on a steamboat on Seneca Lake, which is a relief from the tedium of riding hundreds of miles in cars—not to speak of the good breakfast you take at leisure on the boat. Then the Erie cars are much wider than any other, and therefore more airy and comfortable. The fare from Buffalo by way of the Erie Road is $9 70; by way of Albany, $13 60. It seems to us that our Western friends who have no business on the Albany route must universally give the preference to the Erie if they are made aware of its advantages.

RIGHTS OF COLORED MEN.—In the Indiana Constitutional Convention, on the 20th ult., Mr. Kent, from the Select Committee to which the different subjects in relation to negroes and mulattoes were referred, reported a series of sections, which were read the first time and ordered printed. They provide that no negro or mulatto shall come into or settle in the State, after the adoption of the Constitution; contracts with negroes coming into the State to be void, and persons employing them, or otherwise encouraging their remaining in the State, shall be fined not less than $10 nor more than $500; there shall be an annual appropriation for the gradual colonization of negroes and mulattoes and their descendants, who are here at the adoption of the Constitution; after 1860 no negro or mulatto shall acquire real estate except by descent; the General Assembly to pass laws to carry out the provisions of the foregoing sections, if adopted by the people. This article shall be submitted to a separate vote of the people, in this form: Exclusion and Colonization of Negroes and Mulattoes, "aye or no."

LAST DRESS OF AN ACTRESS.—A foreign paper says that some days before her death, which took place lately in Paris, Mdlle. Eliza Forgoet, ex-directress of the Théâtre Francais at London, was conversing with some friends, when some one knocked at her door, upon which her attendant whispered some words in her ear. "It is my marchande de modes, come to try me on a new dress," said the actress, "will you come and see it?" She then led the way to her dressing-room, and her friends who followed her were surprised and pained to see that the new gown was a coffin. The coffin was of rosewood, lined with white satin, and was placed against the wall. She entered it to try it. "Yes," she said, smiling, "it fits well, and I am pleased with it."

Harper's New Monthly Magazine for February is exceedingly rich in the variety and value of its contents. We know of no periodical which affords such an amount of useful reading for $3 per annum or twenty-five cents a number.

Proceedings in Congress Last Week.

SECOND-DAY, Jan. 27.

In the SENATE, several petitions were presented in favor of a line of steamers to Africa, also in favor of a modification of the Tariff. Mr. Seward presented a number of petitions for the repeal of the Fugitive Slave Law, and others for the repeal of all laws supporting slavery in the District of Columbia, which were laid on the table. A bill to pay Missouri the amount of a certain reserved fund, for which it is claimed that the United States is indebted to that State, was brought up, but finally postponed to allow Mr. Clay to speak on the subject. The California land bill was then discussed a while, after which there was no quorum.

The HOUSE spent a long time in deciding what business it would not take up, and then passed to the consideration of the bill to supply deficiencies in the appropriations of the current year, but did not arrive at any other result than an early adjournment.

THIRD-DAY, Jan. 28.

In the SENATE, about the usual number of Fugitive Slave Law and Tariff petitions were presented. A bill was reported to enforce discipline and promote good conduct and order in the Navy, which provides punishment by discharge, and by solitary confinement in irons, not exceeding 40 days, on bread and water. The California Private Land Claim Bill was then taken up, and several amendments agreed to, after remarks by Messrs. Benton, Berrien, Ewing, Davis, Hale, and Butler.

The HOUSE had up the bill proposing to give to every head of a family one hundred and sixty acres of the public domain, on condition that he will occupy and improve the same for a certain period. A substitute was proposed, the first section of which simply contemplated a continuation of the present Preëmption Laws; the second, that the right of preëmption shall be perpetual, instead of limiting it to one or two years. The subject was finally referred to Committee of the Whole. The Deficiency Appropriation Bill was then taken up, and occupied the remainder of the session.

FOURTH-DAY, Jan. 29.

In the SENATE, Mr. Hale presented petitions for the repeal of the Fugitive Slave Law, which were laid on the table. The California Land Bill was farther discussed, but no action was had on it. Amendments to the Cheap Postage Bill were reported by the Committee, raising the postage to five cents on unpaid letters, striking out the provision allowing newspapers to go free within thirty miles of their place of publication, and reducing postage on magazines 50 per cent. when prepaid, as well as the provision intended to compel papers to advertise uncalled-for letters, by taking away the privilege of a free exchange from those refusing to advertise.

The HOUSE listened to a speech of Mr. Julian in favor of giving farms to actual settlers. The tariff question and the bill establishing mints at New York and San Francisco occupied the remainder of the day, without resulting in any votes or decisions worth recording.

FIFTH-DAY, Jan. 30.

In the SENATE, a number of reports and resolutions were offered, among which was one by Mr. Mason, directing inquiry into the propriety of paying the owners of the Amistad Negroes the value of those men as slaves. The California Land Bill was then debated, but no vote taken.

In the HOUSE, a debate occurred on the Senate Bill providing a retired list for disabled officers in the Army and Marine Corps, in which Messrs. Burt, Giddings, and John A. King took part, Mr. Giddings opposing the bill, which was finally laid on the table. The New York and San Francisco Branch Mint Bill was next debated by Messrs. Chandler and Van Dyke, Mr. Chandler opposing the New York Branch Mint altogether, and Mr. Van Dyke proposing, by way of compromise, that the new Mint should be established at Jersey City. No vote was taken.

SIXTH-DAY, Jan. 31.

In the SENATE, after the presentation of several petitions and the transaction of some unimportant business, the resolution of inquiry as to the propriety of paying for the Amistad Negroes was debated by Messrs. Hale, Clay, and Chase, and was finally adopted. The Joint Resolution authorizing California dead letters to be opened at San Francisco, was passed. The California Land Claims Bill was taken up, and Mr. Benton's amendment making twenty years possession a good title to land, was rejected, as were other amendments.

In the HOUSE, the Branch Mint Bill was debated by Messrs. Thompson of Pa., Chandler, Phœnix, Bayly, Cable, Holmes, Brooks, and Venable. Mr. Van Dyke's amendment putting the new Mint at Jersey City was negatived. No vote was had on the main question.

SABBATH-DAY, Feb. 1.

In the SENATE, a large number of petitions were presented, including several for the repeal of the Fugitive Law and the modification of the tariff. A resolution was adopted calling for the correspondence relative to the Amistad Claims. The death of Mr. Kaufman, Representative from Texas, was announced, and Mr. Rush, after moving the usual resolutions, said that Mr. Kaufman was born in Cumberland County, Pa., in 1813. He served gallantly in the Texan war of independence; was twice elected to and once Speaker of the Texas House of Representatives; then served in the Texas Senate till the Annexation. He was then elected to Congress, and in this his second term cut off suddenly, in the midst of bright hopes for the future.

In the HOUSE, nothing was done except to hear the announcement of Mr. Kaufman's death, listen to eulogies, and pass the usual resolutions. Mr. Howard, who made the announcement, said that yesterday Mr. Kaufman came to his desk and conversed on subjects of business relating to Texas, and then passed out. No member seemed to bid fairer for a long life. He was the image of vigorous, robust health. At the close of the day, he (Mr. Howard) received a message that Mr. Kaufman was dying, and when he reached his lodgings he found him pale and lifeless under the cold hand of death. It seems that he left the Capitol at 3 o'clock. When he arrived at his hotel in his carriage, a friend that he met remarked that he was ill and pale. He observed that he was unwell, and should retire to bed. He did so, in the midst of his family, apparently not very much indisposed.

About five o'clock, after having conversed with his wife and children, he breathed his last, almost without a struggle, and without pain. The physicians in attendance pronounced the disease an affection of the heart. Summoned by the Great Messenger so suddenly and mournfully, reminds us of what shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue.

Crime in South Carolina—and its Punishment.

The National Anti-Slavery Standard describes a late case of an elderly man, of quiet and retiring manners, named Elijah W. Harris, a native of Dunbarton, N. H., who had been in South Carolina some eighteen months, gaining a living as a country schoolmaster. He had always been opposed to the abolitionists at home, and while in Carolina had ever maintained a discreet silence on the subject of slavery. But on the 9th of January, he was arrested near Clinton, Barnwell District, by a warrant from Justice Robertson, on a charge of the Committee of Safety, composed of some of the chief citizens of the place, that he had violated some law in regard to the agitation of slavery. His trunk was seized and searched, and in it was found a pamphlet which some friend in his native place had sent him, and which he had been wicked enough not to burn without reading, containing a late sermon by Rev. Mr. Putnam of Dunbarton. This evidence, he was informed, was enough to hang him, but as an act of mercy they would only require that he should leave the State, first taking his choice between a public whipping on the bare back, and a coat of tar and feathers. Protesting his innocence, but appealing in vain to any consideration which could move the hearts of the infuriated slaveholders, he chose the latter as the least painful. He was then, in presence of a large concourse of the delighted people, stripped to the waist, and thoroughly besmeared with tar and covered with feathers, and required to leave the next morning. Of course he had no opportunity to collect his dues, nor was he allowed to go a few miles for his baggage. "To the victors belong the spoils." This is pacification. Surely, "the schoolmaster is abroad" in Carolina. Mr. H. arrived in this city on the 17th, on his way to his native hills, where we hope he will find the solace of public sympathy.

CONFESSION OF A MURDERER.—Reuben A. Dunbar, who was executed at Albany last Sixth-day, for the murder of the two Lester children, made his confession to the Rev. Mr. Beecher. In this confession he acknowledges to the murder of both the boys. He enticed the youngest boy into a wood near a field, where he knocked him in the head and then covered his body with leaves and stones. He then proceeded to entice the eldest boy into the woods under pretense of looking for birds' nests, and carried a rope in his hand. He induced the boy to climb a tree, and climbed up after him. When fifteen or twenty feet up, he made the rope into a running noose, and adroitly threw it over the boy's neck, then pushed him off the tree, which produced his death by hanging. He states that he experienced no contrition or sorrow for this horrid deed till some hours after it was committed. No one was on the farm but his mother at the time, who, it appears, became alarmed about the children. On the return of Lester and Dunbar's wife, much alarm prevailed about the absence of the children, and a general search was commenced, and the boys were found just as he had left them. He assigned no other motive for these atrocious murders than a hope to have a better chance of obtaining possession of some property if they were put out of the way. He died apparently under great contrition for what he had done, and expressed a hope of mercy and forgiveness on the part of his Maker. [N. Y. Tribune.

THE WORLD'S FAIR.—A letter to the N. Y. Tribune, dated at Washington, Jan. 24, says that the contributions to the London Exhibition from the United States, now amount to 324, and it is supposed that before the St. Lawrence sails, there will be double this number. Great activity prevails in the different parts of the world in reference to the Exhibition, and republics and monarchies will send the best specimens of their manufactures and natural productions. Arrangements have been made by which our citizens can be conveyed at an economical rate. Merchant vessels will convey passengers from America and back, with first class accommodations, and allowing six weeks time in London, for one hundred dollars. A party of one hundred gentlemen have subscribed $25,000, and engaged a first class vessel, which they will make their home while they stay in London, and which will be elegantly furnished, and will be used for parties, &c. There are now 8,200 British exhibitors. Canada sends a great variety of articles, among them some elegant Indian work. The Government of Canada has voted £3,000 to defray the expense of sending the articles. The Hudson's Bay Company will exhibit a complete collection of the skins, &c., of North America.

THE ICE TRADE.—A company of fifteen gentlemen, with a capital of $20,000, are preparing, and have nearly finished, on the margin of Huggett's Pond, Mass., along the line of the Lawrence Railroad, buildings of a capacity of holding ten thousand tons. They calculate upon a Southern market—ice being one of the things which cannot be manufactured in low latitudes, and therefore not coming under the ban against Northern productions. Last September, ice in the city of New Orleans readily sold for $6 a ton, nearly twice the average for years past.

POPULATION OF CHINA.—Every foot of arable land, in this country, needs to be cultivated to give food enough for the inhabitants; and yet, notwithstanding they are the most industrious and economical people in the world, there is great difficulty in supplying their necessary wants. Some idea of the crowded state of the population may be formed from the fact, that a farm of forty or fifty acres, which in this country supports a family of six persons, would in China support 15 or 20 such families.

IMPRISONMENT OF AN AMERICAN SEA CAPTAIN.—The Boston Traveler gives the following as a true version of the story about the imprisonment of an American Sea Captain by the Haytien authorities:—

Capt. Mayo, of the brig Leander, applied to the authorities of Cape Haytien to arrest one of his crew who had deserted. The man was arrested, placed in jail, and afterwards delivered up to the captain. The man swore to be revenged, and shortly afterwards gave information to the Haytien authorities that Capt. Mayo had smuggled $9,000 worth of dry goods into that port. Though the whole cargo of the Leander amounted to less than the alledged value smuggled, yet Capt. Mayo was arrested by the authorities of the port, and thrown into the common criminal prison, a place of most disgusting filth and misery, where from three to five hundred negroes are at times in confinement. To a petition from the U. S. Agent, that he might be confined in the fort, the answer was that it was too good a place for a "white" man. Here Capt. Mayo remained six days, and was at length released without examination, the authorities having become convinced of the groundlessness of the charges against him. The U. S. Agent then made a formal demand for damages, and so alarmed were the authorities that Prince Bobo, the chief in command, was about to grant it, when Baron La Groue arrived from the Capital. He also assented to the justice of the claim, but said it could not be paid without an order from the Emperor, with whom cash is quite scarce at present.

ARREST OF BRANDY MURDERERS.—In New York, last week, two men, Thomas Donovan and Charles Viniester, were committed to prison by the Coroner, to answer the charge of causing the death of John Kelly, by inducing him to drink a quart of brandy at a rum shop at the corner of Pike and Water-sts. Donovan, it appears, first offered Kelly a pint of brandy on condition of his drinking it. The offer was accepted, and he drank the brandy. Viniester, who is bar-tender at the place, then offered him another pint on the same terms. This offer was also accepted, and the brandy was taken, causing death a few minutes afterward. The Coroner's Jury, on investigating the matter, rendered a verdict that "the deceased came to his death by poisoning from alcohol, the same being advised to be taken by Thomas Donovan and Charles Viniester." The accused will soon be examined on the charge.

HORRIBLE AFFRAY, ALL FROM A KISS.—The Louisville Journal gives the particulars of an affray which occurred at Shirt-tail Bend, Miss. E. P. Johnson, a planter, gave a party, at which Seth Cox and lady, Dr. Gilbert, and many others, were present. During the evening a son of Mr. J., who had but lately returned from school, avowed his intention to kiss every lady present. Accordingly he commenced by kissing Mrs. Cox. Mr. C. became angry at this, used harsh language toward the young man, and slapped his face. This led to a general fight. Bowie knives were drawn, and in the affair Mr. Cox, Dr. Gilbert, and young Johnson, were dangerously wounded, and three or four others severely. Dr. Gilbert was cut in the head, and the blood gushed from the wound to the ceiling. Mr. Cox's brother had intimated that if his brother recovered he would settle the difficulty.

DIAMOND IN AN ADDER'S HEAD.—A letter from Paris says that a curious incident has just occurred at Stenay, (Ardennes.) A. M. Losquinet was hunting a hare, when his dogs came upon an adder of unusual size, which the huntsman, not without difficulty, contrived to kill; and which, on account of its great length, he carried home as a trophy; and the next day proceeded to skin, in the presence of several sportsmen of his acquaintance who had come to see this singular species of game. But what was the astonishment of M. L., on skinning the creature's head, to find, embedded in the flesh, a superb diamond of the purest water! This singular discovery has excited great interest among the naturalists of Paris, M. L. having presented the reptile to a celebrated savan of the rue de Vanguard. The diamond was sold by M. L. to Bablin, the well-known jeweller of the Palais Nationel.

A CURIOUS CASE OF FORGERY.—The Washington Republic says: "The most remarkable instance of forgery of which we have lately heard has transpired within a few days past in this city. A gentleman, ambitious of a place under Government, and failing to obtain an appointment in the regular way, stole, took or procured from the desk of Secretary Stuart's office, the skeleton form of an appointment to the Census Office. Mr. Stuart's name was already appended to it, and the aspirant had but to insert his own name and a few other items interesting to himself. Thus fortified, he presented himself to Mr. Kennedy, who had him sworn in, assigned him a desk, and set him to work." Subsequently the forgery was discovered, and the forger, probably getting wind of it, came up missing.

AN OCEAN RACE.—The question of the relative speed of American and British clippers is about to be tested, provided John Bull accepts the gage thrown down. The arrival of the Oriental at London, after a very short passage, produced some newspaper remarks, in which the assertion was ventured, that an English clipper could be built which would beat her on any tack with ease. The Union Club, and some large ship-owners of New York, have now started a subscription of $100,000, to build a clipper costing that sum, to sail from Liverpool to New York and back, with any similar vessel built in England, and on the completion of the voyage both ships are to belong to the winning party. The subscriptions already exceed $75,000. [Tribune.

TRAGEDIES IN NEW ORLEANS.—On the night of Jan. 26, New Orleans was the scene of two most terrible tragedies. One was enacted at the Verandah, between two men, named Errington and Byrd, in which the latter received two fatal stabs, and almost instantly expired. Byrd's brother died in the same way but a few days since at Lexington, Mississippi. The other occurred at a ball—the parties being a Mr. Tate and Miss Sheppard. The former asked the lady to elope with him, to which she answered "No;" when he drew a pistol and shot her dead. It appears the parties had been previously engaged to be married, but the parents of the lady were opposed to the match.

SUMMARY.

The project of building a Railroad from Schenectady to Catskill has revived lately, and the stock has been subscribed by George Schuyler, under a charter which has been owned by Mr. S. for a number of years past. The 10 per cent. required by the law has been paid up. A line of boats to run from Catskill to New York, forms a part of the plan, and the motive of the movement is to make a line from New York northwardly, connecting with the Saratoga and Schenectady Road, the Saratoga and Washington Road, and the Whitehall and Rutland Road, and so on to Canada.

The Whalemen's Shipping List gives the total value of sperm oil entered in the New Bedford District in the year 1850, at $1,885,143; of whale oil, $1,460,608; of bone, $501,009. Total value of whale fishing, $3,846,759. The number of vessels entered from foreign ports was 140, of which all but nine were American; 88 of these were employed in the whale fishery, and 52 in the foreign trade. The amount of duties received on merchandize imported during the year was $15,803 13.

Henry Burkley Holdsworth, aged 19 years, handsome, prepossessing, and very respectably connected in England, was arrested in Philadelphia, last week, charged with having committed several heavy forgeries upon mercantile houses in Leeds, in the shape of bills of exchange, which were cashed in London. He then fled to this country from Liverpool, in company with an old offender, whose dupe he appears to have been. Three thousand dollars in gold were found in his possession at the time of his arrest.

The barn and cattle stables of Mr. Richard Wistar, at Oxford, near Philadelphia, were destroyed by fire recently. Twenty-two cows, a bull, a calf and a horse were burned. The cows were principally of the Durham and other superior breeds. The bull was Nicholas Jr., which has taken the largest premiums of the Philadelphia Agricultural Society. The origin of the fire is attributed to a gang of rowdy boys belonging to Frankfort.

We learn from the New Orleans papers that the $10,000 diamond watch which has been exhibiting at New Orleans for some time, was raffled for on the evening of the 17th January, at the St. Charles Hotel, and was won by Mr. Knapp, (formerly of Baltimore,) and Capt. Broadwell, of New-Orleans. The fortunate parties purchased a tie throw (45) for $250, which was not afterwards beaten, and thus secured the prize.

We learn from the Centreville (Md.) Times, that about the same time the kidnapping affair took place in that vicinity, a free woman was kidnapped by a man residing in Kent County, and sold to Messrs Price & Moffit, at Church Hill. They ascertained only a few days ago that she was free. Steps have been taken to arrest the kidnapper.

A gentleman of Boston, who has relatives on board the Atlantic, has offered to contribute one thousand dollars toward the immediate fitting out of a steam vessel to proceed to the Azores. Some of our revenue cutters, it is suggested, might be employed in looking for her without detriment to the public service.

Letters from St. Petersburg, of the 25th December, say that, on the 3d of October, a terrible tempest broke out at Kirgis, where the horde of Korin generally establishes its camps, and 168 persons were killed, as also were 205,600 sheep, 1,292 horses, 490 camels, 360 oxen. During eight days the soil was covered with snow to the depth of 5½ yards.

Another case of kidnapping took place in Sadsbury Township, Lancaster Co. Pa., recently. Some half a dozen or more men made a descent on a negro hut, and taking therefrom one of its inmates, a colored man, gagged and hurried him off to the Maryland line, where he was handed over to another party. The negro was named John Williams, and was said to be free.

The census of Maryland shows a large increase in the colored population of the State, and a decrease in the number of slaves. The total number of free negroes is 73,158—in 1840 it was 61,937—increase 11,221. The whole number of slaves in the State is 89,178—in 1840 it was 89,710—a decrease of 541.

Brown and Williams were executed at Peoria, Ill., on the 15th of January, for the murder of Mr. Hewitt. Tom Tit, alias Jordan, the man who planned the robbery, was brought to Peoria a few hours before the execution, was fully recognized, and committed to jail.

A teacher, somewhere in the neighborhood of Deerfield, Miami Co., Ohio, lately attempted to punish a scholar for some misbehavior, but another boy came to the assistance of the one being punished, and in the affray struck the teacher with a stick of wood, causing death almost immediately.

In New York, one day last week, a broker named Tompkins, a son of Daniel D. Tompkins, former Governor of New York and Vice President of the United States, was arrested on a charge of appropriating to his own use about $80,000, the property of several Wall-street brokers.

On Third-day night, Jan. 28, the brig Glamorgan, off Bluff Point, in the Chesapeake Bay, came in contact with and sunk the schooner S. C. Davis, from Baltimore for New York, laden with coal. The captain, mate, and cook, were drowned.

The conductors and engineers on all the railroads in New England intend uniting in a grand ball at the Merrimac House in Lowell some time this month. The fête will be opened with the "Railroad Overture," and sets will be formed at the sound of the whistle.

The population of New Jersey, as shown by the present census, is 489,382. Increase in ten years, 116,075; aqual to 31 per cent. The largest growth during that period has been in Hudson and Camden counties, opposite New York and Philadelphia.

The ferry-boat Oneida, running between New York and Williamsburgh, was destroyed by fire on Sunday last.

The persons charged with the attempt to kidnap Adam Gibson, in Philadelphia, by the aid of the Fugitive Slave Law, have been put under heavy bonds to appear at the higher Court for trial. Several of them, including two police officers who executed the arrest of Gibson, are in jail in default of bail, and one of the prime actors, J. Frisby Price, is charged in addition with perjury in his testimony against Gibson, and is in jail in lack of $2,000 bonds on this account.

A dispatch from Louisville, dated Jan. 29, says: The steamboat John Adams, bound from New Orleans to Cincinnati, was sunk by a snag yesterday at 3 o'clock A. M. at Island 82, near Greenville, in the space of five minutes. Her cabin parted from the hull and broke in two; it floated to Greenville and grounded. All the deck passengers (over 100) were lost; also all the deck hands and firemen except two. The cabin passengers are all safe, but they lost all their effects.

On Fifth-day evening last, John Armstrong, a produce dealer from Rochester, while attempting to cross the river to Prescott with a double team, accidentally drove into an air hole and was drowned; with him were two young ladies, who were rescued by Mr. Holmes, a brother-in-law, driving behind them. Mr. Holmes was so frozen, that he was unable to get the ladies into the cutter after taking them from the water.

On the Cheshire Railroad, near Walpole, N. H., on Tuesday night, Jan. 28, a freight train, loaded with beef cattle, horses, sheep, &c., broke an axle, by which the cars were thrown down an embankment a distance of 75 feet, breaking the cars and killing nearly 100 sheep, several horses and oxen, and badly wounding many others. The men upon the train escaped with slight bruises.

It has been estimated by an English writer on the subject, that in the beginning of 1849, the total length of Railway in operation in various parts of the globe, was 18,656 miles, on which a capital of £368,567,000 had been expended.

Dispatches have been received from England communicating the assent of the Imperial Government to the new Canada postal laws, uniform rate of five cents throughout the British American Provinces.

It is said there has been a split in the Society of Jesuits, as to whether the system of tactics so long followed by the Society shall be changed or kept up. Conservatism has carried the day.

The prisoners confined in the jail at Ellicott's Mills, eight in number, recently made their escape, by making an aperture in the eastern side of the building. Three were recaptured.

An accident occurred on the Erie Railroad, near Narrowsburg, Jan. 30th, by the breaking of a rail, which threw the hindmost car of the train into the river. No lives were lost.

It is said that Bem, the well known Polish General, died at Aleppo in the first part of December. He remained in the Mohammedan faith to the last, and was buried with military honors.

A telegraphic dispatch from Washington, dated Jan. 31, says: Mr. Kaufman, Member of the House from Texas, died suddenly this evening, of apoplexy.

Daguerrean Gallery.

GURNEY'S Daguerrean Gallery, No. 189 Broadway, has been known for years as one of the first establishments of the kind in the United States, and the oldest in the city of New York. He has recently greatly enlarged his Gallery by the addition of more rooms and large skylights, and other improvements, rendering it one of the most extensive establishments in this country. Mr. G. attends personally to his sitters, and from his great experience in the art he is enabled, at all times, to give perfect satisfaction. The large-sized pictures recently taken by his new process are universally acknowledged superior to any heretofore taken in this country. A large collection can be seen at all hours of the day. Ladies and gentlemen are respectfully invited to examine them.

Boston Olive Branch.

The 16th Volume commenced January 1st, 1851.

THIS is a national paper, more widely circulated than any other in New England, and second to none in the United States.

The Olive Branch has a larger number of learned and gifted contributors than any magazine or newspaper this side of Europe.

The Olive Branch is devoted to Christianity, Mutual Rights, Polite Literature, General Intelligence, Agriculture, and the Arts, is issued weekly on a large imperial sheet, at two dollars a year, in advance, to single subscribers. To companies of five or less, $1 50; to companies of ten, and under twenty, $1 35; to companies of twenty or more, $1 25; in all such cases the money must be paid strictly in advance. Single subscribers, if they do not pay before the expiration of six months, will be charged $2 25; at the expiration of the year, $2 50; and club subscribers $2 00, if the money is not forwarded anew at the end of the year.

THOS. F. NORRIS, Proprietor,

Methodist Quarterly Review.

THIS Review contains 160 pages Octavo, printed on fine paper. At the subscription price of TWO DOLLARS a year, in advance, it is the cheapest Quarterly Journal now issued. The publishers issue it at this low price, in expectation of greatly enlarging its list of subscribers, which, though by no means what it ought to be, is yet, as it is believed, twice as large as that of any similar Journal.

While the theology of the Methodist Episcopal Church is the standard for the Review, its tone is large and liberal, and its range of topics, not only in Biblical but General Literature, is extensive, as its Table of Contents will show. Its contributors are among the ablest writers in this country, of various religious denominations.

In the Department of Literary Intelligence, this Journal is so unusually full and rich as to be almost indispensable to every theologian and literary man.

From its wide circulation, the Quarterly affords a most desirable medium of Literary Advertising. All advertisements, and books for notice, should be sent to the Editor, Rev. J. M'Clintock, D. D., 200 Mulberry-st.

It is altogether the most agreeable of American Quarterlies. While it is called a "Methodist" Magazine, Methodism is not the one exclusive topic. The whole field of religion, literature, and science is traversed, and a truly catholic spirit animates every article.

Knickerbocker Magazine for 1851.

EDITED BY LEWIS GAYLORD CLARK.

IN one of the chapters of the Constitution of the State of Massachusetts, yet in force, there is a declaration, "That the encouragement of the Arts and the Sciences, and all good literature, tends to the honor of God, the advantage of the Christian religion, and the great benefit of this and the other United States of America." It has ever been the highest purpose of the Knickerbocker to elevate the standard of American Literature. It has been the medium of introducing many of our most popular authors to the public. To those who take a pride in sustaining a good American Magazine, entirely national in its character, we look for support. Men of judgment need not be told that it is impossible to get up a Magazine entirely original at the same prices at which those made up from foreign sources are sold. The unremitted efforts of the Editor and Publisher will be continued to improve the work.

SPLENDID PREMIUM TO OLD AND NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

The Publisher, grateful for the large increase of patronage which this old favorite of the reading community has received, since it passed into his hands, has determined to offer to the old patrons, and to all new subscribers, a splendid engraving recently published in this city, by Messrs. Goupil, Vibert & Co., from a painting by a well-known American artist, William S. Mount, Esq. This Print is entitled,

"MUSIC IS CONTAGIOUS."

It is 19 by 24 inches, is printed on beautiful paper, and when framed will make a valuable and elegant ornament for the drawing-room or parlor. The price of the Engraving is three dollars. It will be given to all subscribers to the Knickerbocker Magazine who pay their subscription for 1851 in advance, or during the month of January, 1851, and to all new subscribers who commence with January, 1851, and pay in advance. To entitle subscribers to the Engraving, all payments must be made to the Publisher. Subscribers who owe for more than one year will be expected to settle all arrears and pay for 1851, to entitle them to the Engraving. The bills of specie-paying banks in all parts of the country will be received in payment. The Engraving will be rolled on a stick, and so securely done up, that it can be sent to California, or any other part of the United States, with perfect safety. The number for January, 1851, will commence the thirty-seventh volume of this work.

ST. LEDGER; OR, THE THREADS OF LIFE.

The Publisher has great pleasure in announcing to the readers of the Knickerbocker, and to the public generally, that he has effected an arrangement with Mr. RICHARD B. KIMBALL, the author of this popular and extraordinary Romance, to give the Sequel in the pages of this Magazine. The first chapter appears in the January number, and will be continued regularly until completed. This work has already passed through three editions in this country, and two in England, and has received more favorable notices from the American and English press than any work of fiction which has been issued during the last five years.

TERMS—$5 per annum, in advance. All letters on business must be addressed, post-paid, to

SAMUEL HUESTON, Publisher,
139 Nassau-street, New York.

Miscellaneous.

We were Boys together.

We were boys together,
  And never can forget
The school-house near the heather,
  In childhood where we met;
The humble home to memory dear,
  Its sorrows and its joys,
Where woke the transient smile or tear,
  When you and I were boys.

We were youths together,
  And castles built in air,
Your heart was like a feather,
  And mine weighed down with care;
To you came wealth with manhood's prime,
  To me it brought alloys—
Foreshadowed in the primrose time,
  When you and I were boys.

We 're old men together,—
  The friends we loved of yore,
With leaves of autumn weather,
  Are gone forevermore.
How blessed to age the impulse given,
  The hope time ne'er destroys—
Which led our thoughts in virtue's path,
  When you and I were boys.

England and the United States.

The London Illustrated News, in an article on the signs and prospects of the new year, compares England and the United States in this manner :—

An empire, twenty, thirty, fifty times as extensive and as rich as ours, has already arisen on the other side of the Atlantic, to entice into its bosom the best blood which remains to us. The young, the hardy, the persevering of our country, and of all countries of Europe, that groan under a weight of debt and difficulty, and of a surplus of population, and that cannot say, as the New World does, that every man is a man, welcome for the sake of his manhood to the great feast of nature, where there is enough and to spare for the meanest, are daily invited to leave the shores of effete Europe and settle in America. The growth of the United States is, in fact, the downfall of Great Britain. All the unhappy circumstances that are of prejudice to us, are of benefit to them. With us, the mouths that clamor to be fed are causes of decay. With them, every additional mouth is an additional pair of hands, and every additional pair of hands is an increase of power, wealth, and influence. Let us pour our millions into the great valley of the Mississippi, and it will hold and feed them all, were the numbers quadrupled. While in this old country the pauper vegetates and dies, in that country he no longer vegetates, but lives, and counts by thousands his flocks—a Job in the land of plenty.

Let those who dream of a perpetual Britain think of these things. The signs of decay are around us on every side. Events are more powerful than we are. We must, sooner or later, yield our places to the more prudent, the less embarrassed, and the more vigorous off-shoots of our race, and consent to occupy the easy chair of our senility. Nor is there anything to regret in this. The civilization that is removed is not destroyed; and the genius of our people can exert itself as well on the borders of the Ohio as on the banks of the Thames, and rule the world with as much propriety from the White House as from the palace of St. James. Europe has enjoyed power and has abused it, and the sceptre of the world's dominion is passing from her grasp. Civilization, as of old, is following the course of the sun, and the doctrines of humanity will work themselves out in a new field and on a larger scale.

From Arthur's Home Gazette.

The Paine Light.

A gentleman in Massachusetts, Mr. Paine, claims to have discovered a process by which he can convert water into a cumbustible gas, sufficient, at a small expense, to light and heat our dwellings. The announcement was received with very natural incredulity, and Mr. Paine's first experiments entirely failed to satisfy the scientific gentlemen who visited him. The process is to send a current of electricity into a jar of water, disengaging hydrogen gas, and to drive this gas through turpentine, by which, without wasting the turpentine, the gas becomes catalized, and will, upon ignition, make a brilliant flame. Just as all the world were regarding the invention as laid aside, with the thousand and one inventions which promise everything and perform nothing, savans visit Mr. Paine again, and come away satisfied that he can do all he claims, and they are afraid to say how much more. Mr. G. Q. Colton, and other gentlemen, lately examined his apparratus, and Mr. Colton thus states what Mr. Paine claims :—

"Mr. Paine claims, among other things, to have discovered a means of increasing the power of a magnetic-electric machine, to such an extent, that he can decompose water rapidly with it; that he can take a jar of water, and, by means of the electricity induced by this machine, can convert the whole of it into hydrogen gas, without the production of any oxygen whatever. He claims, also, that by changing the electric poles, he can convert the whole of the jar of water into oxygen gas, without producing any hydrogen; that after producing the hydrogen, as above, and passing it through spirits of turpentine, it becomes catalized, and then burns with a clear and steady flame—and this too without any loss to the turpentine by the passage of the gas through it. In regard to LIGHT, independent of the other applications of the power, Mr. Paine claims to have discovered a means of producing it from water, by electricity, at a cost infinitely less than any mode now in operation."

Mr. Colton proceeds to describe certain experiments, processes, and machinery, for the details of which we have not room. We give the result, premising that the bell glass is inverted in a jar of water, connected on one side with the electrical machine, and on the other with a pipe leading to a jar of turpentine. To the turpentine is affixed a burner through which the catalized gas is conducted :—

"Mr. Paine again commenced turning the machine, and instantly large bubbles of gas arose from the electrodes, and filled the jar in less than a minute! After taking out a stopper from the bell glass, and allowing several jars full of gas to escape, in order to expel the common air, and prevent an explosion, these were stopped, and the gas forced on through the gas-pipe into the turpentine, and through this to the jet or burner. Between the jar of water where the gas was generated, and the jar of turpentine, a jet issued from the pipe. This was lighted, and proved to be hydrogen gas. The flame, in front of a window, was so pale that it could not be perceived. We could see it by placing a dark body behind it. While this was burning, the gas was forced along through the turpentine to the other burner. A flame was applied to this, and a brilliant light was shown! Here were two flames, burning at the same time, from the same gas—the first, before passing through the turpentine, burning with a pale, almost imperceptible light—the second, after passing through the turpentine, burning with a light superior to any gas that I ever saw before. When the magnetic machine was stopped, not a bubble of gas would appear in the jar, and the lights went out. This small machine generated gas enough to supply a dozen burners, any one of which I should think sufficient to light a room."

From the Weekly American Traveler.

Cruise of the U. S. Ship Preble.

The papers furnish a variety of interesting details of the cruise of the U. S. Preble, Commander James Glynn, which recently arrived at New York, from the Pacific. The Preble left New York in September, 1846, as convoy to Stephenson's Regiment of Volunteers for California. Throughout the Mexican war she served with great activity upon the western coast, and at its close was dispatched to China with Com. Geisinger on board, who had been ordered to the command of the East India Squadron. She touched at several ports in the Sandwich Islands, tarrying three weeks at Hilo. Search was made upon the route for various islands reported to be in existence, but without success. She reached China at a time when matters between the Governor of China and the U. S. Commissioner, relative to the reception and recognition of the latter, were beginning to assume a grave aspect, and her presence contributed to effect an adjustment of difficulties honorable to our Government. Owing to misunderstandings between other foreigners and the Chinese, the Commander-in-Chief deemed it expedient to retain the Preble in his squadron, and she was engaged several months in visiting Manilla and the southern ports of China. Information having been received of the detension and imprisonment of sixteen American shipwrecked seamen in Japan, she was dispatched, February, 1849, to demand and obtain their release. She proceeded accordingly to Japan, touching on her way at the Loo Choo Islands.

"As the Preble neared the coast of Japan, signal guns were fired from prominent headlands, to give warning to the surrounding country, as it was afterwards ascertained, of the appearance of a strange ship. As she entered the harbor of Nagski, the Preble was met by a number of large boats, which ordered her off, and attempted to oppose her further ingress. But by standing steadily in, with a fine breeze, their ranks were soon broken, and a desirable position selected for anchoring.

"Fleets of boats, crowded with soldiers, shortly afterwards began to arrive, and from that time until the Preble left, they poured in, in one incessant stream, day and night. Each squadron of boats wore banners, ornamented with distinctive symbols and devices, which were transferred with the troops to their encampments on the elevated shores surrounding the anchorage of the Preble. From these heights batteries were at intervals unmasked, of heavy artillery, numbering in all upwards of sixty guns, which were trained on the Preble's decks.

"It was in the face of this array, and with a cordon of boats drawn around the ship, that negotiations were carried on for the release of American citizens from an ignominious and cruel imprisonment of nearly seventeen months. Against these men, the Japanese urged not the slighest charge, except the difficulty they had in building prisons and cages strong enough to hold them. Yet they were treated with inhuman barbarity; and when first confined, were made to trample on the crucifix, being told at the same time, that it was 'the devil of Japan,' and that if they refused to comply, their lives would pay the forfeit.

"The demand for their release was at first treated with a well affected haughty indifference by the Japanese authorities. They subsequently gave place to an evasive diplomacy; but upon being peremptorily told by Capt. Glynn, in language that could not be misunderstood, that they must immediately deliver up the men, or means would be found to compel them; and that the American government always knew how to recover and protect its citizens, when improperly detained or abused by any nation whatever, they quickly changed their tone; and, deprecating any anger or excitement on the subject, the Lieut. Governor (who had conducted the interview in behalf of the Japanase) promised that they should be sent off to the ship in two days from that time. This was strictly fulfilled."

Walking Fish.

In very dry seasons, the fish inhabiting small ponds, or pools of water, are reduced to the greatest extremity for the want of their natural element. In some cases, they manage to preserve life by plunging themselves to a considerable depth in the mud at the bottom of their ponds, and there remaining until a copious shower of rain relieves their wants. This expedient, though not always successful, nevertheless suffices to keep certain races from becoming extinct. Other species, however, have been furnished by their Creator with the instinct and power, when so circumstanced, of deserting their native ponds, and of traveling over the land in search of new homes. This has long been known of eels; but Dr. Hancock gives an account of a species of fish called by the Indians the Flat-head Hassar, which, when the pools wherein they usually reside are deprived of water, march in droves by night in quest of other ponds, from which that necessary element has not been evaporated. The fish grow to about a foot in length. A strong, bony arm, edged upon the lower extremity like a saw, projects from the breast of the fish near the pectoral fin, of which it forms the first ray. This arm the animals use as a kind of foot, pushing themselves forward by means of their tail, which is very elastic. In this way they will travel over the land as fast as a man leisurely walks. Their bodies are sheathed in a very strong plate, which, it is conjectured, aids them in their progress like those under the bodies of serpents, which partially perform the office of feet. The Indians affirm that they are furnished with an interior supply of water sufficient for their journey—an assertion which seems to be confirmed by the fact that their bodies, when taken from the water, even if wiped dry with a cloth, instantly become moist again. Mr. Campbell, a friend of Dr. Hancock, and a resident of Essequibo, once met with a flock of these animals, so numerous that his Indian attendants were enabled to fill several baskets with them.

Lead Cellar at Bremen.

The Lead Cellar, so called on account of the lead used for the cathedral having formerly been placed in it, has the singular property of preserving from decay or decomposition, any animal matter that is deposited in it; and from the many bodies that are consequently to be found there, it might not inaptly be termed the "Dead Cellar." This property is said to have been accidentally discovered from some poultry having been left in it, and forgotten, and which were afterwards discovered in an uncorrupted state, with the juices dried up. A Swedish princess happening to die about that time, it was determined to place the body in the vault, with a view of preserving it until the directions of her family could be received as to its final disposition. It proved that her relatives did not think her worth a funeral, nor did the Senate seem desirous to incur the expense of one suitable to her rank; and, therefore, it was determined to let her remain in statu quo, and which she has now done for three hundred years.

Since that time, other corpses have been deposited in this cellar. Among the rest, a plumber, fifty years of age, who fell from off the steeple, and severed his head from his body; this is said to have lain three hundred years—an English countess, eighty years of age, belonging to the Stanhope family, who died of cancer, and which has been in the vault two hundred years—a Swedish general, and his adjutant, who were killed near Bremen, during the seven years' war; a cannon shot wound is still visible—also a student, who fell in a duel about the same time; the wound of a sabre is still perceptible on the left shoulder, and the silken band of the garland made by his fair friends, in token of his unfortunate fate, yet remains.

There are various other bodies preserved here. The whole formerly lay carelessly on the ground, but of late more decency has been observed, each body having been placed in a separate chest. I examined some of them with great attention, and found the skin resembling coarse, hard leather, under which, on making pressure, might be perceived the vacancies left by the drying up or evaporation of the fluid parts. The hair was firm on the scalp, and the teeth and nails in a perfect state, the eyes dried up and deeply sunk into the orbits, and the nose, like a double nose, from the cartilege, at its connection with the ossa nasi, having sunk down to a level with the face.

There was a Muscovy duck in full plumage, and also a cat, that was supposed to have got in accidentally, and which lies coiled up as if asleep.

Manufacture of Letter-Envelops.

It may seem a little thing to manufacture this article, but the machinery employed is of the most complex and ingenious charac ter, and the various stages of the operation are highly interesting. A pile of paper is first laid under the cutting-press, and the flat forms of the envelops are cut at once. These are then taken to the folding-machine, which is one of the most sigularly constructed and beautiful pieces of mechanism we have ever seen. It requires but one person to feed it, and it performs all the rest of the operation itself; for the paper cut in proper form, being placed in a fixed condition, is seized by nippers and drawn forward to a bed where it is held firm by an overhanging plate of metal which covers just so much as marks the size intended to be made, leaving the parts to be folded over, loose. The sides are then, by means of plates advancing towards each other, folded over, and as they retire, a roller covered with gum passes under the surface of a double curved piece of brass, which instantly falls upon the paper, and as it rises, another plate turns over the outside fold, while at the same time a roller presses on it and causes adhesion. This being done, the bed on which the envelop rests falls to an inclined position, and being caught between two rollers, the finished article is passed through a trough into a receiving basket. The only remaining labor is to gather the envelops up, and sort them into packages of twenty-five each. The whole is done with great rapidity, and so various and contrary are the motions of the machine, that it appears almost to be in some degree sentient.

FOOLISH SPORT.—About three weeks since, says an exchange, two children, belonging to a man named Brown, formerly a waiter at the Globe Hotel, Exmouth, the one four, and the other a few years older, were sent by the mother, who ~~keeps a mangle,~~ after a basket of clothes, and were met on the way by some boys, one of whom had on a most hideous looking mask. The boy, seeing the children frightened, ran after them, repeating some gibberish, which frightened them more, and having followed them until they turned the corner of the street, transferred the mask to another boy, who managed again to come in contact with the poor children, who returned home instantly, when their parents, seeing them so pale, and trembling very much, inquired what the matter was, which they explained as well as they could. The shock, however, was so great that they never recovered from it; their health declined daily. The one died three weeks after, and the other died on Wednesday last. Each of them in his illness often exclaimed, "He is coming," "I see him," "There he is," with other like expressions.

THE BIBLE AT THE WORLD'S FAIR.—It is stated that the Committee of the British and Foreign Bible Society have determined to place before the visitors at the Great Exhibition of next summer, a complete set of translations of the Scriptures. It is also suggested, that a copy of the New Testament be presented, on that occasion, to every foreigner present, and this in his own language; the volume to be bound in calf, and labelled inside to indicate its origin. A special subscription, it is thought, of less than $40,000, for 100,000 copies, might easily be obtained.

A SINGULAR DISCOVERY.—On Thursday last, says the Pottsville (Pa.) Journal, while some children were at play upon the hillside, near Fish-bauch, half a mile from Pottsville, one of the number discovered a small string fastened to a bush; his curiosity being awakened, the string was seized, and after pulling at it, he found that it became detached from some object beneath the snow. Upon examination of the string, several gold rings were found upon it, and a slight search enabled them to discover an old stocking or drawer-leg, with several hundred dollars' worth of unfinished gold rings, pencils, &c. In the vicinity another string was found fastened in the same manner, but leading off in another direction, to the end of which there was also a large amount of Jewelry, also unfinished. From an examination of the different specimens, it would appear that some large manufacturing house had been plundered, and the spoil hidden beneath the snow, by the party committing the theft, and the spot designated by the small string, so as to enable them to regain their spoils at a future day.

NEW WATER-PROOF DISCOVERY.—A Mr. Martin, of Cockermouth, England, has discovered one of the most wonderful processes for rendering all kinds of fabrics water-proof. He has patterns of every fabric, from the finest open lace to the coarsest fustian of the mechanic; each appears to be as if cut from the web; not the slightest difference is observable betwixt those that had undergone his process of water-proofing and those that had not; even the most delicate silks are not in the least altered, either in color, feel, or smell, except they are perfectly impervious to moisture, the water rolling over them as from the duck's back or the cabbage leaf. The most extraordinary as well as the most valuable characteristic of the discovery is, that though cloth of any description, after having been water-proofed by Mr. Martin's process, will resist boiling water, it is not in the slightest degree less impervious to vapor—the steam, and even the breath, passing as freely through it as before it was submitted to the water-proofing process.

NEATNESS AND ORDER IN THE HOUSEHOLD.—Among the means of domestic comfort there is scarcely any so important as what is called household furniture; most persons must have felt that much of their well-being depends on the articles intended for our daily and nightly use. A little attention to these matters is of more consequence than many persons believe; keeping up appearances within reasonable bounds is a very laudable endeavor. Appearances are, in many respects, realities; children brought up in a well-conducted home, where they see every day a shelf or two of books, a few tasteful vases or other ornaments, or pictures on the wall, clean curtains and blinds, and well-swept carpet, look upon them all as realities, and without knowing it, they grow up with a conviction of their value, and in most cases prove it, by keeping their own households in order. A proper and becoming attention to appearances is often a warrant for true respectability of character; and it is sometimes said, that you never really know people till you have seen what their in-door life is.

HOSPITALITY.—In every American Indian village is a vacant dwelling, called the "Stranger's House," for the reception of travelers. It is reckoned uncivil to enter a village without giving notice of one's approach. As soon as strangers arrive within hearing, they are expected to stop and halloo, and remain until invited. Two old men usually come out and lead them in. They are placed in the Stranger's House, while the old men go round from hut to hut, acquainting the inhabitants with the arrival of strangers, who are hungry and weary; and every one sends them what he can spare of food to eat and skins to repose on. When the travelers are refreshed, and pipes and tobacco are brought; then, and not before, conversation begins, with inquiries of who they are; whither bound, and what news, &c., and usually ending with offers of service. Nothing whatever of payment is expected for the entertainment.

BELLS.—The nearer bells are hung to the surface of the earth, other things equal, the farther they can be heard. Franklin has remarked, that, many years ago, the inhabitants of Philadelphia had a bell imported from England. In order to judge of the sound, it was elevated on a triangle, in the great street of the city, and struck, as it happened, on a market day; when the people coming to market, were surprised on hearing a bell at a greater distance from the city than they had ever heard any bell before. This circumstance excited the attention of the curious; and it was discovered that the sound of a bell when struck in the street reached nearly double the distance it did when raised in the air. Sounds are distinct at twice the distance on water that they are on land.

HARD AND EASY WRITING.—The seeming readiness and dashing style of some authors have injured many aspirants after literary excellence, who think the inspiration of the writer is not exercised by any care in penning or modeling his verse or prose. Moore averaged a line a day, and when Chalmers, after his return from London, was asked what John Foster was doing, he replied, "Hard at it, at the rate of a line a week." The half is many times better than the whole. A merciless pruning is the best for the real life and beauty and fruitfulness of the vine. Such a care at revision soon enters into the habit of composition; it adds other elements to the original "gift" at writing, and the pen puts the words into the best places.

MALLEABLE BRASS.—The last number of the Journal of the Franklin Institute makes mention of an alloy of copper and zinc that possesses the important property of malleability, differing entirely in this respect from common brass, all articles of which, it is well known, must be made by casting. The alloy in question is made by melting together, with proper care, sixty parts of copper and forty parts of zinc. It is thought to be a determinate chemical combination, for the result of the analysis very nearly accords with the assumption that it may be considered as composed of 3 atoms, by weight, of copper, and 2 of zinc. "It is harder than copper, very tough, and in a properly managed fire, malleable; so much so, that a key was forged out of a cast rod."

ARTIFICIAL MAHOGANY.—The following method of giving any species of wood of close grain the appearance of mahogany in texture, density, and polish, is said to be practiced in France with such success that the best judges are incapable of distinguishing between the imitation and the mahogany. The surface is first planed smooth, and the wood is then rubbed with a solution of nitrous acid. One ounce of dragon's blood is dissolved in nearly a pint of spirits of wine; this and one-third of an ounce of carbonate of soda are then mixed together, and filtered, and the liquid, in this state, is to be laid on with a soft brush. This process is to be repeated, and in a short interval afterwards the wood possesses the external appearance of mahogany. When the polish diminishes in brilliancy, it can be restored by a little cold drawn linseed oil.

CONTRIBUTION TO THE WORLD'S FAIR.—From Vienna, accounts have reached us of a magnificent and costly contribution, which a furniture manufacturer of that town is sending to the World's Fair. It will consist of four rooms of a palace, each appropriately furnished and decorated. The material is a peculiar Indian wood, rather lighter in color than rosewood, and it is sculptured in the most artistic manner, after the chastest designs of eminent artists. The bedstead alone, which is already completed, cost 12,000 gulden, about $11,000; and the cost of the other articles is in proportion.

JENNY LIND.—In a private letter from Jenny Lind to a friend in Manchester, England, written in Philadelphia, in December, she says that Mr. Barnum's behavior to her is most gentlemanly. She contradicts, in the most positive manner, having any engagement with Mr. Barnum, to be brought by him to London in 1851, or any other city or part of the European continent. She writes apparently very much pleased with the American people, having met with a great many very good, kind, hospitable friends in her transatlantic tour. A Stockholm paper states that Jenny had sent to that city $20,000, to be distributed among the poor.

Variety.

An amusing and also interesting experiment may be performed as follows:—Take four glass tumblers, invert them upon the floor, lay a board on them, let a person stand on the board, and another standing on the floor, beat him over the head with a fur cap, or muff, or anything made of fur or silk plush; then apply your finger to his nose and a spark of fire will be seen to flash from the nose to the finger. The room should be dark, when the experiment is made, so as to be able to see the flash.

It is hard for a man to amass riches by toiling in his shop, while there is a leakage at home in his kitchen. "What a small kitchen!" exclaimed Queen Elizabeth, after going through a handsome mansion. "It is by having so small a kitchen," replied the owner, "that I am enabled to keep so large a house."

A new kind of leather has been recently introduced in Canada. It is manufactured from the skin of the porpoise, and said to be of the most excellent quality, as soft and pliant as kid, while it is perfectly strong and tough. A specimen was exhibited at a recent industrial exhibition in Montreal.

Upon a traveler telling Gen. Doyle, an Irishman, that he had been where the bugs were so large and powerful that two of them would drain a man's blood in one night, the General replied: "My good sir, we have the same animals in Ireland, but they are called humbugs."

A lady, who lives about ten miles from Germantown, affirms that her boys are the most tender-hearted children she ever knew. She says that if she asks one of them to draw a pail of water, he instantly bursts into tears.

One of the newspapers suggests that the printers of Philadelphia shall erect a neat monument over the remains of Franklin, which now repose in one of the city cemeteries, in unostentatious simplicity, characteristic of the man.

Hats were not much used until 1500; though mention is made of them in a statute of Richard III., by which the price of a hat is limited to twenty-pence.

In 1567, glass was such a rarity, as not usually to be found in the houses of the nobility. It is probable that glass windows were not introduced into farm houses until the reign of James I.

It requires 3500 sheep to be kept a whole year to support the Lawrence, Mass., mills, with wool for one single day.

Is there a word in the English language which contains all the vowels? UNQUESTIONABLY.

Why will Jenny Lind and Barnum never quarrel? Because she is always for-giving and he for-getting.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year of this Seminary, for 1850 and '51, will commence the third Wednesday in August, and continue forty-four weeks, including a short recess between the terms, and one of ten days for the winter holidays.

The year is divided into three terms:—

The first, of 14 weeks, begins Wednesday, August 21st, and ends Wednesday, November 27th.

The second, of 15 weeks, begins Monday, December 2d, and ends Friday, March 14th.

The third, of 14 weeks, begins Tuesday, March 18th and ends Tuesday, June 24th.

Board of Instruction.

GURDON EVANS, A. M., President,
And Professor of Mathematics and Natural Science.

Rev. JOSEPH W. MORTON,
Professor of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, Spanish, and Moral and Intellectual Science.

Mrs. SUSANNA M. SPICER, Preceptress.

ADOLPH ROSENHAYN,
(Late of Friedrick Wilhelm College, Berlin,)
Teacher of German, Piano Forte, and Assistant in Greek and Latin.

Other competent Teachers will be employed as occasion may demand.

TEACHERS' CLASSES will be formed, as usual, at the beginning of the Fall and middle of the Winter Terms, and continue seven weeks.

In the Common Branches, classes will be formed at the commencement of each term; but in the higher, the interest of the student, as well as the welfare of the Institution, demand that a more systematic course of study be pursued.

In the Natural Sciences, Elementary Chemistry and Philosophy will be pursued during the Fall Term Agricultural Chemistry, Astronomy, and Physiology during the Winter Term; Botany and Geology during the Summer Term.

Classes will be formed in Latin, French, and German, at the commencement of the Fall Term; in Hebrew, Greek, and Spanish, at the commencement of the Winter Term, and continue through the course of study.

In Mathematics, Geometry is studied in the Fall, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, and Astronomy, Surveying, Navigation, &c., in the Summer Term.

The course of instruction in Agriculture is thorougly scientific, embracing study and recitation in the best authors. Instruction is given in a well-furnished laboratory, in the analysis of soils, ashes of plants, manures, &c. and the modes of testing for their constituent elements. The attention of farmers who wish to give their sons a practical education is especially called to this department.

Board in private families, from $1 25 to $1 50. Many students board in clubs for 60 to 75 cents.

TUITION—to be settled upon entering school—from $3 00 to $5 00. EXTRAS—For Drawing, $1 00; Oil Painting, $5 00; Chemical Experiments, $1 00; Writing, including stationery, 50 cents; Piano Forte, $8 00; Use of Instrument, $2 00; Agricultural Chemistry, including chemicals, apparatus, and fuel, (breakage extra,) $12 00.

It is very desirable that students should enter at the beginning of the term; yet they are received into classes already formed at any time.

For farther information, address Gurdon Evans, J. W. Morton, or Rev. J. R. Irish, President of the Corporation.

OBLIGATION OF THE SABBATH.

A correspondent, under the signature of J. B., has addressed us a communication, suggesting several difficulties in his own mind in reference to the Sabbath, which are stated in the form of propositions, to which another correspondent has kindly furnished the following reply.

MESSRS. EDITORS:—I regret sincerely that I have not the leisure to meet the request of your correspondent J. B., as I could wish; nevertheless, the practical moment and gravity of the occasion, the publicity and plausibility of the attack upon the obligation of the Sabbath, and the triumphant tone of the assailant, impel me to offer a few remarks. I must pass over all else, and come at once directly to his arguments.

The writer says, "The six following propositions may be confidently assumed, as incapable of refutation," and challenges dispute:

First—There is one, and only one Sabbath, enjoined, described, or in the remotest manner alluded to, in the whole Bible, whether Hebrew or Christian—the Saturday Sabbath. "The seventh day is the Sabbath." No other day is so designated; no other day can be the Bible Sabbath. (Exodus, 20: 11.)

Now I venture to affirm, that in this first proposition the writer assumes what can neither be granted nor proved; namely, that the Sabbath (or religious rest) enjoined in the Decalogue, is the Saturday Sabbath. The Decalogue knows nothing of Saturday. It makes no designation of the day. It fixes only the proportion of time, every seventh day, for devotional rest, but leaves the date of the reckoning, and of course the day itself, to be determined by positive law, or some other means. For the Jews, this had been previously determined by the miracle of the Manna, Exodus 16.

In Eden, the first Sabbath kept by man was the first day after his own creation, a devotional rest with his Creator, to prepare him for his six days' toil. The very revolution of the earth on its axis forbids all mankind to observe precisely the same moments. From the Decalogue alone, I repeat it, no man could determine when the week should begin or end; it requires only a certain definite proportion of our days to be observed religiously, and that proportion fixed by the Divine example at the creation of the world. This idea of a Saturday Sabbath being enjoined in the Decalogue, and the only one so enjoined, is a pure fancy of the writer. So serious a blunder at the beginning should abate a little his tone of confidence.

Second—This Sabbath was strictly a ceremonial and Jewish institution—(Levit. 23. Deut. 5: 15,)—an especial "sign" between God and the "children of Israel." (Exod. 31: 13, 17. Ezek. 20: 12.

This proposition, so far from being proved by the texts referred to, seems to me a glaring falsehood. Every other command in the Decalogue is acknowledged to be of a moral nature. How happens it that the fourth should be an exception? It is not an exception. So far from being "strictly ceremonial," it is eminently moral. Like marriage, it is founded in the very constitution of man as a social being. He is no more bound as a religious being to worship his Creator, than he is bound as a social being to worship him in communities; and for this, regular times must be observed by common consent. But common consent cannot be expected without divine authority. For a weekly Sabbath, rather than one oftener or more seldom, is not of itself obvious, and every tenth day, or every fifth, or any other proportion, might have its advocates; just as in the case of marriage there are found men to advocate polygamy, or divorce at pleasure. Hence it pleased God to determine the Law, both of Marriage and of the Sabbath, at the beginning of the world. Gen 1 and 2. And yet this writer tells us that the Sabbath is "strictly a Jewish institution!" An institution "made for man," established at the beginning of the world, and founded on reasons of universal and perpetual force, a strictly Jewish institution! An institution "strictly Jewish," though instituted by God two thousand years at least before a Jew was born! The idea is preposterous. The passages of Scripture referred to, teach no such palpable contradiction. That God gave this institution to the Jews, as He gave the rest of the Decalogue, and that its strict observance by them as a nation would be "a sign" of His covenant with them, proves nothing of the kind. This second proposition, then, if the Scriptures are to decide, is palpably false.

Third—As confirmatory of this, Jesus studiously and repeatedly violated the Sabbath; (compare Matt. 12: 1, 2, with Exodus 16: 28, 29, and Numb. 15: 32, 36, also, John 5: 8, 9, 10, with Jerem. 17: 22;) and justified this violation by the direct assertion of his right, and (by necessary implication) of his intent to abolish it. "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath; therefore the Son of Man is Lord even of the Sabbath!" Mark 2: 27, 28.

If this proposition had been drawn up by a Jew, "with malice prepense," against our Lord, it would have less surprised me than it does from a professed Christian. This is the first time I remember to have ever seen "Him who knew no sin," charged with a "studied and repeated violation" of the Law of God. For whether the Sabbath be of universal obligation or not, it was certainly binding on the Jews, of whom our Lord was one according to the flesh; for he was "made of a woman, made under the law," says the Apostle; and if he did thus violate it, he was guilty of sin, and not of a sin only, but of a crime which by the civil code of Moses was punishable with death! Can any man in his sober senses believe such a proposition? Nor will it avail to say, with this writer, that Jesus justified this violation by an assertion of his right and intent to abolish it. Even if this were true, (which I do not admit,) that does not relieve the case: for certainly it was then in force, (as this writer's language implies,) and every Jew, including Jesus himself, was then bound by it. The truth is, our Lord vindicates himself on very different grounds, from the charge of breaking the Sabbath. He reasons with his calumniators on grounds admitted by themselves, that his works were works of necessity, mercy and piety, as much and more so than their own constant practice of offering sacrifice, &c., on the Sabbath, and therefore such as were lawful to be done on the Sabbath. And when he rises to the tone of majesty, and claims to be himself "Lord of the Sabbath," he is careful to put his claim on the broad ground that "the Sabbath was made for man," that is, not for the benefit of that peculiar nation, but for the good of the whole human race. This writer's third proposition, then, is not merely false, but calumnious, and can only be excused on the ground of radical mistake.

Fourth—While the Sabbath was thus openly and constantly broken by Jesus and his apostles, they never, on the other hand, enjoined, or even encouraged, its observance in any manner whatever, either by example, by precept, or by the slightest intimation; nor can a single passage be found among all the New Testament writers, condemning a neglect of this law, or reproving the "Sabbath-breaker."

This proposition has more show of truth than any of the preceding, and so far as it is true shall be respected, though it opens by reäffirming a falsehood already disproved. It is true that they (Jesus and his Apostles,) never in express terms enjoin the observance of the Sabbath. Neither do they enjoin in express terms many other acknowledged duties, as for instance family prayer, or the public worship of God. But it is not true, that they did not encourage its observance, either by example or other intimation of its binding force. For their uniform example, as we have seen, was a constant encouragement of its observance, up to the day of our Lord's death; and if after his resurrection we find them (as we do) meeting for Christian worship on "the first day of the week," and observing that as "the Lord's day," it only proves—not that the Sabbath (that is, the day of religious rest) is abolished, but that it is now transferred, by the authority of "the Lord of the Sabbath," to another day of the seven, in honor of a work far more glorious than the creation, (Isaiah 65: 17, 18,) which was declared on that day to be finished by his resurrection from the dead. This change also was foretold in the 118th Psalm. When "the stone which the builders rejected was made the head of the corner," the Church was taught to say, "This is the day which the Lord hath made; we will rejoice and be glad in it."

And although it is true, that we no where find them in terms "reproving the Sabbath-breaker," yet we do find them condemning "the ungodly and profane," with evident allusion to the profanation of the Sabbath, as well as of the Divine Name. See 1 Tim. 1: 8—10. No man can read that passage carefully without perceiving that Paul, in his classification of sinners, has his eye upon the order of the Decalogue. And in the existing state of society and of knowledge, that was enough. See Matt. 5: 17—19.

Fifth—On the contrary, the Sabbath law was wholly and unequivocally abrogated, for the Gentile world, by the first great council of the Catholic Church, held at Jerusalem under the immediate direction of "the apostles and elders;" which council decreed that "the keeping of the law" was an unnecessary thing, and a burden not to be laid upon those who were not Jews. (Acts 15: 24, 28, 29.)

This proposition is a pure assumption, without a shadow of proof. I meet it with an unequivocal denial. The key to the whole fallacy is in the wrong sense given by the writer to the term law. In this case, as the whole context shows, it is to be restricted to the Jewish ceremonial law. It does not, therefore, affect the original law of the Sabbath.

Sixth—Hence the subsequent Epistles, with one voice, regard the sanctification of the Sabbath as a provisional type, fulfilled and superseded by the gospel dispensation; the "rest which remaineth to the people of God" being not that of "the seventh day," nor that which "Joshua had given" in Caanan, but that into which they "who have believed do enter," when they "have ceased from their own works," (Heb. 4: 3, 4, 8, 9, 10.) "For by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified." (Rom. 3: 20, 27, 28; 9: 32, &c.)

If the writer had limited himself to saying that "he who ceases from his own works (for justification) does not enter into rest" by faith in the Redeemer, and looks forward with a joyful hope to a purer "rest, which remaineth to the people of God," I could cordially agree with him. But his proposition goes much farther, and affirms that the Sabbath was merely "a provisional type, fulfilled and superseded by the gospel dispensation." This I deny, and challenge him to the proof. It certainly is not found in the epistle to the Hebrews.

When the Scriptures speak of the Christian as "delivered from the law, the Decalogue included," they refer to it as a conditional covenant of life, not as a rule of moral obligation. This momentous distinction, absolutely fundamental to a right understanding of the New Testament, this writer overlooks, in a way which leads to the most frightful Antinomian consequences. I have only time here to indicate this, not to describe them. The passages quoted from Colossians and Galatians refer not to the Sabbath of Genesis and of the Decalogue, but only to the ceremonial fasts and festivals of the Jews, which in the plural are often styled "sabbaths," or days of rest. This is clear from the context. The same remark applies to Rom. 14.

For if Paul's language in that chapter be taken without any limitation, as affirming that every day is to be esteemed alike by enlightened Christians, (as this writer supposes,) it goes beyond the Apostle's aim, (which is the removal of Jewish prejudices,) and strikes equally against the Christians' "Lord's day," as against the Sabbath of the Decalogue. And where, then, let me ask, is there any law or institution for public worship in the New Testament? According to this writer, there is none. The Sabbath is blotted out; the division of time into weeks is abolished; men may pursue their worldly labors without cessation; Christian worship may be maintained, interrupted, or abandoned at pleasure; and the religion of Christ, which was above all others intended to unite, fraternize, and spiritualize the human race, leaves them worse than Judaism, or even Paganism, without any law or provision whatever for the accomplishment of its magnificent design. A universal religion, like Christianity, may, and indeed must, dispense with one local center of worship, like Jerusalem, (John 4: 21—24,) but it cannot therefore dispense with stated times, sacred to social repose, instruction, and devotion.

With the writer's arguments I have now done. I agree with him, that every man should have liberty of conscience. But his defense of the course of Mayor Gilpin, I think, must be made on other grounds. Conscience is a very sacred thing; but if it is not true to the Law of God, it is no better than a false chronometer. J. N. B.

The following vivid lyric, says the Christian Mirror, is the production of a lady who is an inmate of the Insane Asylum at Augusta. It was a little past the appropriate season when the piece came to hand, but this will not detract from its essential merit.

THE DYING YEAR.

31ST DEC., 1850—AT MIDNIGHT.

Look—see the stars
Through the thick darkness blinking,
And the pale crescent moon
In her watery bed sinking;
Close on her path—around her, above her,
The broad black wings of the Storm Spirit hover.

Hark! 'tis his voice,
'Tis the Storm Spirit calls
His fugitive winds
From their ice-covered halls;
I know they are roused from their secret lair
By the swell of the wave, and the rush in the air.

List!—a low wail
Through the silent air breaking,
Loud swells the strain
The full chorus waking:
They are singing a requiem, sad and wild,
For the dying year, and his last wan child.

Low at full length
Lays the patriarch year,
Upon hemlock couch,
His pale daughter near;
Clasp'd are her hands, her dull eyes on her sire
Are fix'd, for she knows they together must expire.

Adieu, Old Year!
Thy last moments are dreary,
Low lies thy head,
And thy limbs stiff and weary;
Shadowy hands wait to bear thee away,
To Oblivion's cave, where thy brothers lay.

Twelve strikes the bell:—
Lo, deep shadows fall
On the mountain and glen,
Like the shade of a pall;
Loud swells the requiem, sad and wild,
The OLD YEAR'S DEAD, and his last wan child. E. E.

DEATH OF HOWARD THE PHILANTHROPIST.

From "John Howard and the Prison World of Europe."

On the 5th of July, 1789, Howard quitted England to return no more. Arriving at Amsterdam on the 7th, he proceeded by slow stages through Germany and Prussia into the empire of the Czar, which he entered at Riga. He was destined never more to quit the soil of Russia. The tremendous destruction of human life to which the military system of that country gives rise, had not then, as it has since, become a recognized fact in Western Europe; and the unconceived and inconceivable miseries to which Howard found recruits and soldiers exposed in Moscow, induced him to devote his attention to them and to their cause. In these investigations horrors turned up of which he had never dreamed, and impressed him still more profoundly with a sense of the hollowness of the Russian pretense of civilization. In the forced marches of recruits to the armies over horrid roads, being ill-clothed and worse fed, he found that thousands fell sick by the way, dropped at the roadside, and were either left there to die of starvation, or transferred to miserable hospitals, where fever soon finished what fatigue had begun. This waste of life was quite systematic. An hospital for the reception of the poor wretches had recently been erected at Krementschuk, a town on the Dnieper, which contained at that time 400 patients in its unwholesome wards. Thither Howard repaired to prosecute his new inquiries. The rooms he found much too full; many of the soldiers were dreadfully ill of the scurvy, yet they were all dieted alike, on sour bread and still sourer quas, alternated with a sort of water-gruel, which, if not eaten one day, was served up again the next. From this place, Howard went down the Dnieper to Cherson, where he examined all the prisons and hospitals, and made various excursions in the neighborhood for the same purpose. The hospitals were worthy of the evil which they were designed to alleviate. Our countryman thus sums up his observations upon them: "The primary objects in all hospitals seem here neglected—namely, cleanliness, air, diet, separation, and attention. These are such essentials, that humanity and good policy equally demand that no expense should be spared to procure them. Care in this respect, I am persuaded, would save many more lives than the parade of medicines in the adjoining apothecary's shop."

The reader will recall to mind, that, at the time of Howard's residence at Cherson, a desperate war was raging between the Sultan and the Autocrat. The strong fortress of Bender had just fallen into the power of Russia, but as the winter was already too far advanced to allow the army to push forward until spring, the commander of the imperial forces gave permission to such of his officers as chose to go and spend the Christmas with their friends in Cherson. That city was consequently crowded with rank and fashion. All the city was in high spirits. The victories of the imperial troops produced a general state of jubilation. Rejoicing was the order of the day, and dancing and revelry the business of the night. But in the midst of these festivities, a virulent and infectious fever broke out—brought, as Howard believed, by the military from the camp. One of the sufferers from this disorder was a young lady who resided about twenty-four miles from Cherson, but who had been a constant attendant at the recent balls and routs. Her fever very soon assumed an alarming form; and as a last resource her friends waited upon Howard—whose reputation as a leech was still on the increase—and implored him to ride over and see her. At first he refused, on the ground that he was only a physician to the poor; but their importunities increasing, and reports arriving that she was getting worse and worse, he at length acceded to their wish—being also pressed thereto by his intimate friend, Admiral Mordvinoff, chief admiral of the Black Sea fleet—and went with them. He prescribed for the lady's case; and then, leaving word that if she improved they must send to him again, but if she did not, it would be useless, went to make some visits to the sick of an hospital in the neighborhood. The lady gradually improved under the change of treatment, and in a day or two a letter was written to Howard to acquaint him with the circumstance, and requesting him to come again without delay. Very unfortunately this letter miscarried, and was not delivered for eight days—when it was brought to him at Mordvinoff's house. When he noticed the date, Howard was greatly alarmed—for he had become interested in the case of his fair patient, and thought himself in a manner responsible for any mishap which might have befallen her. Although, when the note came to hand, it was a cold, wintry, tempestuous night, with the rain falling in torrents, he did not hesitate for a moment about setting off for her residence. Unfortunately, again, no post-horses could be had at the time; and he was compelled to mount a dray-horse used in the admiral's family for carrying water, whose slow pace protracted the journey until he was saturated with wet and benumbed with cold. He arrived, too, to find his patient dying; yet, not willing to see her expire without a struggle to save her, he administered some medicines to excite perspiration, and remained for some hours at her side to watch the first signs of the effect produced. After a time, he thought the dose was beginning to operate, and, wishing to avoid exposing her to the chance of a fresh cold by uncovering her arms, placed his hand under the coverlet to feel her pulse. On raising it up a little, a most offensive smell escaped from beneath the clothes, and Howard always thought the infection was then communicated to him. Next day she died.

For a day or two, Howard remained unconscious of his danger; feeling only a slight indisposition, easily accounted for by his recent exertions; which he nevertheless so far humored as to keep within doors; until, finding himself one day rather better than usual, he went out to dine with Admiral Mordvinoff. There was a large, animated party present, and he staid later than was usual with him. On reaching his lodgings he felt unwell, and fancied he was about to have an attack of gout. Taking a dose of sal volatile in a little tea, he went to bed. About four in the morning he awoke, and feeling no better, took another dose. During the day he grew worse, and found himself unable to take his customary exercise; toward night a violent fever seized him, and he had recourse to a favorite medicine of that period, called "James' Powders." On the 12th of January, he fell down suddenly in a fit—his face was flushed and black, his breathing difficult, his eyes closed firmly, and he remained quite insensible for half an hour. From that day he became weaker and weaker; though few even then suspected that his end was near. Acting as his own physician, he continued at intervals to take his favorite powders; notwithstanding which his friends at Cherson—for he was universally loved and respected in that city, though his residence had been so short—soon surrounded him with the highest medical skill which the province supplied. As soon as his illness became known, Prince Potemkin, the princely and unprincipled favorite of Catherine, then resident in Cherson, sent his own physician to attend him; and no effort was spared to preserve a life so valuable to the world. Still he went worse and worse.

On the 17th, that alarming fit recurred; and although, as on the former occasion, the state of complete insensibility lasted only a short time, it evidently affected his brain—and from that moment the gravity of his peril was understood by himself, if not by those about him. On the 18th, he went worse rapidly. A violent hiccuping came on, attended with considerable pain, which continued until the middle of the following day, when it was allayed by means of copious musk drafts.

Early on the morning of the 20th, came to see him his most intimate friend, Admiral Priestman—a Russianized Englishman in the service of the empress. During his sojourn at Cherson, Howard had been in the habit of almost daily intercourse with his gallant ex-countryman. When taken ill, not himself considering it at first serious, no notice of it had been sent out; but not seeing his friend for several days, Priestman began to feel uneasy, and went off to his lodgings to learn the cause. He found Howard sitting at a small stove in his bedroom—the winter was excessively severe—and very weak and low. The admiral thought him merely laboring under a temporary depression of spirits, and by lively, rattling conversation endeavored to rouse him from his torpidity. But Howard was fully conscious that death was nigh. He knew now that he was not to die in Egypt; and, in spite of his friend's cheerfulness, his mind still reverted to the solemn thought of his approaching end. Priestman told him not to give way to such gloomy fancies, and they would soon leave him. "Priestman," said Howard in his mild and serious voice, "you style this a dull conversation, and endeavor to divert my mind from dwelling on the thought of death; but I entertain very different sentiments. Death has no terrors for me; it is an event I always look to with cheerfulness, if not with pleasure; and be assured, the subject is more grateful to me than any other." And then he went on to say—"I am well aware that I have but a short time to live; my mode of life has rendered it impossible that I should get rid of this fever. If I had lived as you do, eating heartily of animal food and drinking wine, I might, perhaps, by altering my diet, have been able to subdue it. But how can such a man as I am lower his diet, who has been accustomed for years to live upon vegetables and water, a little bread, and a little tea? I have no method of lowering my nourishment—and therefore I must die;" and then, turning to his friend, added, smiling—"It is only such jolly fellows as you, Priestman, who get over these fevers." This melancholy pleasantry was more than the gallant sailor could bear; he turned away to conceal his emotion; his heart was full, and he remained silent, while Howard, with no despondency in his tone, but with a calm and settled serenity of manner, as if the death-pangs were already past, went on to speak of his end, and of his wishes as to his funeral. "There is a spot," said he, "near the village of Dauphiney—this would suit me nicely; you know it well, for I have often said that I should like to be buried there; and let me beg of you, as you value your old friend, not to suffer any pomp to be used at my funeral; nor let any monument nor monumental inscription whatsoever be made to mark where I am laid; but lay me quietly in the earth, place a sun-dial over my grave, and let me be forgotten."

In this strain of true Christian philosophy did Howard speak of his exit from a world in which he felt that he had done his work. The ground in which he had selected to fix his everlasting rest, situated about two miles from Cherson, on the edge of the great highway to St. Nicholas, belonged to a French gentleman who had treated him with distinguished attention and kindness during his stay in the vicinity; and, having made his choice, he was very anxious to know whether permission could be obtained for the purpose, and begged his gallant friend to set off immediately and ascertain that for him. Priestman was not very willing to leave his friend at such a time and on such a gloomy errand; he fancied people would think him crazy in asking permission to make a grave for a man still alive, and whom few as yet knew to be ill; but the earnestness of the dying martyr at length overcame his reluctance, and he set forth.

Scarcely had he departed on his strange mission, when a letter arrived from England, written by a gentleman who had just been down to Leicester to see young Howard, giving a highly favorable account of the progress of his recovery, and expressing a belief that, when the philanthropist returned to his native land, he would find his son greatly improved. This intelligence came to the death-bed of the pious Christian like a ray of light from heaven. His eye brightened; a heavy load seemed lifted from his heart; and he spoke of his child with the tenderness and affection of a mother. He called Thomasson to his bedside, and bade him tell his son, when he went home, how long and how fervently he had prayed for his recovery, and especially during this last illness.

Toward evening, Admiral Priestman returned from a successful application; with this result Howard appeared highly gratified, and soon after his arrival retired to rest. Priestman, conscious now of the imminency of the danger, would leave him alone no more, but resolutely remained, and sat at the bedside. Although still sensible, Howard had now become too weak to converse. After a long silence, during which he seemed lost in profound meditation, he recovered for a moment his presence of mind, and taking the letter which had just before come to hand—evidently the subject of his thoughts—out of his bosom, he gave it to the admiral to read; and when the latter had glanced it through, said tenderly: "Is not this comfort for a dying father?" These were almost the last words he uttered. Soon after, he fell into a state of unconsciousness, the calm of sleep, of an unbroken rest—but even then the insensibility was more apparent than real, for, on Admiral Mordvinoff, who arrived just in time to see the last of his illustrious friend, asking permission to send for a certain doctor, in whom he had great faith, the patient gave a sign which implied consent; but before this person could arrive he had fallen off. Howard was dead!

HONOR OLD AGE.

There were once assembled, in Doctor Michael Schuppach's laboratory, a great many distinguished persons, some to consult him, and some out of curiosity. Among them were many French ladies and gentlemen, and a Russian prince, with his daughter, whose singular beauty attracted general attention. A young French Marquis attempted, for the amusement of the ladies, to display his wit on the miraculous doctor; but the latter, though not acquainted with the French language, answered so cleverly that the Marquis had not the laugh on his side. During the conversation, there entered an old peasant, meanly dressed, with a snow-white beard, a neighbor of Schuppach's. The doctor directly turned away from his great company to his old neighbor, and hearing that his wife was ill, set about preparing the medicine for her, without paying much attention to his more exalted guests, whose business he did not think so pressing. The Marquis was now deprived of one subject of his wit, and therefore chose to turn his jokes against the old man, who was waiting while his neighbor, Michael, was preparing something for his old Mary. After many silly observations upon his long white beard, he offered a wager of twelve louis d'or, that none of the ladies would kiss the old fellow. The Russian Princess, hearing these words, made a sign to her attendant, who brought her a salver. The Princess put twelve louis d'or on it, and had it carried to the Marquis, who, of course, could not decline to add twelve others. Then the fair Russian went up to the old peasant, and said, "Permit me, venerable father, to salute you after the fashion of my country." Saying this, she embraced him, and gave him a kiss. She then presented him with the gold which was on the salver, with these words: "Take this as a remembrancer of me, and as a proof that the Russian girls think it their duty to honor old age."

THE NEGLECTED BIBLE.

John Howe, in a sermon on the divine authority of the Holy Scriptures, thus proceeds:—

And a little to enforce all this, it may not be altogether useless, nay, I think it may be worth our while, to tell you a short passage which was not long ago told me by a person, (whose name is well known in London, and I hope savory in it yet, Dr. Thomas Goodwin,) at such time as he was president of Magdalen College in Oxford. There I had the passage from him. He told me, that being himself in the time of his youth a student at Cambridge, and having heard much of Mr. Rogers, of Dedham, in Essex, purposely he took a journey from Cambridge to Dedham, to hear him preach on his lecture day—a lecture then so strangely thronged and frequented, that to those who came not very early there was no possibility of getting room in that very spacious large church. Mr. Rogers was, as he told me, at the time he heard him, on the subject of discourse which hath been for some time the subject of mine, the Scriptures. And in that sermon he falls into an expostulation with the people about their neglect of the Bible; (I am afraid it is more neglected in our days;) he personates God to the people, telling them: "Well! I have trusted you so long with my Bible; you have slighted it; it lies in such and such houses all covered with cobwebs; you care not to look into it. Do you use my Bible so? Well! you shall have my Bible no longer."

And he takes up the Bible from its cushion, and seems as if he were going away with it, and carrying it from them; but immediately turns again, and personating the people to God, falls down on his knees, cries and pleads most earnestly, "Lord! whatsoever thou dost to us, take not thy Bible from us. Kill our children, burn our houses, destroy our goods; only spare us thy Bible, only take not away thy Bible."

And then he personates God again to the people: "Say you so? Well! I will try you a while longer; and here is my Bible for you; I will see how you will use it, whether you will love it more, whether you will value it more, whether you will observe it more, whether you will practice it more, and live more according to it."

By these actions, as the doctor told me, he put all the congregation into so strange a posture as he never saw any congregation in his life. The place was a mere "Bochim," the people generally, as it were, deluged in their own tears; and he told me himself, when he got out, and was to take his horse again to be gone, he was fain to hang a quarter of an hour upon the neck of his horse weeping, before he had the power to mount; so strange an impression was there upon him, and generally upon the people, upon having been thus expostulated with for the neglect of the Bible.

FIRST IDEA OF THE ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH.

Since the success of the Magnetic Telegraph, various claimants have come forward to contest the honor of the discovery of the original idea. By a paragraph in the London Philosophical Journal, translated from a German work by Schwenter, and published in 1636, it will appear that the crude idea of the Electric Telegraph was entertained previous even to that date, for Schwenter himself quotes from a previous author:—

"How two people might communicate with each other at a distance by means of a Magnetic Needle: If Claudius were at Paris and Johannes at Rome, and one wished to carry some information to the other, each must be provided with a Magnetic Needle so strongly touched with the Magnet, that it may be able to move the other, from Rome to Paris. Now, suppose that Johannes and Claudius have each a compass divided into an alphabet according to the number of the letters, and always communicated with each other at 6 o'clock in the evening; then, (after the needle had turned 3½ times from the sign which Claudius had given to Johannes,) if Claudius wished to say to Johannes, 'Come to me,' he might make his needle stand still, or move till it come to C, then to O, then to M, and so forth. If, now, the needle of Johannes' compass moved at the same time to the same letters, he could easily write down the words of Claudius and understand his meaning. This is a pretty invention; but I do not believe that a magnet of such power could be found in the world."

HERE MY MOTHER KNELT WITH ME.

The Rev. Mr. Knill, well known to the religious world in connection with Russia, was the child of a pious mother. Among his letters he gives the following interesting reminiscence:—

"After spending a large portion of my life in foreign lands, I returned again to visit my native village. Both of my parents died while I was in Russia, and their house is now occupied by my brother. The furniture remains just the same as when I was a boy, and at night I was accommodated with the same bed in which I had often slept before; but my busy thoughts would not let me sleep. I was thinking how God had led me through the journey of life. At last the light of the morning darted through the little window, and then my eye caught the spot where my sainted mother, forty years before, took my hand and said, 'Come, my dear, kneel down with me, and I will go to prayer.' This completely overcame me. I seemed to hear the very tones of her voice. I recollected some of her expressions, and I burst into tears, and arose from my bed, and fell upon my knees, just on the spot where my mother kneeled, and I thanked God that I had once a praying mother. And oh! if every parent could feel what I felt then, I am sure they would pray with their children as well as for them."

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, February 13, 1851.

"OBLIGATION OF THE SABBATH."

We commence this week the publication of a Sabbath Discussion, which appears to have grown out of the Philadelphia Mayor's practice of holding courts on Sunday morning. We take it from the Christian Chronicle. The disputants are unknown to us, but the Lord of the Sabbath has his eye upon them; and our most fervent prayer is, that He will guide each of them into the way of truth more perfectly. We consider it our duty not to let the discussion pass without some strictures of our own.

The remark of "J. N. B.," that the Decalogue "makes no designation of the day; it fixes only the proportion of time," is one which no man of common discernment would make, if he had ever undertaken a critical analysis of the Fourth Commandment. His opponent answers him very well, as far as his own principles will allow him to do; but being restricted by them from dating the Sabbath any farther back than the giving of the Manna, (Exod. 16,) he fails to do it effectually. What is it, which the Fourth Commandment requires us to keep holy? A certain day, which is called "the rest day." But whose rest day? The commandment plainly tells us whose: "The rest of the Lord thy God;" meaning the rest which the Lord thy God observed. Whatever day it was, therefore, which Jehovah himself observed as a rest day, that is the one which the Fourth Commandment tells us to remember. That is the one which it requires us to keep holy in its weekly returns. That is the one in which we are commanded to do no work. For that, and that only, is the one which God blessed and sanctified. But "J. N. B." appears to labor under the mistake, that the rest day of the Fourth Commandment is not necessarily that particular day which God himself observed as a rest, but simply any day of the septenary cycle which may be designated, by miracle or otherwise, as our rest day. According to his doctrine, therefore, the Israelites were required to remember and keep holy, not Jehovah's rest day, but one which Jehovah, by the giving of the Manna, designated to them as their rest day. By the same rule, the Fourth Commandment requires Christians to observe some one day of the septenary cycle, which by miracle—the resurrection of the Saviour—shall be designated to them as their rest day. Thus the fictitious distinctions of "Jewish Sabbath" and "Christian Sabbath" are made out without any difficulty. But O how God's Word is tortured to make out this doctrine! In all the spirit of brotherly love, we entreat "J. N. B." to review his position once more.

Jehovah did not designate the seventh day to the Israelites as their Sabbath. It was his own Sabbath which he enjoined upon them to commemorate. And we invite "J. N. B.'s" particular attention to the fact, that God always speaks of the weekly Sabbath as his own, while those monthly and annual seasons of rest, which He had not himself first kept, but were simply appointed to them, are designated as theirs. Of the weekly Sabbath, thus: "The Sabbath of the Lord thy God." Exod. 20: 10. "My Sabbaths shall ye keep." Exod. 31: 13. "The eunuchs that keep my Sabbaths." Isa. 56: 4. "My holy day." Isa. 58: 13. But of the ceremonial, thus: "Ye shall celebrate your Sabbaths." Lev. 23: 32. "The land shall enjoy her Sabbaths, because it did not rest in your Sabbaths." Lev. 26: 34, 35. The Sabbaths of the Passover, of the feast of First Fruits, of the feast of Trumpets, and of the great day of Atonement, are expressly distinguished from "the Sabbath of the Lord." Lev. 23: 3, 37, 38. "I will cause to cease her Sabbaths." Hos. 2: 11 The Jews still observe the weekly Sabbath. But the only foundation for this important distinction, lies in the fact that the weekly Sabbath is one which God himself had observed, while the others He had not.

We now ask "J. N. B." which day of the week was Jehovah's rest day. He knows very well, that it was the seventh—the last day of the first week of time. He knows very well, that that was the day on which God ceased from his labors; and that that, and that only, was the day upon which God put his blessing. This is a historical fact. And with this "fixed fact," attested to the Israelites anew by the falling of the Manna, and standing out in bold relief from the inspired history committed to their care, how puerile the remark, that "from the Decalogue alone no man could determine when the week should begin or end." To which we reëcho the apt reply of his antagonist, "Most profound and undisputed truth!" He might as well say, that the great feast of Expiation was not necessarily on the tenth day of the month Tisri, because from the law enjoining the feast alone no one could tell when the month should begin or end; or, that the commandment enjoining him to honor his father and mother, did not require him to honor this man and this woman in particular, because from the Decalogue alone no one could tell who his father or mother was.

If, then, it was his own Sabbath—the rest which He himself has kept—which Jehovah commanded the Israelites to remember, and keep holy in its weekly returns, the idea of "J. N. B." that "the decalogue knows nothing of Saturday," is manifestly false. It does enjoin the Saturday—though not as Saturday—and nothing else. If we are under the same law to Christ, Saturday, and not Sunday, is the Christian's Sabbath. The idea of a sabbatic institution, apart from the day sanctified and blessed, is a theological chimera. At the close of his creative operations, God blessed the day, not the rest. There is no other sabbatic institution, except what grows out of, or is the result of, the blessing put upon the seventh day; so that if the blessing upon that day be revoked, the institution has no farther existence. In fact, the term Sabbath, as used in the fourth commandment, is not the name of an institution at all; it means nothing more nor less than rest. It is a Hebrew term anglicized. Substitute for it the term rest, at the same time translating the commandment according to the definite accuracy of the original, and this hallucination of Puritanism, that the Decalogue "fixes only the proportion of time," will be at once dispelled. "Remember the day of the Rest [the day which Jehovah observed as such] to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work; but day the seventh is the Rest of the Lord thy God [the rest which he observed;] in it thou shalt not do any work, &c.; for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea and all that in them is, and rested on day the seventh, [a fact attested in Gen. 2: 3;] wherefore the Lord blessed the day of the Rest, and sanctified it." Can any sane man read this, and say that the Decalogue "makes no designation of the day?"

What "J. N. B." means by saying that "in Eden the first Sabbath kept by man was the first day after his own creation," is not very obvious; but from the connection in which he introduces it, it would seem that he intended it as a sort of insinuation, that it was not the seventh day of the week. The fact that Adam had not yet been in existence a week, and that it was to him but the first of a period of seven days, is nothing to the purpose. The week had certainly been six days in continuance, and it was therefore the seventh day of the week, though to him but the first of his own existence. No doubt many a man could be found now-a-days, who first drew the breath of life some time between Friday night and Saturday morning, so that the Saturday was the first day of his existence. But no good almanac maker ever thought, on that account, that it was any thing else than the seventh day of the week.

The remark of "J. N. B." that, on the supposition that the Sabbath is blotted out, "there is no law or institution for public worship in the New Testament; that men may pursue their worldly labor without cessation; Christian worship may be maintained, interrupted, or abandoned, at pleasure; and that the religion of Christ, which was above all others intended to unite, fraternize, and spiritualize the human race, leaves them worse than Judaism, or even Paganism, without any law or provision whatever for the accomplishment of its magnificent design"—is one which deserves the solemn consideration of those who array themselves against this holy institution. But "J. N. B.," who, for the life of him, cannot put his finger upon the law which says, 'Remember the first day of the week to keep it holy,' should first take the mote out of his own eye. "Where no law is, there is no transgression."

We shall continue our strictures next week.

BIOGRAPHY.

Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime,
And, departing, leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time;

Footprints, that perhaps another,
Sailing o'er life's solemn main,
A forlorn and shipwrecked brother,
Seeing, shall take heart again. [Longfellow.

Biography, the personal history of life and character, is an interesting and instructive branch of literature. It gives us an account of those who have traveled before us the journey of life. It is the best substitute we can have for the personal presence of the great and good who have passed from the earth. Their deeds and experience are here recorded for our perusal and pattern. Biography gives us practical representations of virtues and vices. In it we see the mainspring, the acting forces, in the development of society, laws, customs and governments. The moving, controlling spirits of society, are here revealed to us in their every day, working garb. It informs us how they have, from small beginnings, struggled up through difficulties, to high stations, and commanding influence. The intellectual and moral lights that have shone in different periods of the world's history, are thus perpetuated, and become so many ever-burning lamps to guide our feet.

In order to have a goodly influence, biography should be of the right kind, with a right subject. It should be of the greatly good—not of the greatly mean. It should be of those characters that attract to goodness and greatness—not of those the influence of whose polluting examples can be warded off only by the experienced, the purified in thought, the established in virtue.

> Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
> As, to be dreaded, needs but to be seen;
> But, seen too oft, familiar with her face,
> We first endure, then pity, then embrace."

Vicious associations and contemplations become doubly seductive when connected with and supported by the example of a great name. The biography that tells only or mostly of outward circumstances, accidental distinctions, the pomp and splendor of office and station, or of whatever pertains to the outward man, is not the kind that is most needed. We need the biography that gives the inward workings of mind—the processes of thought—the influence of emotions and passions—the power of will, perseverance, and unity of purpose—the force of high and holy aims. Who has not felt the difference between the biography that treats only of dry outward facts and that which lets us into the inner life of the individual? We want biographies that will spread out before us, like a map, the intellectual and moral excellencies of their subjects; that will open to us their hearts; that will permit us to walk arm in arm, talk face to face with them, breathe the same air which they breathed, feel the same rays of light and heat which warmed and cheered them.

Who can estimate the influence, the value, of the right kind of biographies of the social, political, intellectual and moral lights of the world? Such individuals have put in practice various abstract truths which lie scattered throughout natural and revealed religion—have reduced them to a concrete form. We see one excelling in patience, another in justice, another in temperance, and still another in benevolence, while, perhaps, now and then one seems to shine forth with all of the graces combined. On reading the lives of such, who does not feel the varied emotions, passions, and aspirations, portrayed therein, kindling in his own breast, a longing after like excellencies? Similar, to a great extent, is the influence upon the mind in reading the portraiture of the characters of the mean, the wicked, unless there is care, on the part of the biographer so to unfold the deformities of character as to create abhorrence, and the reader is constantly on his guard, and reads with a like object. How few ever read the life of a Napoleon, a Cæsar, or an Alexander, without having insensibly infused into their spirits an influence that was incessantly pointing to the marshaling of armies, the conquering opposing nations, and the consequent sacking of towns, triumphal processions, and a conqueror's crown. On the other hand, who reads the life of a Washington, without feeling an impulse to pattern after his inflexible virtues, without imbibing somewhat of the love of liberty, the devotion to country, that characterized his life? Who reads the life of a Howard, without feeling his heart softening and expanding, taking in and desiring the relief of all the objects of misery and crime? Who reads of a Luther or a Melancthon, without exclaiming as he reads, "I, too, will be a reformer!" Who reads of a Burritt, without feeling his soul vibrate in harmony with a universal brotherhood? What young man reads of some intellectual youth, who with nightly vigils pored in deep cogitations over the page of science or ancient lore, his eagle eye of youthful hope intently fixed on fame's cloud-capped summit, far beyond the reach of mortal ken, unaided by science's telescopic vision, without feeling the kindlings of a kindred ambition? Who reads the precious biographical sketches contained in the Bible, without frequent aspirations after a conformity of life to the great models of moral and religious excellence—the Prophets and Apostles—and, above all, after a conformity of life to the one great model—the model which we may always approach, but never reach—Jesus Christ, our Savior?

Biography is eminently calculated to enlist our feelings and call out our sympathies. Instructive truths are revealed to us, not as mere abstractions, but clothed with humanity. It thus easily operates upon our sensibility, awakening passions, causing us to like or dislike, love or hate. It affects us, not so much because its subjects are rich or poor, white or black, tall or short, as because it represents them as thinking and feeling, willing and suffering—as noble or ignoble, virtuous or vicious. It is life acting upon life, becoming, thus, a powerful auxiliary in the development of character.

Such being their influence, proper, well-written biographies should evidently claim a corresponding attention in all of our reading—should occupy a prominent place in all of our libraries—should take the place of the light, trashy literature of the day. The wise, the great, and the good, should be thus permitted to greet us in our quiet hours, permitted to accompany us all along the journey of life, and strew our pathway with the rich gems of wisdom, gathered from long experience. We should heed their counsels, heed their warnings, as they point to the rocks, shoals, and quicksands of life. We should mark well the eminence which they have attained for us in the world's progress, and the responsibilities resting upon us to advance ourselves and the world to a still higher and brighter destiny. Temperance in Rhode Island.—The State Temperance Society of Rhode Island held its annual meeting at Providence last week. The good cause seems to be flourishing in that little State. Among the encouraging things brought forward at the meeting, were the following statistics:—

Decrease of the quantity of liquor used, according to a computation made on the most reliable data to be ascertained, was reported as follows:—

S. Kingstown,	15-16	money annually saved	$20,000

PLAN OF EMANCIPATION.

Among the plans which have been devised for the purpose of meeting the great difficulties which surround this question, says the Colonization Herald, Hon. David Sears proposes that the proceeds of the public lands shall be used for the extinction of Slavery, and that all children born after a certain period be free. In one of Mr. Sears' late communications on the subject of emancipation, he says:—

"The last Census of the United States gave 420,000 as the number of female slaves under 10 years of age, and 390,000 as the number of female slaves between the ages of 10 and 20 years. The plan proposed contemplates the purchase of one or both of these classes at a price to be agreed on. It is estimated that, at their present average value, they could be bought and emancipated at a cost much less than the expense of the last war with Great Britain, and less than the cost of the late war in Mexico."

1. Congress to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of public lands to the extinction of slavery.
2. Commissioners to be appointed by Congress to negotiate with the Legislatures of the Slave States, for the purchase of female slaves under ten years of age, and also, if necessary, female slaves under twenty years of age, and with instruction to close a contract with any one of said States which may agree to accept the terms of their commission. The money to be paid to the States, and to be by them apportioned.
3. Female slaves so purchased are to be free; and their issue are to be free.
4. All children born after 18— are to be free, within the State so contracting.

IMPORTANT PEACE MOVEMENT.

In the Senate of the United States, on the 5th inst., Mr. Foote, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, in response to a petition from the American Peace Society, and several hundred other petitions from various and widely distant parts of the country, reported the following preamble and resolution, which, if adopted by Congress, as there is every reason to think it will be, cannot fail to have an important and favorable influence upon the diplomacy of this nation, and of every other nation on the face of the earth:—

Whereas, Appeals to the sword for the determination of national controversies are always productive of immense evils; and, whereas, the spirit and enterprise of the age, but more especially the genius of our own Government, the habits of our people, and the highest permanent prosperity of our Republic, as well as the claims of humanity and the precepts of our holy religion, all require the adoption of every feasible measure consistent with the national honor and the security of our rights to prevent, as far as possible, the recurrence of war hereafter: Therefore,

Resolved, That, in the judgment of this body, it would be proper and desirable for the Government of the United States, whenever practicable, to secure, in its treaties with other nations, a provision for referring to the decision of umpires all future misunderstandings that cannot be satisfactorily adjusted by amicable negotiation in the first instance, before a resort to hostilities shall be had.

DISPERSION OF COLORED CHURCHES.

The Evening Post says that the Baptist Colored Church at Buffalo has suffered a large diminution of its members in consequence of the Fugitive Slave Law. One hundred and thirty of the communicants, as we are informed by the pastor, left the place from fear of arrest on the charge of being fugitive slaves, and have passed over to Canada. The Methodist Church, in the same place, has also lost a considerable number of its members from the same cause. There is said to be among these more disposition to make a stand and to evade or resist the law than among their Baptist brethren. Somebody had advised them to arm themselves and defend their liberty. The Baptist pastor, however, told his people that he found in the Gospel examples which justified running away, but no examples which warranted fighting. The Colored Baptist Church at Rochester, which formerly numbered one hundred and fourteen communicants, has lost them all except two, since the passage of the Fugitive Slave Law. The pastor, a native Kentuckian, was the first to flee, and the whole flock followed him. The Colored Baptist Church at Detroit has lost eighty-four of its members from the same cause. They abandon their homes and their occupations, sell such property as they cannot conveniently carry with them, and seek refuge in Canada. Meantime the number of persons escaping from their masters does not seem to be essentially lessened by the provisions of the Fugitive Slave Law. Since it was passed, we are informed, from the same source which furnishes us with the particulars already given, eighty-seven fugitive slaves from the South have passed through Buffalo, on their way to Canada.

Labors of Baptist Noel.—The English Baptist Reporter says that Rev. Baptist W. Noel has baptized 156 persons since he has been the pastor of the John Street Church, London. Among them has been one barrister-at-law, one lieutenant of the navy, one cripple, one half deaf and dumb, and five Sunday-School teachers. Others are now waiting for immersion. Half of this number are supposed to be from the Church of England.

Temperance Convention.—Wednesday, the 26th day of February inst., is fixed upon for a State Convention by the Political Temperance men of Connecticut, to "review the nominations of the different political parties, and adopt such of them as are pledged to favor the enactment of a law prohibiting the Liquor Traffic, to be submitted to the people for their sanction or rejection."

New York Free Schools.—In the Assembly of New York, on the 6th inst., Mr. T. H. Benedict, Chairman of the Committee on Schools, reported a bill to raise $800,000 by a State Tax for the support of Common Schools, and to substitute a Poll Tax for the old rate bill. It is estimated that the Poll Tax will amount to $800,000—from 75 to 90 cents per capita—which, with the $800,000 from the School Fund, will amount in the aggregate to $1,400,000. On the other side, Mr. Burroughs reported a bill, from the minority of the same Committee, proposing to raise $800,000 by a State Tax, and the $300,000 by rate-bill instead of a Poll Tax.

An Opening in Hayti.—It is said that the Commune of Donden, in Hayti, with a population of from four to six thousand, has virtually thrown off Romanism, and is prepared to receive evangelical Protestant ministers in place of the discarded priests. Rev. Arthur Waring, a gentleman who has spent several years in that commune, is now in this country, and has publicly presented the claims of that field. The American and Foreign Christian Union has in contemplation a mission to that region.

Revival at an Indian Mission.—The Christian Advocate and Journal speaks of a revival of religion in connection with the Onondaga Indian Mission. "A goodly number" are represented as having found peace in believing, and not less than forty are said to be seeking the Lord. "The Indian school is likewise in a prosperous condition, the average number being as high as forty, and the attendance quite uniform."

Revival in Indiana.—A writer in the Central Christian Herald mentions a revival at Terre Haute, Indiana, in connection with which upwards of fifty persons give evidence of having passed from death unto life. He says:—

"The work is proving its genuineness by reconciling the alienated, awakening sluggish disciples, and reclaiming the backslider—and especially by transforming hardened and impenitent men into humble followers of the meek and lowly Jesus."

Temperance in Illinois.—A bill has passed the Illinois House of Representatives, which prohibits the sale of intoxicating liquors in quatities less than one quart, unless sold by druggists and physicians, in good faith, for mechanical, medicinal, or sacramental purposes. If sold to an adult, the fine is $25 for every breach of the law, and if to a minor under the age of eighteen years, the penalty is not less than $30 or more than $100. The act also repeals all former laws upon the subject, and completely destroys the license system.

A Melancholy Case.—The Wilmington (Delaware) Gazette states that Professor Ansley, a young man of fine acquirements, whose classical attainments are well attested in a work entitled "Elements of Literature, or an Introduction to the Study of Rhetoric and Belles Lettres," published in 1849, by Lippincott & Co., of Philadelphia, died in that city on Monday last, after being found in an almost frozen condition, in an old hovel, with a bottle of whisky by his side. He recently held the position of Professor in St. Mary's College at Wilmington, from which he was removed on account of his inebriate habits. He continued, however, his course of dissipation, until he was reduced to a condition of utter destitution—houseless and homeless, friendless and penniless—he was driven to the extreme of starvation, wandering about, seeking shelter wherever chance directed him.

Mormons on Beaver Island.—By the last mail from Mackinac, says the Detroit Tribune of January 30, we hear that Col. Whistler, the Commandant of the 4th Regiment on duty at this station, received a letter or statement from some person at Mackinac, sworn to before Justice O'Mally, to the effect that the Mormons on Beaver Island were a lawless, reckless band—disregarding the laws of the United Ssates—treating the flag of our country with disrespect, and raising an ensign of their own; and that it needed the interposition of the United States troops to protect the rights of our Government.

From Oregon.—The Empire City brought news from Oregon to the middle of December. The people there were in earnest about a Railroad to connect the Willamette Valley with the Columbia River, with its terminus at some point approachable by large vessels. The whole cost, it has been estimated, will not be over $500,000, and it is proposed to divide that sum into one thousand shares at $500 each. It is thought that it can be completed in twelve months. Gov. Gaines had delivered his Message to the Territorial Legislature. He advocates a liberal policy on the part of the General Government in the donation of lands to actual settlers; also liberal provisions for education. He asks the passage of a law for the protection of the Indian tribes. The General Government has appointed a Board of Commissioners to treat with the Indians for the relinquishment of their right to the soil. He advocates a revision of the taxes, and many other laws necessary and proper to promote the general prosperity of the Territory. In conclusion, he feelingly announces the death of the late President Taylor, and congratulates the Legislature on the passage of all the compromise measures of the last Congress.

South Carolina and the British Consul.—The correspondence between the Governor of South Carolina and the British Consul, has been referred to a Select Committee of the Legislature, chosen from the Charleston delegation, with the power to sit during the recess of the Legislature. It is believed that the obnoxious law for imprisoning free blacks will be abandoned, or probably modified so as to conform to an enactment in force at Wilmington, N. C., which requires all free colored persons to be on board their vessels from sunset to sunrise.

Proceedings in Congress Last Week.

SECOND-DAY, Feb. 3.

There was nothing done by either House, except to attend the funeral of Mr. Kaufman, of Texas. The exercises took place in the Hall of Representatives, and were attended by nearly all of the members of Congress, the President and Cabinet, Justices of the Supreme Court, officers of the Executive Department, &c. Mr. Gurley preached from the text, "The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death." The corpse was deposited in the Congressional burying ground.

THIRD-DAY, Feb. 4.

In the SENATE, numerous petitions were presented. Among them was one from a citizen of Missouri, setting forth that his slave was in the service of the United States Quarter Master at Fort Leavenworth, and through the negligence of the United States officers, the slave fled and was lost to the master. He asks the value of the slave from the United States; referred to Committee on Claims. Mr. Hall presented a petition from Lynn, Mass., for the repeal of the Fugitive Slave Law; also one from Danvers, Mass., asking that the petitioners be relieved from liabilities for penalties for not aiding in carrying the Fugitive Slave Law into execution. Mr. Borland presented the memorial of the Legislature of Arkansas, asking Congress to take appropriate steps towards the acquisition of Cuba. Mr. Pierce presented the memorial of the members of the Constitutional Convention of Maryland in favor of a line of steamers to Liberia. The bill in relation to the apprizal of dutiable goods, was adopted. The California Land Claim Bill occupied the remainder of the session.

In the HOUSE, the Bill to establish Branch Mints in New York and San Francisco occupied the whole day. The N. Y. Mint was voted down, and a substitute was proposed to that part of the bill relating to San Francisco, which was prefaced by stating that at the last Session provision was made for cutting the gold assayed in California into ingots of $50, $100, and $500, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury; such ingots to be received for Government dues, &c. The substitute provides penalties against counterfeiting these bars or ingots, and prescribes certain regulations in regard to them. It was adopted in Committee, and reported to the House, when a motion to lay it on the table was negatived, and the House adjourned.

FOURTH-DAY, Feb. 5.

In the SENATE, several petitions for the repeal of the Fugitive Slave Law were presented. Mr. Borland presented the joint resolutions of the Legislature of Arkansas in favor of a Military Academy like West Point in one of the South Western States. Mr. Foote, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which had been referred memorials in favor of adopting some substitute for war as a means of settlement of national difficulties, reported a resolution declaring, as the opinion of the Senate, that in all treaties of the United States, provision should be made for settling difficulties with foreign nations by arbitration before resorting to war. Joint resolutions distributing the works of Alex. Hamilton and John Adams were passed. The bill in relation to private land claims in California was taken up, and ordered engrossed.

In the HOUSE, the Mint Bill was again under consideration, and a final motion to lay it on the table passed. Several Territorial Bills were reported, and referred to Committee of the Whole. A joint resolution admitting A. W. Babbitt to a seat as a delegate from the territory of Utah, was referred to the Committee on Elections. The House then went into Committee on Territorial Business, and after a short time spent in considering the bill authorizing Oregon and Minnesota to dispose of their school lands, the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

FIFTH-DAY, Feb. 6.

In the SENATE, the Postage Reduction Bill was made a special order for Second-day. Col. Benton's bill, to give Missouri two per cent. on the proceeds of the public lands sold within her borders, was defeated—30 to 14. The bill to settle Land Claims in California was passed.

In the HOUSE, some Territorial Bills were passed, and others reported. Mr. Strong reported against the claim of Wm. S. Messervy to be received as a delegate from New Mexico—he having been elected as a Representative under a State organization. Several small bills were reported, but no subject of much interest acted upon.

SIXTH-DAY, Feb. 7.

In the SENATE, Mr. Seward presented two petions from Washington county, New York, for the repeal of the Fugitive Slave Law. Mr. Winthrop presented the credentials of Mr. Rantoul, the new Senator from Massachusetts, (who had not yet arrived at the Capital,) and vacated his seat. The Senate spent the session in discussing the question whether Mr. Winthrop is or is not entitled to hold his seat till the arrival of his successor in the Senate chamber, and adjourned without coming to a decision.

The HOUSE discussed, in Committee of the Whole, the bill to establish a Board of Accounts, to consist of three Commissioners, at a salary of $4,000 per annum.

SABBATH-DAY, Feb. 8.

In the SENATE, several anti-slavery and anti-fugitive-slave-law petitions were presented. A bill was introduced to establish a branch mint in California. The bill to enforce discipline, and promote good conduct in the navy, was brought up, and after slight amendment ordered to be engrossed. The question of Mr. Winthrop's right to a seat was farther discussed, and finally tabled. The bill granting land to Missouri for the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad, passed; also the bill to pay Oregon the expenses incurred in the Cayuse war, and a bill granting the New London Railroad Company the right of way across the Custom House lot in New London.

The HOUSE did nothing except to talk about the bill to establish a Board of Accounts.

Religious Interest in New York.—Many of the Baptist churches in this city and vicinity are now enjoying revival seasons. Every Sunday, of late, there have been more or less baptisms, and the interest seems to be increasing.

General Intelligence.

European News.

The steamer Canada, the arrival of which at Halifax we announced last week, brought European news to Jan. 18.

The English general news is unimportant, the papers being chiefly filled with the exciting topics likely to engage the early attention of Parliament. It is confidently asserted, that the Chancellor will have a surplus of no less than four millions sterling for the year. Public feeling is strongly in favor of a large reduction in taxation; and among the most prominent articles named for a reduction of tax, are the window and paper duties.

A slight sensation has been created by the recent appointment, without any previous notice, of a new Catholic Bishop for Ireland.

The Baltimore ship Franconia was wrecked off Holyhead on the 11th ult. Her cargo of tobacco, captain, chief mate, and 11 hands, were lost.

The screw steamer Nautilus, between Cork and London, was lost on Wednesday night, in a severe gale. Nine lives were lost.

London is said to be rapidly filling up with every conceivable species of adventurers for the forthcoming season.

Louis Napoleon appears to have gained, for the time being, a complete mastery over Gen. Changarnier and the National Assembly.

The French coast has been visited with a fearful gale; 60 merchant vessels put into the port of Cherbourg for safety.

The news from the Duchies is, that the Holsteiners have made an unconditional surrender to the King of Denmark, through the instrumentality of the Austrian and Prussian Commissioners.

In Germany it is confidently affirmed that a Central Power, with a large army at its command, has been resolved upon.

Accounts from Rome and the Papal States represent a growing apprehension and uneasiness among all classes.

The Risorgimento, of Turin, quotes a letter from Rome, of the 28th, stating that sanguinary quarrels constantly occur between the French and Pontificial troops, and that several of the former had but lately been killed or severely wounded in the quarters of the Borgo and Bonchi. The correspondent adds, that the mob always side with the Papal soldiers on such occasions; and that, in consequence of such occurrences, the French General has thought it prudent to abandon some secondary posts, and to concentrate his men in the vicinity of the Castle of St. Angelo.

The chief actors in the proceedings at Rome, in May, 1849, when the confessionals of the churches were burned, have received sentence; Ciceroacchion and Carbonarella have been condemned to fifteen months of forced labor.

The Chinese Repository says that the insurgents in the province of Canton gained a victory over the imperialists during the month, having decoyed a detachment into a defile in the hills between Taingyuen and Yingteh, and cut the entire body of 200 to pieces. The insurgents seem, however, to be retiring, or acting on the defensive.

Fifteen Days Later from California.

The steamship Empire City, with fifteen days later news from California, and a million of dollars worth of gold dust, arrived at New York on Sixth-day last.

Gorgona, on the Isthmus, was partially destroyed by fire on the night of Jan. 25th. The loss was not exactly ascertained. It is supposed that about 80 houses were burned.

The news from California is not important. The following summary, from Alta California, embraces all worth reporting:—

We have one gratifying item. It is the entire cessation of the cholera. At one time it threatened us amazingly, but it has passed away not only from San Francisco but also from Sacramento City, where it raged most severely for a while. We do not hear of its ravages to any extent elsewhere in the country. The health of our State is excellent.

A number of our most prominent men have died during the month.

There has been no small degree of dissatisfaction expressed on account of an opinion from the Supreme Court, which goes to vitiate almost all the land titles in this city.

Our business men have awakened to the importance of the fine field opened for whaling from this port, as the emporium. Unfortunately, the first vessel fitted out for that business, the Popmunnett, has been lost.

Reports from the mines have been rather scarce, most of those engaged on the rivers during the summer, having gone into the dry diggings, from whom a good account is anticipated next spring.

One of the heaviest gales that has been known for years, has raged on our coast and over the country. But the damage has not been very great—the most unfortunate effects of it yet known, being the loss of the British ship Mersey, at the mouth of this Bay.

Agriculture begins to take form and order, and good results are reported as attending the labors of those cultivating the soil.

The election in Sacramento resulted favorably for the Whigs. Both parties claim the Legislature.

A Case of Kidnapping.—Some time in the month of July or August last, the American schooner Jupiter, Capt. Snow, arrived at the Island of Dominique, (one of the group of the Marquesas Islands,) and remained there for several weeks. While at the Island of Dominique, the captain and mate induced five females, one of whom was the queen of the bay, and only fourteen years of age, and the others the daughters of chiefs, to go on board the schooner, by some false pretense, and, soon after they were on board, got under way, and forcibly, and against the will of the females, brought them to San Francisco. During the voyage the females were treated with great cruelty, and, after their arrival here, they were treated still worse, so much so that all of them jumped overboard, and endeavored to escape to the shore. Having been saved from drowning, they were again taken on board, and, soon after, the schooner sailed for Stockton, still retaining the females on board. The captives were afterwards taken to San Francisco, by Col. Hays, and upon being taken before the Justices of the Supreme Court, were ordered to go free. Capt. Snow and his mate, Coleman, were also arrested, and after an examination, committed for trial, for false imprisonment of the women on board the vessel, in the Bay. Bail was fixed at $8,000. Steamboat Disaster.

On Monday morning, January 27th, at 3 o'clock, the steamer John Adams, Capt. W. H. Jones, with a heavy freight and a large number of passengers, bound for Cincinnati, when near the head of island 82, struck a snag or stump, and sank in two minutes. The cabin parted from the hull, and the latter went down in about 60 feet of water. She had about 90 or 100 deck passengers, a few of whom only were saved. The cabin, in breaking from the hull, separated in the middle, which doubtless was the cause of many of the cabin passengers saving their lives. The ladies in the cabin were all saved. After suffering many hours in the water, they were enabled to get ashore at the plantation of a Mr. Carter. The forward portion of the cabin, including the fixtures, floated down to the head of Island 83, where it grounded. About 3 P. M. the "Peytona" came along and took the passengers on board from that part of the wreck, when she proceeded with all possible haste to the other portion of the wreck, where she took all on board with the exception of Captain Jones and his family, Mr. Wilson, the mate, and a few others. Owing to the time of her sinking, every one being asleep, and it being so sudden, few were able to get sufficient clothing to cover themselves, and many of them are indeed in a most destitute condition.

From Captain Shalcross and others, we make up the following summary of persons on the boat, and the number saved. The number on board was as follows:—

Cabin passengers	100
Deck "	87
Officers	11
Crew, firemen and hands	32
Total	230

The number saved, as near as can be ascertained, is as follows:—

Cabin passengers	84
Deck "	5
Officers	11
Crew, firemen and hands	7
Total	107
Lost	123

The deck passengers were Californians and German and Irish Emigrants going to Cincinnati. The cargo was also for Cincinnati.

Blowing up of a Portuguese Frigate.

The Boletine de Govorne, of Nov. 16, gives the following account of a dreadful catastrophe which occurred on the 29th of October:—

That day being the anniversary of the birth day of his majesty the King Consort, was one of national festivity. At noon, the men-of-war, gaily decorated with flags, joined with the Monte Forte in firing the customary salutes. But all these cheerful demonstrations of loyalty and joy, were in a moment changed to sadness and lamentation. At half past 2 o'clock a loud report—a sudden crash—shaking almost the whole town, drew the attention of all toward the Typa.

After a few moments of anxious gaze, on the lifting up of a dense cloud, overpowering was the sad spectacle of a burning hull in the place of that fine frigate the Donna Maria II. The ship had blown up, and but a small part of the stern, in possession of the flames, was left to indicate the spot where so shortly before she had floated in brilliancy and in apparent safety. Her destruction was complete.

The Donna Maria II. was a teak built ship, about forty years old, strong and capable of much service; but great as is her loss it is nought to the grief and pain for that of nearly the whole of her gallant crew. Of 224 men, 188 perished in the explosion, among whom were the commander, five lieutenants, one midshipman, the assistant surgeon, and the purser.

It is impossible to explain the cause of this horrible catastrophe. From the strict discipline and proper order maintained on board the frigate, carelessness at the time of firing the salute could not have caused it, more especially as the explosion did not take place until more than two hours afterward, and no signs of fire were heard of by the survivors; neither were they observed on the U. S. ship Marion, anchored close to her, nor at the Typa fort. These circumstances lead to the belief that the explosion was effected by the means of fire purposely placed in the magazine; but by whom, or how, God only knows; and it is probable that it will never be discovered.

Death of one of John Jacob Astor's Partners.—Donald McKenzie (who was born in Scotland, June 15, 1783,) died Jan. 20, at Mayville, Chautauque County, N. Y. At the age of 17 he came over to Canada and joined the North West Company, and continued 8 years with them. In 1809 he became one of the partners with the late John Jacob Astor in establishing the fur trade west of the Rocky Mountains, and in company with Mr. Hunt, of St. Louis, Mr. McK. made the overland route to the mouth of the Columbia River, a feat then rarely attempted and full of perils, and remained at Astoria until it was surrendered by McDougall to the British. After the restoration of peace, Mr. McKenzie exerted himself to secure for the United States the exclusive trade of Oregon, but after a long negotiation with Mr. Astor, and through him with Messrs. Madison, Gallatin, and other leading individuals in and out of office, the matter was abandoned, and Mr. McKenzie, in March 1821, joined the Hudson Bay Company, and was immediately appointed one of the Council and Chief Factor. In August 1825 he was married to Adelegonde Humbert (who survives him,) and was shortly after appointed Governor. At this time he resided at Fort Garry, Red River Settlement, where he continued to reside until 1832 in active and prosperous business, in which he amassed a large fortune. In August of the following year he came to reside in Maysville, where the residue of his life was spent. He leaves thirteen children surviving him by his present, and one by a former wife. [Tribune.

Another Fugitive Case in Philadelphia.—The Philadelphia Inquirer of last Sixth-day gives the particulars of the arrest of another alledged fugitive from Slavery—a colored female, who was arrested under the name of Mahala, but whose real name appears to be Tamor Williams, and who is the mother of six children, the youngest at the breast. She is alledged to be the slave of Wm. T. J. Purnell, of Worcester county, Maryland, and it is admitted by the claimant that she has been absent from him since 1829. Her children were born in Pennsylvania, and the oldest daughter appears to be about 17 years of age. Her husband is in custody of the law, and it is alleged that he is the slave of another person in the same county, who will probably claim him. Mahala was arrested in Kensington. She resided there, and her husband owned the house, in which she lived. She has been a member of the Union Methodist Church since the birth of her first child, and is apparently about forty years of age.

When five of her children, three of whom are mere infants, were brought into the room where she was sitting, large drops of perspiration stood upon her face, indicating the intense agony of mind she was suffering.

Kidnapping in Maryland.—A Baltimore letter says that a system of kidnapping has been carried on between Kent and Queen Ann's Counties, Md., and Baltimore City, for some months past. The gang were finally ferreted out, and two ringleaders, named Moffit and Price, and several auxiliaries, have been arrested, held to bail, or committed to answer for their outrages. Their plan of operations has been to catch an unwary negro boy or girl in the country, take him or her to a private house, and keep them till an opportunity was offered to bring them to Baltimore. Here no difficulty was experienced in selling them to the numerous slave dealers with whom that city is cursed, and no representation of the poor negro being heeded, their fate is sealed.

A few days since a Mr. Spear, of Kent County, had a servant girl spirited away, and as he did not believe that she had absconded, he suspected this kidnapping gang. Accordingly he came to the city, and, by the aid of an officer, in the course of a day, found his girl at the slave depot of the Messrs. Campbell, West Pratt-St. Messrs. Campbell showed a legal bill of sale made out in the names of Moffit and Price, in which it was evidenced that they had paid $425 for the girl. Of course, her master demanded and obtained her, taking her home to a somewhat better condition than pulling cotton or working sugar cane.

Guilt and Death.—A dreadful murder, and the suicide of the murderer, took place in the town of Penfield, about eight miles from Rochester, N. Y., on Sunday night, Jan. 26. The person murdered was a young lady of respectable family, named Sarah Sharpe. The murder's name was John Everett, the husband of Miss Sharpe's sister. It seems that a guilty intimacy had existed between the parties for several years. Lately a man named Charles Edwards had become intimate with Miss Sharpe, which created a jealousy on the part of Everett, who contemplated destruction. The evening of the murder, he sharpened up a jackknife, and proceeded to the residence of a Mr. Campbell, where Miss Sharpe was visiting. Edwards was also at Mr. Campbell's house. Everett lurked about the house outside, wanting to see if Edwards and Miss S. were intimate. About 8 o'clock she went out of the door, and but a minute after a scream was heard, when Campbell and Edwards went out and found Miss Sharpe's throat severed from ear to ear, and Everett in the same condition. Everett was about 40 years of aged, and Miss Sharpe about 30.

Convict Loose.—One of the convicts in the State Prison at Auburn, N. Y., recently managed to procure a citizen's dress, and dofting his own uniform, made his appearance at the outer gate, dressed in his new garb, and demanded egress. The guard did not recognize his customer. The convict had tied a handkerchief around the lower part of his face, the day being very cold, and when asked who he was, drew his neckcloth down from over his mouth, and replied that he was employed as "designer for Mr. Barber." He was allowed to proceed a few steps outside the wall, when the guard, thinking he had been deceived, hailed the man and inquired his name. The convict again removed the handkerchief and replied—"Why, don't you know me? I am designer for Mr. Barber." This answer was given so coolly and composedly that the convict was allowed to proceed without further embarrassment. It was soon discovered that although the man was not "designer" for Mr. Barber, he was "designer" for himself, and successfully accomplished his design.

Postage in Canada.—A Canada correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune says that the Governor General of Canada has received from the Colonial Secretary a dispatch, communicating the assent of the Imperial Cabinet to the Post-Office Law passed in the last session of the Legislature. The law is not proclaimed, though it is expected that it will be in a short time. The Post Office Department is now only being surrendered to the control of the local government. When the new law comes into operation, there will be a uniform three-pence (five cent) rate of postage for half ounce letters throughout the British Provinces, including Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Newfoundland, and Prince Edward's Island. Exchange newspapers between editors, hitherto charged a copper each, will go free. Papers for the United States will go free to the lines.

Eighteen Men Frozen to Death.—The Yuba City correspondent of the Pacific News, writes as follows under date of Dec. 18th:—

From the last reports from the head waters of Feather River, snow has fallen to the depth of 12 or 14 feet, and cold is so intense that eighteen out of a party of nineteen men, froze to death in one night, and sixty or seventy mules. The snow fell so rapidly that the wood was all covered, and they were obliged to burn their cabin to keep from freezing; but even that did not save them. It is known that over two hundred men remained upon the North Fork, with the determination of wintering there, and fears are now entertained that they will all perish.

SUMMARY.

The Boston Times says that a vast number of ten cent counterfeited coins have been issued from a secret mint of Connecticut. They bear the dates, respectively, of 1848, are well executed, and are passed without any difficulty. The principal feature proving their spurious character is the absence of the circle of stars around the figure of Liberty, which the genuine ten-cent pieces have. These bogus coins have been tested, and found to be a mixture of metals easily fusible, with a plating of silver.

Hon. Benj. W. Crowningshield died suddenly at Boston, on Monday of last week. He was entering the store of Messrs. Waterston, Pray & Co., in Federal street, apparently in his usual health, when he fell and instantly expired of heart disease. He was in his 80th year. Mr. Crowningshield was formerly member of Congress from Essex, South District, and was Secretary of the Navy under Madison's administration.

A man named Johnson was shot dead near the village of Belfast, N. Y., Feb. 5. He was going to a mill with a load of grain, and when within a short distance of it, he overtook an Irishman, who asked permission to ride, which was refused by Johnson. He had gone but a few rods when the Irishman fired upon him with a rifle. The ball passed through the arm of a man who was on the load with Johnson, and then through Johnson's lungs. The Irishman has been arrested.

John A. Quitman, Governor of Mississippi, resigned his office on Monday of last week, and started for New Orleans on Tuesday, to answer to the charges preferred against him relative to his connection with the Cuban Expedition. The Hon. Mr. Gwinne, President of the Senate, was inducted into office as Governor, on Wednesday the 5th, by subscribing to the Constitutional oath of office.

Mr. Barnabas Bates of New York has memorialized Congress for permission to contract with Government to carry the mails, for letters at the rate of two cents pre-paid, and newspapers, and all other mailable matter, at a corresponding reduction. This proposal is a reply to the objection taken in Congress to a two-cent rate as being below a revenue standard. The petition was referred.

Clinton Hubbard, editor of the Kane County Democrat, Ill., was found frozen to death near St. Charles, some distance from Chicago, on the 22d ult. He had been to Chicago, and, not getting upon the cars at the St. Charles junction, probably undertook to walk over the prairie, and perished in the cold. He was an exemplary young man of 25 years.

A light was displayed from the bluff of Staten Island, at Fort Tompkins, one night last week, which for brilliancy and clearness surpasses any thing of the kind ever shown in this country. It is an invention of Prof. Grant, to whom Congress appropriated $5,000 for experimental purposes. The rays of the light were thrown on Castle Garden, a distance of 8½ miles.

DIED.

In Watson, Lewis Co., N. Y., Jan. 28th, 1851, of inflammatory fever, Edward D. Wells, son of Dea. David W. and Catharine Wells, aged 17 years, 6 months, and 1 day. It is believed that he met with a change of heart when he was about ten years of age. He made no public profession then, yet his love for the religion of Christ led him to deny himself of many pleasures which overcome those of his age. In his sickness, which was painful in the extreme, he gave evidence of the power of grace in the soul—no murmuring or complaining amidst the painful struggles of nature. He died, we believe, in hope of a glorious immortality and eternal life. W. G. Q.

In Alfred, N. Y., Sept. 11th, 1851, Mr. James H. Green, in the twenty-first year of his age. The deceased died in the triumphs of faith.

Daguerrean Gallery.

GURNEY'S Daguerrean Gallery, No. 189 Broadway, has been known for years as one of the first establishments of the kind in the United States, and the oldest in the city of New York. He has recently greatly enlarged his Gallery by the addition of more rooms and large skylights, and other improvements, rendering it one of the most extensive establishments in this country. Mr. G. attends personally to his sitters, and from his great experience in the art he is enabled, at all times, to give perfect satisfaction. The large-sized pictures recently taken by his new process are universally acknowledged superior to any heretofore taken in this country. A large collection can be seen at all hours of the day. Ladies and gentlemen are respectfully invited to examine them.

Boston Olive Branch.

The 16th Volume commenced January 1st, 1851.

THIS is a national paper, more widely circulated than any other in New England, and second to none in the United States.

The Olive Branch has a larger number of learned and gifted contributors than any magazine or newspaper this side of Europe.

The Olive Branch is devoted to Christianity, Mutual Rights, Polite Literature, General Intelligence, Agriculture, and the Arts, is issued weekly on a large imperial sheet, at two dollars a year, in advance, to single subscribers. To companies of five or less, $1 50; to companies of ten, and under twenty, $1 35; to companies of twenty or more, $1 25; in all such cases the money must be paid strictly in advance. Single subscribers, if they do not pay before the expiration of six months, will be charged $2 25; at the expiration of the year, $2 50; and club subscribers $2 00, if the money is not forwarded anew at the end of the year.

Knickerbocker Magazine for 1851.

EDITED BY LEWIS GAYLORD CLARK.

IN one of the chapters of the Constitution of the State of Massachusetts, yet in force, there is a declaration, "That the encouragement of the Arts and the Sciences, and all good literature, tends to the honor of God, the advantage of the Christian religion, and the great benefit of this and the other United States of America." It has ever been the highest purpose of the Knickerbocker to elevate the standard of American Literature. It has been the medium of introducing many of our most popular authors to the public. To those who take a pride in sustaining a good American Magazine, entirely national in its character, we look for support. Men of judgment need not be told that it is impossible to get up a Magazine entirely original at the same prices at which those made up from foreign sources are sold. The unremitted efforts of the Editor and Publisher will be continued to improve the work.

SPLENDID PREMIUM TO OLD AND NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

The Publisher, grateful for the large increase of patronage which this old favorite of the reading community has received, since it passed into his hands, has determined to offer to the old patrons, and to all new subscribers, a splendid engraving recently published in this city, by Messrs. Goupil, Vibert & Co., from a painting by a well-known American artist, William S. Mount, Esq. This Print is entitled,

"MUSIC IS CONTAGIOUS."

It is 19 by 24 inches, is printed on beautiful paper, and when framed will make a valuable and elegant ornament for the drawing-room or parlor. The price of the Engraving is three dollars. It will be given to all subscribers to the Knickerbocker Magazine who pay their subscription for 1851 in advance, or during the month of January, 1851, and to all new subscribers who commence with January, 1851, and pay in advance. To entitle subscribers to the Engraving, all payments must be made to the Publisher. Subscribers who owe for more than one year will be expected to settle all arrears and pay for 1851, to entitle them to the Engraving. The bills of specie-paying banks in all parts of the country will be received in payment. The Engraving will be rolled on a stick, and so securely done up, that it can be sent to California, or any other part of the United States, with perfect safety. The number for January, 1851, will commence the thirty-seventh volume of this work.

"ST. LEDGER; OR, THE THREADS OF LIFE."

The Publisher has great pleasure in announcing to the readers of the Knickerbocker, and to the public generally, that he has effected an arrangement with Mr. Richard B. Kimball, the author of this popular and extraordinary Romance, to give the Sequel in the pages of this Magazine. The first chapter appears in the January number, and will be continued regularly until completed. This work has already passed through three editions in this country, and two in England, and has received more favorable notices from the American and English press than any work of fiction which has been issued during the last five years.

Terms—$5 per annum, in advance. All letters on business must be addressed, post-paid, to

SAMUEL HUESTON, Publisher,
139 Nassau-street, New York.

Miscellaneous.

Volcano of the Salt Lake.

A correspondent of the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser gives the following description of a volcano in the vicinity of the great Salt Lake:—

This volcano is in a plain of mud, and on the borders of the Lake. It is composed of mud, and covers several acres. Steam and water are escaping from some half-dozen apertures. The mud is raised up into cones, the highest not five feet from the general surface. They are terminated by tubes, some hardened and lined with crystals of sulphur and other substances. One of the cones throws steam and water 10 or 15 feet into the air. It escapes rapidly, and with a sound resembling the escape of steam from the pipe of a small steam engine; and it ejects hot and cold water at short intervals. One cauldron, some four feet across, boils up until it overflows, then sinks several feet, and again overflows. Nothing is seen but a mass of foam; the water is strongly impregnated with sal ammonia.

There are other cauldrons, from 10 to 20 feet in diameter, filled to within 3 or 4 feet with boiling mud, which is occasionally thrown out in every direction. About a mile further off is another collection of mud cones, and on the opposite side an island of volcanic rocks rises to the height of 50 feet; at the foot of it is salt in sheets, strongly impregnated with sal ammonia; that from the Lake is pure, and is used by the Californians. In the vicinity of the volcano, we saw several ledges covered with pumice, and we met with it in various other places on the plains.

I believe we were the first white men who had ever visited the place, and we had great difficulty in persuading the Indians to guide us to it. They have a legend that when you approach it, it commences hallooing, and if you go nearer, birds resembling vultures, or buzzards, rise out of it, and falling upon your head, are sure to make you forfeit life for your temerity.

The mirage was so great that we could not see Salt Lake distinctly. The mud was very soft, and owning to the condition of our horses we could not venture to it. The salt in the vicinity is found in crystalized layers from the thickness of half an inch down. It is in common use among the natives.

Memoir of John James Audubon.

John James Audubon, the deservedly renowned naturalist, died in New York, Jan. 27, 1851. He had arrived at the age of seventy-six, and has gone down to the grave leaving a name distinguished among the scientific men of every nation—a name earned by a steady perseverance in the beautiful field of ornithology, the cultivation of which demands fancy, taste, judgment, and a general love of nature.

Mr. Audubon was born on a plantation in Louisiana, near New Orleans. His parents were French, his father being an admiral in the navy of France, and, it is said, a friend of Washington. The Audubon family still preserve the likeness of the Admiral and of our first Commander-in-Chief, which was painted in the camp at Valley Forge. It was on that occasion that Washington sat for the first time to a painter. After passing his early boyhood in Louisiana, young Audubon was taken by his father to France, where the rudiments of his future education were imparted to him.

On arriving at years of maturity, his father gave him a residence on the fruitful banks of the Schuylkill, and all that wealth and luxury could do to blind his ambitious love for nature there surrounded him. He heard, in the warm sunshine of his fancy, the songs of the winged inhabitants of the western wilds, or pictured to his imagination the still brighter plumage of the myriad birds of the American tropics. We find him accordingly, in 1810, in an uncovered skiff, accompanied by his wife and infant son, floating down the river Ohio, in search of a home more romantic than that selected by his father. He fixed upon a point in the State of Kentucky, whereon to settle, and having there established a new home, pursued his favorite studies in every direction, roaming through the forests, crossing and sailing over every river, and sketching the yet undescribed birds which fell beneath the keen shot of his rifle. The result of his early experiences was given to the world in five volumes of his "Ornithological Biography." It has been said, that he saw over one of our Northern lakes a large bird, far beyond his reach, and that he was ten years in finding another of the same description, which he found three thousand miles from the place where he had the first sight of the species. The history of his perilous adventures for a period of twenty years, in which he passed through every degree of habitable latitude, constantly exposed to the varied alternations of heat and cold, is but a portion of the monument to his zeal, his ardent love of nature, his constantly recurring self-sacrifices, his painful privations, and his ultimate success in the objects of his ambition. It was his fortune to meet, in these excursions, others like himself, whose minds were drawn, by the allurements of science and nature, from the luxurious indolence of civilized society, whose best pleasure can only cloy the senses of one who has learned to look upon mental treasures as the highest reward of human exertion.

In 1824 his pursuits took a commercial aspect. Lucien Bonaparte proposed to buy his drawings. Audubon hesitated, and then resolved to publish them himself. For this purpose he visited England, where he landed as a stranger. His name, however, had gone before him, and the first men distinguished in the sciences and arts were happy to welcome him. On the continent, Herschell, Cuvier, and his old friend Humboldt, who had penetrated the same tropical regions with him, were delighted to honor him. In the "Cosmos" of the latter, his talents have not been forgotten. The publication of his great work was soon in a fair way. Brewster, Scott, Jeffrey, and Wilson, encouraged him. After fourteen years it was completed, and more than satisfied the world that had awaited its appearance. One hundred and seventy-five subscriptions, at one thousand dollars each, paid him the price of his labor. Eighty of his subscribers, we are proud to say, were found in our country—a very good offset to the neglect often visited upon those who enter the fields of literature and art.

Of course, such a work—so magnificent in design and execution—a portfolio of great dimensions—enriched with the details of a life's experience among forest birds—could not but stimulate the great societies of Europe to do him honor. He was made the subject of dissertation in the Royal Society of London, all the members of which gladly contributed to acknowledge his talent by the highest distinction in their power.

A synopsis of his work was published in Edinburgh, and readily commanded an extensive sale, as did also a New York edition, in octavo; and in 1839 Audubon returned to this country, where he soon established himself on the banks of the Hudson river, in a place of peaceful retirement. Here he labored, with Dr. Bachman, in preparing "The Quadrupeds of America"—a work published last year. In some of his works his two sons have ably assisted the designs and purposes of the distinguished naturalist, who has among scientific men an imperishable name—a name, as the editor of "The Gallery of Illustrious Americans" has said, "not in the keeping of history alone. From every deep grove the birds of America will sing his name. The wren will pipe it at our windows—the oriole carol it from the meadow grass—the turtle dove roll it through the secret forests—the many-voiced mocking bird pour it along the evening air—and the bird of Washington, from his craggy home far up the Rocky mountains, will scream it to the tempest and the stars. Habits of the Turks.

By a Correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune.

The ways used by the Turks in saddling, bridling, and shoeing their horses, as well as in arranging the loads on the backs of their beasts, are quite ludicrous, from their oddity and inconvenience. Their cloaks and habilaments are of the coarsest woolen, made in the roughest way. Notwithstanding their frequent bathing, they have no distinct idea of cleanliness, as their habits and manners are quite in opposition with it. They eat with their fingers, drink out of a common cup, blow their noses with their fingers, never undress at night, seldom change their linen or garments, never sweep their rooms, never wash their plates, dishes, or culinary utensils, and deem it not in the least shameful or disgusting to be devoured by the most horrible vermin, such as bugs, fleas, lice, &c. The white necks and arms of the Turkish ladies are constantly bestrewed with black and red spots, which are the consequence of such becoming company; and to mention a trifling circumstance, I will add that the custom of ironing washed linen is quite unknown in the East. I had some ironing utensils in my house, which were looked at by the natives as either instruments of torture, or as chirurgical implements. It is true, it would require many pounds weight of iron and a Herculanean wrist to stretch out and make even the coarse, rough linen which they wear.

Their food, though not delicate nor savory, is substantial and healthy enough. Boiled rice, roasted lamb, and excellent vegetables, such as cabbages, artichokes, pumpkins, and beets, constitute their usual fare, to which they add sour milk, prepared in different ways, raw garlic, honey-cakes, white cheese, and preserves. Fruit here is good and abundant—strawberries, cherries, peaches, plums, apricots, grapes, apples, and several wild fruits, but nobody picks them, as there are not people enough to eat them.

But while such gifts of nature are abundant and excellent, no thanks must be tendered to man and his industry, since not a leaf, not a single berry, has been added by him to the richness of the land. Neither the vegetables nor fruits which require care, are reckoned by this indolent people as worth any notice. Peas, asparagus, spinach, lettuce, etc., though growing by themselves in the fields, are neglected as good for nothing, as grass, because they cannot be eaten in their wild condition. Potatoes they have none, nor do they exert themselves to preserve for the Winter season any of the bounties which abound during Summer. Though the Christian inhabitants of the East drink and consequently make wine, they never dream of keeping any store of it from one year to another, but drink it always as soon as it is made, that is to say, before it has acquired its true flavor. Their bread, badly baked and without leaven, resembles more large white wafers than what we are accustomed to call bread. In short, life is here deprived of all its elegance and comfort, as well as of its luxury. Cold, hunger, and fatigue are just prevented from becoming too irksome, but no indulgence is allowed the body after its deliverance from these evils.

Such absolute want of luxury renders the acquisition of fortunes of little moment. The habitual carelessness of the Turk has often been accounted for by his belief in fatalism. But I do not think any philosophical doctrine will make man indifferent to the loss or the acquisition of riches, if his own temper does not influence him in that direction. The truth is, a Turk is as careless about making his fortune as liable to lose it when made, and the fact of a man leaving his entire property to his children is little short of inconceivable among them. You daily see immense riches suddenly giving way and disappearing like mist, before the caprice or neglect of their owner, without exciting the least wonder or the least pity in the beholders. What will become of the children of some ruined man, I have asked, reared up as they are in luxury or the expectation of a large fortune? But the Turks to whom my question was addressed scarcely understood it, since, in reality, the children of the rich are not accustomed to luxury and to high expectations. Though rich, they live in the same rude style as the poorest individuals; and as to expectations, they well know that they could as easily get possession of the fortune of any stranger as of that of their father. If they grow up fine lads or fine girls, they will please the taste of some man of high station, and be raised by him to the pinnacle of wealth and honor.

But on their sudden accession to fortune, they will take no thought as to the future, pay no regard to threatening perils, have no idea of prudent foresight, but will indulge every whim, imitate and rival their master in extravance and dissipation, buy costly pipes, saddles, bridles, scarfs, dresses, slippers, rings, and head ornaments, houses, slaves of both sexes, build palaces and kiosques, and this all in this strange and unique city of Stamboul, where, till the present day, riches were a source of persecution and destruction.

Suppose a rich man has a fine villa on the shore of the Bosphorus, where he delights in indulging all the fancies of luxury and, in gratifying every lust. Look at that swift caique; how it flies upon the waves, dancing under the well-regulated impulse of six pairs of oars. It passes before the lovely villa, and seems to stop for a moment. It is the barge of a powerful Pasha, going to breathe the sea breeze. He has darted his hawk-eye upon the rich man's abode. He finds it to his taste, and must have it. If the rich man gives up his property without repining, he can yet be safe; but let him hesitate, and he is lost. Such is the way in which personal property is respected and secured in the Ottoman Empire.

Care of Horses.

To go fully into this subject, would require a whole volume, yet a few hints may be useful to some of our readers. Those persons who are constantly taking care of horses, are generally faithful and intelligent, and manage well. The horse is most neglected by the farmer who, in the winter, has but little for him to do, and spends but little time—often too little—in taking care of him.

The standing of the horse is too much neglected, or this subject is not judiciously managed either by the professed groom or the farmer. The horse is often allowed to stand in the stable, on a hard floor, with his fore feet considerably higher than his hind ones, constantly straining his muscles. The floor on which horses stand should only slant one or one and a half inches in eight or nine feet, barely enough to conduct off the liquid manure.

Some farmers turn their horses into a pen, and let them stand as they please. This is a good arrangement, as they can move about and stand at ease; and by standing on the manure, which is moist and soft to their feet, they are much less liable to injuries in their feet than horses that stand on hard floors. By this arrangement a horse may eat from a trough by the barn floor, so as to breathe freely of pure air. But with this plan, it is necessary to level the manure frequently where the horse stands to eat, else it will accumulate under his hind feet and give him an uneasy position.

Horses should be curried and brushed down daily. This is as necessary as it is for a person to wash his face and hands daily. It is not only necessary to comfort, but to permanent health.

Horses should have a good supply of pure water. Farmers often consult their own convenience in supplying this, to the serious injury of their horses. The animal comes home rather late in the evening, warm and sweaty, and in that condition he is supplied with cold water, as the hour for retiring for the night is at hand, and to water the horse, as the saying is, after he has become cool, would be very inconvenient. To avoid so great an evil as giving cold water to a warm horse in winter, when his labor is over, give him water when he is about to return, if convenient; if not, wait till the horse has become cool, after returning home, and turn him to the water, or if more convenient carry some to the stable. If a little hot water can be added to the cold, he may have drink without waiting; or moistened food may be given to him, so that water will not be necessary.

There is one thing in which many farmers are negligent in the care of their horses. They feed their whole stock early in the evening, and they do not go to the barn again for the night. When the horse has eaten his supper of dry fodder, he is very thirsty, but he has no drink, and suffers greatly far want of it. The next morning his thirst has abated, by an equalization of moisture in the system, end he has become hungry, and is looking for his breakfast, so he will not drink, frequently, in the morning, though water is offered. It is but little trouble to turn the horse to water, about nine o'clock in the evening, and it should be attended to. If the food be cut and moistened, as now practiced by many, it will be, in a great measure, a remedy for the evil.

When the horse is out, keep him well covered while standing in the cold, especially after hard driving, or when warm; and put a blanket on him on being put into the stable when sweating. Never wash a horse's legs in cold water when he is warm, not even in hot weather. Cold water may be used for inflammations, but only when the horse is still and cool. [New England Farmer.

Tool Shop for Farmers.

Every farmer ought to possess a variety of tools, such as are needed in repairing farming implements—fences, gates, and pens; and for doing such work generally, as will be always required on the premises, and which every person may acquire the habit of doing, although he has no mechanical trade. How often does a nail give way, and hence a board becomes loose. If he has nails and a hammer at hand, a few minutes will be sufficient to make it secure. Whereas, if permitted to remain insecure, it may fall and be broken, so that a new one will be required to supply its place. How often will the fastenings on a gate or door demand a slight attention to prevent destruction from the wind, as well as to keep the stock from going where they ought not. How often does a rake tooth or an axe handle get broken; a hoe handle becomes loose in its socket; an ox-bow pin gets lost; a floor plank in the stalls becomes damaged. If he has tools and materials at hand for making repairs, he may do it in half the time to be occupied in going after a mechanic to do it; besides, if he does it himself, he does not have to pay another person for doing it.

To do these things, he must have hammers and hatchets, gimlets and augurs, chisels and gouges, drills and screw-drivers, saws and files, squares and compasses, pliers and pincers; also, a punch, a vice, an adze, a drawing knife, a guage, and, perhaps, twenty other articles, the cost of which is not much, not equal to what they will enable a person to save in a single year, if he uses them as he may do. Besides, the time generally taken in such acts would never be missed; it is fragments of leisure about the season of meals, or stormy days when nothing else would be done. With such habits of attention to the farming implements, and to the various fixtures on the premises, whenever a job of work is to be undertaken, no delay is caused by the want of instruments to effect it. This is the secret why some farmers get along with their labor so much better than their neighbors. They do not have to wait a day before beginning any specified operation, in going after a carpenter, a wheelwright, or blacksmith, after the laborers are personally ready to engage in it. [Blake's Every-Day Book.

To Make Butter in Winter.

In many parts of our country, the art of making good butter in the winter is very imperfectly understood. Indeed, many good dairy women suppose it is absolutely impracticable to make it at that season. Now, in some places, at least, in New England, it is constantly practiced, and the process is as familiar as that of making butter in May or October. The short history of it is this:

The cows should be stabled, and fed on good sweet hay, and if other provender is added, so much the better. Instead of keeping the milk in a warm place, it should be kept in a cold one, and no matter how soon it freezes. Freezing will separate the cream much more perfectly than it will rise without, and it is taken off with much less trouble. When the cream is churned, the churn should not be placed too near the fire. The ordinary warmth of the kitchen will be sufficient. Too much heat will destroy both the complexion and flavor of the butter. It will require a little more time in churning than it does in warmer weather; and that is all the difficulty in making as good butter in January as can be made at any season of the year. Butter cured with one-half ounce of common salt, one-fourth ounce of saltpetre, one-fourth ounce of moist sugar, pounded together, and used in the proportion of one ounce to the pound of butter, will, on trial, be found to keep any length of time, and have a much finer flavor than when salted in the usual manner.

Curious Case.

The Boston Medical Journal states the following very curious fact in physiology: "It has been observed, that persons who have lost a limb, or part of one, are at times very much troubled with an intolerable itching, or sometimes pain, in the fingers and toes of the extremity which is lost. A case of this kind lately presented itself to us for advice, which, being a little out of the common course, we have thought proper to give to our readers. A young man had his hand amputated just above the wrist, on account of having it shattered by the bursting of a gun. This happened some two years since, and the deficiency is supplied by a wooden hand. At times, he tells us, he has the most intolerable itching between these wooden fingers; in fact, insupportable, and, to use his own words, he would give a hundred dollars for the chance of giving them a scratching. At other times he has much pain where the fingers should be, and he can only obtain relief by altering their position. When free from the pain or itching, he can discover no difference between that and the sound one. He can will the fingers of the lost hand to act, and they seem to obey. At times the ends of the fingers are quite numb and cold; being partly flexed, he feels that he has not the power to extend them. There are other phenomena connected with this case, which, with those we have given, would be difficult to account for on physiological principles."

Blanc Mange.

The following recipe for cooking Rice is worthy of preservation by every housekeeper—it presents a nutricious and agreeable article of diet for the invalid, and a delightful and cheap dessert for the family table: Boil half a pint of whole rice in as little water as possible, till all the grains lose their form, and become a solid mass. Next put it in a seive, and drain and press out all the water. Then turn it into the saucepan, and mix with it a large half pint of rich milk, and a quarter of a pound of powdered sugar. Boil it again till the whole is reduced to a pulp. Then remove it from the fire, and stir in (while hot) a wine glass of rose water. Dip your moulds into cold water, and then fill them up with the rice; set them on ice, and when quite firm and cold, turn out the blanc mange, and serve it up on dishes with a sauce tureen of sweetened cream flavored with nutmeg. Or, you may eat with a boiled custard, or with wine sauce. You may mould it in large breakfast cups. Always dip your moulds for a moment in luke warm water before you turn out their contents.

Neander and the Yankee.

A writer in the Prospective Review gives the following anecdote, illustrative of the extreme good nature of the late Dr. Neander, the celebrated historian of the Church:—

One day he received a letter from the wilds of Western America, from a correspondent, who, to the characteristic assurance of the Yankee, joined the share of that quality usually possessed by the collector of autographs. He was a perfect stranger to our good Professor, yet had written to make the three modest requests following: That Dr. Neander would send his autograph; that the said autograph should be in the form of a long letter giving a sketch of the then state of Theology and Religion in Germany; and that the Professor would also procure and send the autographs of Niebuhr and A. Von Humboldt. Would Dr. Whewell, or any other Cambridge notability, believe that Neander not only immediately set about executing the commission, but refused to be persuaded by an English friend that there was any thing impudent or unreasonable in the request.

Marvels of the Cornish Mines.

Some of the mines are truly grand undertakings. The consolidated mines, the largest of the Cornish group, employ upward of 3,000 persons. One of its engines pumps water from a direct depth of 1,600 feet, the weight of the pumping apparatus alone being upward of 500 tons; the pumping-rod is 1,740 feet long, and it raises about 2,000,000 gallons of water in a week, from a depth equal to five times the hight of St. Paul's. These are, indeed, wonders to marvel at! The consolidated and united mines, both belonging to one company, are stated to have used the following vast quantities of materials in a year: Coals, 15,270 tons; candles, 132,144 lb; gunpowder, 82,000 lb; leather straps, &c. 13,493 lb; pick and shovel handles, 16,698 dozens. Sir Charles Lemon has estimated that, in the whole of the Cornish mines, £13,000 worth of gunpowder is used annually; that the timber employed in the under ground works equals the growth of 140 square miles of Norwegian forest; and that 37,000,000 tons of water are raised annually from the mines. [Land We Live in.

Mice Power.—A gentleman in Kirkalda, Scotland, has trained a couple of mice, and invented machinery, enabling them to spin cotton yarn. The work is so constructed that the common house mouse is enabled to make atonement to society for past offenses, by twisting twine, and reeling from 100 to 126 threads per day. To complete this, the little pedestrian has to run 10 1-2 miles. A half-penny's worth of oatmeal, at 15d. per peck, serves one of these treadwheel culprits for the long period of five weeks. In that time it makes 110 threads per day. At this rate a mouse earns 7s. 6d. per annum. Take off 5d. for board, and 1s. for machinery, there will arise 6s. clear for every mouse annually. The mouse employer was going to make an application for the lease of an old empty house, which will hold 10,000 mouse mills, sufficient room being left for keepers, and some hundreds of spectators. Allowing for rent, there will be a balance of $10,000 per annum.

Question of Freedom.—A family of eight negroes have brought suit in the Henrico (Va.) Court for their freedom, claiming under a deed of manumission executed by their former master, about 20 years ago, in the City of New York. The evidence was that they were the children and grand children of their former master, who carried them to New York and there emancipated them, to evade the law of Virginia, which did not allow him to emancipate them there, without sending them out of the State; that he brought them immediately back with him to Virginia; and that they were never molested in the enjoyment of their freedom since his death, which occurred about fifteen years ago, until they were arrested last summer by the Sheriff, at the instance of his next of kin, and claimed as slaves. The question was whether such a deed of manumission was sufficient, and the Court allowed the question to go to the jury, who returned a verdict in favor of the negroes.

Sudden Death.—A young man by the name of Vickery was to have been married at Cleveland, Ohio, on the 18th ult., but in consequence of the illness of his intended, the wedding was postponed two weeks, but he died in a few days afterward. He had an affection of the heart, which, when excited, troubled him very much. On the evening of his death he had been reading to his intended the story of "Walter Errick." It was a very exciting tale of "love and murder," and under the circumstances wrought deeply upon his feelings. When he had finished reading the last paragraph, ending with the sudden death of "Errick," he remarked that "he hoped he should not die thus suddenly." The young lady looked at him and saw his hand falling which held the paper, and his countenance changed to a deathly hue. She took hold of him from her chair, when he gently leaned toward her and died in her arms.

How Coal should be Consumed.—Notwithstanding the general use of anthracite coal in families, few persons know exactly how to use it properly. This business is usually entrusted to servants, and as their experience has taught them—the more wood the more fire—they throw on the coal on the same principle, expecting the same results. This practice, however, destroys the draught necessary to consume the coal, and the consequence is that the sulphurous gases, instead of being consumed, are dispersed through the rooms of the house, to the injury of health, and frequently the spoiling of the food in the process of cooking. No stove should ever contain on a fair average a greater layer than four inches of coal—less in a majority of cases will answer. A beautiful red heat is then generated, the coal parts with all its inflamable elements, and deposits its earthy matter in fine particles in the receiver. Try the experiment and see the results.

English Opium Eating.—A correspondent of the London Morning Chronicle makes the following developments of the extent of Opium eating in England: "To such an extent is Opium used, that one druggist in Ely informed me that the average quantity sold by him for the last few years had not been less than 3 cwt. per annum. From two other druggists I learned that the quantity sold by them was not less than 80 or 90 lbs. in the year. In the town of St. Ives, one druggist informed me that he sold about 2½ cwt. in the year. In Wisbeach and Chatteris, the quantity is considerably more than in either of these towns. In Whittlesea, also, the consumption of the drug is very large. You may set it down (said a druggist to whom I was speaking on the subject) as a tun weight per year, for the ten parts of Huntington and the Isle of Ely."

Tom Paine and the Clairvoyant.—An exchange paper says that Tom Paine has appeared to a clairvoyant in Cleveland. She describes him as a very bright spirit, standing erect, lofty in appearance and high-mindedness. He was in company with George Washington and Ethan Allen. Paine informed the lady that he would prefer to have the money expended in festivals to his honor distributed among the poor. He says that when he died, he believed that was the last of him, and could hardly reconcile himself to his new condition when he first awoke in the spirit world. A change has evidently taken place in Mr. Paine's mind. He says that infidels on earth are the first to embrace truth after death, because they are so easy in "conquering their prejudices."

A Cure for Poison.—If a person should be stung by a bee or any other insect, rub some spirits of turpentine on the place, and the pain will cease in a minute. It is said that the pain arising from the bite of a copper head snake may be arrested in a few minutes, by the continued application of this article; and from my own knowledge of the effects in other cases, I have not the least doubt of it. The effect of all poison is to contract the blood vessels, and prevent a free circulation; the natural consequence is pain and inflammation immediately. Spirits of turpentine, by their penetrating and expanding qualities, soon overcome the difficulty.

One day last week a keg of specie (silver) was stolen from Adams & Co.'s Express, near Baltimore. One of the thieves was arrested, and the money, which had been buried, was recovered.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year of this Seminary, for 1850 and '51, will commence the third Wednesday in August, and continue forty-four weeks, including a short recess between the terms, and one of ten days for the winter holidays.

The year is divided into three terms:—

The first, of 14 weeks, begins Wednesday, August 21st, and ends Wednesday, November 27th.

The second, of 15 weeks, begins Monday, December 2d, and ends Friday, March 14th.

The third, of 14 weeks, begins Tuesday, March 18th and ends Tuesday, June 24th.

Board of Instruction.

GURDON EVANS, A. M., President,
And Professor of Mathematics and Natural Science.

Rev. JOSEPH W. MORTON,
Professor of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, Spanish, and Moral and Intellectual Science.

Mrs. SUSANNA M. SPICER, Preceptress.

ADOLPH ROSENHAYN,
(Late of Friedrick Wilhelm College, Berlin,)
Teacher of German, Piano Forte, and Assistant in Greek and Latin.

Other competent Teachers will be employed as occasion may demand.

TEACHERS' CLASSES will be formed, as usual, at the beginning of the Fall and middle of the Winter Terms, and continue seven weeks.

In the Common Branches, classes will be formed at the commencement of each term; but in the higher, the interest of the student, as well as the welfare of the Institution, demand that a more systematic course of study be pursued.

In the Natural Sciences, Elementary Chemistry and Philosophy will be pursued during the Fall Term Agricultural Chemistry, Astronomy, and Physiology during the Winter Term; Botany and Geology during the Summer Term.

Classes will be formed in Latin, French, and German, at the commencement of the Fall Term; in Hebrew, Greek, and Spanish, at the commencement of the Winter Term, and continue through the course of study.

In Mathematics, Geometry is studied in the Fall, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, and Astronomy, Surveying, Navigation, &c., in the Summer Term.

The course of instruction in Agriculture is thorougly scientific, embracing study and recitation in the best authors. Instruction is given in a well-furnished laboratory, in the analysis of soils, ashes of plants, manures, &c. and the modes of testing for their constituent elements. The attention of farmers who wish to give their sons a practical education is especially called to this department.

Board in private families, from $1 25 to $1 50. Many students board in clubs for 60 to 75 cents.

Tuition—to be settled upon entering school—from $3 00 to $5 00. Extras—For Drawing, $1 00; Oil Painting, $5 00; Chemical Experiments, $1 00; Writing, including stationery, 50 cents; Piano Forte, $8 00; Use of Instrument, $2 00; Agricultural Chemistry, including chemicals, apparatus, and fuel, (breakage extra,) $12 00.

It is very desirable that students should enter at the beginning of the term; yet they are received into classes already formed at any time.

For farther information, address Gurdon Evans, J. W. Morton, or Rev. J. R. Irish, President of the Corporation.

Sabbath Tracts.

The American Sabbath Tract Society publishes the following tracts, which are for sale at its Depository, No. 9 Spruce-st., N. Y., viz:

No. 1 Reasons for introducing the Sabbath of the Fourth Commandment to the consideration of the Christian Public. 28 pp.
No. 2 Moral Nature and Scriptural Observance of the Sabbath. 52 pp.
No. 3 Authority for the Change of the Day of the Sabbath. 28 pp.
No. 4 The Sabbath and Lord's Day A History of their Observance in the Christian Church. 52 pp.
No. 5 A Christian Caveat to the Old and New Sabbatarians. 4 pp.
No. 6 Twenty Reasons for keeping holy, in each week, the Seventh Day instead of the First Day. 4 pp.
No. 7 Thirty-six Plain Questions, presenting the main points in the Controversy; A Dialogue between a Minister of the Gospel and a Sabbatarian; Counterfeit Coin. 8 pp.
No. 8 The Sabbath Controversy The True Issue. 4 pp.
No. 9 The Fourth Commandment False Exposition. 4 pp.
No. 10 The True Sabbath Embraced and Observed. 16 pp.
No. 11 Religious Liberty Endangered by Legislative Enactments. 16 pp.
No. 12 Misuse of the Term Sabbath. 8 pp.
No. 13 The Bible Sabbath. 24 pp.

The Society has also published the following works, to which attention is invited;

A Defense of the Sabbath, in reply to Ward on the Fourth Commandment. By George Carlow. First printed in London, in 1724; reprinted at Stonington, Ct., in 1802; now republished in a revised form. 168 pages.

The Royal Law Contended for. By Edward Stennet. First printed in London, in 1658. 60 pp.

An Appeal for the Restoration of the Lord's Sabbath, in an Address to the Baptists from the Seventh-day Baptist General Conference. 24 pp.

Vindication of the True Sabbath, by J. W. Morton, late Missionary of the Reformed Presbyterian Church. 64 pp.

These tracts will be furnished to those wishing them for distribution or sale, at the rate of 15 pages for one cent. Persons desiring them can have them forwarded by mail or otherwise, on sending their address, with a remittance, to George B. Utter, Corresponding Secretary of the American Sabbath Tract Society, No 9 Spruce-st., New York.

OBLIGATION OF THE SABBATH.

"Stand fast, therefore, in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free." Galat. 5: 1.

By your favor, Messrs. Editors, I would occupy a small space in your paper with a few remarks upon this subject, in reply to the very able article of your correspondent "J. N. B.," which appeared in your first number for the new year; and which reviewed in order the six propositions on which Christian Anti-Sabbatarianism may be supposed to rely.

1. To the first proposition, that the Bible knows but one weekly Sabbath, "the seventh day" of the fourth commandment, J. N. B. replies, (without "venturing" an unqualified negation,) "The Decalogue knows nothing of Saturday. It makes no designation of the day. It fixes only the proportion of time, every seventh day for devotional rest, but leaves the date of the reckoning, and of course the day itself, to be determined by positive law, or some other means." I must here thank my friend for his admission that the particular day of the commandment belongs to "positive law," and, therefore, not to natural or moral law; it will help to elucidate the second proposition. There is one erroneous assertion in the above, however, which demands correction. It is not true that the sabbath law "fixes only the proportion of time" for rest. In every variety, and on every occasion of its enunciation, the law pertinaciously requires a particular day for its observance; and by whatever means "the date of the reckoning" and the identity of this period may be discovered, it is obvious, that if once ascertained, it becomes the exclusive object of the law's consideration, and engrosses its entire authority. It is not true that any or "every seventh day for devotional rest," will meet its requirements. Wherever the sabbath is enjoined, with a remarkable reiteration, it uniformly and expressly limits it to "THE seventh day." The command leaves no crevice for evasion.

But "the Decalogue knows nothing of Saturday!"—that is, not that "Saturday" was unknown in ancient Hebrew—being plain modern Saxon—but the law does not define its terms, and tell which is "the seventh day." "From the Decalogue alone, I repeat it, no man could determine when the week should begin or end." Most profound and undisputed truth! And the law does not define (which is far more practicable) the very important word "work." "From the Decalogue alone, no man could" possibly know what the word signified. And, in point of fact, the first recorded case of conviction, under the sabbath law, exhibits a difficulty of construction upon this very word. Numb. 15: 34. But it has never yet been heard of, even among "the lawyers," that a doubt could be raised as to its enacted day. Every child that could count its fingers, knew perfectly which was "the seventh day"—just as perfectly, and just in the same manner, as he knew how many constituted "seven"—by unquestioned acceptation. The authority for "the date of the reckoning, and of course for the day itself," will be found in Exod. 16: 27. That the received computation is identical with the ancient—that Saturday is "the Sabbath enjoined in the Decalogue"—is as certain as human knowledge can be, even concerning the Bible itself. No historical monument is more reliable than the Israelite's traditionary Sabbath. On one point at least, Jews, Christians, and Mohammedans, are happily agreed, and that is "when the week should begin and end." J. N. B. will permit me to remind him, that if Sunday is really the day on which Jesus rose from the dead, we have the testimony of all the evangelists, that it is "the first day of the week."

"In Eden," says your correspondent, "the first Sabbath kept by man was the first day after his own creation!" It is much to be regretted, that he has felt at liberty to make so important an addition to the testimony of Scripture. Certainly, no such account is to be found in the Bible, nor any thing similar to it. In Exod. 15: 25, J. N. B. will find a narrative of "the first Sabbath kept by man." In vain shall we search for even a hint, that during the twenty-five hundred years previous, man ever did keep, or ever was required to keep, a Sabbath. Adam rested "the first day after his own creation!" In the name of wonder, from what? To assume that the declaration in Gen. 2: 3, "God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it," means that man "sanctified it," requires rather too great an exercise of "fancy" for a sober logician. I dislike retort, but I cannot help reminding my friend J. N. B., that "so serious a blunder at the beginning, should abate a little his tone of confidence."

The first proposition, then, that there is but one Bible Sabbath, stands wholly unimpaired. No one can assail it by "venturing to affirm." Nothing will answer but a chapter and verse, pointing out a "Sabbath" other than that of the fourth commandment—"the seventh day." Such an appeal, no one, as yet, has even attempted.

2. The second proposition, that the Sabbath was strictly a ceremonial and Jewish institution, seems to your correspondent "a glaring falsehood. Every other command in the Decalogue is acknowledged to be of a moral nature. How happens it that the fourth should be an exception?" Let us examine. The particular day required by this command, "the seventh day," is also an integral portion of the Decalogue. Is it therefore "acknowledged to be of a moral nature?" If so, why has it been changed? Why does my friend J. N. B. entirely neglect it for another day not "in the Decalogue?" Can moral laws thus change? The answer has been already furnished by the previous assertion of my friend, that the particular day belongs to "positive law;" so that, by his own showing, a part of the Decalogue is not "of a moral nature," since a particular day certainly is contained therein. He even extends his admission farther, and very correctly states, that a "weekly Sabbath, rather than one oftener, or more seldom, is not of itself obvious, and every tenth day, or every fifth, or any other proportion, might have its advocates." Now this vague, problematical interval of time "not of itself obvious," must either be accepted as part of the moral law, or I hand back to my friend the question, "How happens it, that it should be an exception?"

But the institution was "'made for man,' established at the beginning of the world, and founded on reasons of universal and perpetual force." Indeed! What are these perpetual reasons? God "rested the seventh day," wherefore thou shalt keep the first! Do no work on Sunday, "because that in it" God did not rest "from all his work!" "Thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt," and "therefore" must the day be kept! How comes it that all these "reasons of universal and perpetual force" have been so stultified? That the institution was established for man "at the beginning of the world," J. N. B. has neither proved nor attempted to prove. Till he does, I simply "venture" to deny it. "An institution 'strictly Jewish,' though instituted by God two thousand years, at least, before a Jew was born! The idea is preposterous!" Very true. And throughout Genesis we shall not find one syllable concerning a "sabbath-day."

The passages in Exod. 31: 13, 17, and Ezek. 20: 12, characterizing the Sabbath as an especial "sign" between God and the children of Israel, "prove nothing" (says your correspondent) as to its "strictly Jewish" character. "Now it does not seem easy," as Paley has well observed, (Mor. Philos. b. 5, chap. 7,) "to understand how the Sabbath could be a sign between God and the people of Israel, unless the observance of it was peculiar to that people, and designed to be so. The distinction of the Sabbath is in its nature as much a positive ceremonial institution, as that of many other seasons which were appointed by the Levitical law to be kept holy, and to be observed by a strict rest."

That the Sabbath law is not a moral one, is apparent from the fact that it actually was "peculiar to the Jew." Throughout all history, we discover no trace of a Sabbath among the nations of antiquity. This is incompatible with the notion of its being a natural duty. Again, a "moral" law being founded on the natural and universal relations existing between man and his Creator, and between man and man, must be as immutable as those relations. Now the Sabbath has been changed in its period, changed in the reasons for its observance, changed in the character of its requirements, and changed in its sanction. How can that which has been so superseded, now be, or ever have been, a moral law?

But in addition to all this, overwhelming evidence, we are not without the direct and explicit testimony of the Scriptures upon this point. "The Sabbath-days," says Paul, in Col. 2: 16, 17, "are a shadow of good things to come." This, apart from all the previous considerations, would itself be conclusive. No one will pretend, that a shadow or type can be other than ritual. It will not do to "venture to affirm" that this does "not refer to the Sabbath of the Decalogue." The assumption is "without a shadow of proof. I meet it with an unequivocal denial." The language of the text is comprehensive and unqualified. All sabbath-days are equally included. "This is clear from the context," and confirmed by the uniform tenor of the other Epistles. He who asserts a limitation of its application, must clearly prove it. In no single instance is the word so limited in the whole New Testament. Now, is it credible, that the Apostle should discard "sabbath-days," without any exception, and yet use the word in an unfamiliar sense, and intend his readers still to be bound by "an holy day?" "The idea is preposterous." We are therefore justified in the confident announcement that the Sabbath was a "stricly Jewish and ceremonial institution."

3. The third proposition, that Jesus studiously and repeatedly violated the Sabbath, J. N. B., by a circuitous intimation, charges "with malice prepense;" but when he boldly avows, that "if he did thus violate it, he was guilty of sin, (!) and not of sin only, but of a crime which, by the civil code of Moses, was punishable with death!" and that, as the law "was then in force, every Jew, including Jesus himself, was then bound by it," I must confess an astonishment at least equal to his own; and so we stand, "well met" in mutual amaze! I am compelled to say, with him, that from a Jew "it would have less surprised me than it does from a professed Christian." I hope, however, to be able to relieve him from his surprise, much more completely than I can expect to be relieved myself.

If Jesus has been "charged with a 'repeated violation' of the law of God," there is one circumstance, at least, that appears to give some color of justice to the charge. We find that the word "work" was used in the fourth commandment with a remarkable latitude of application. The lighting of a fire, the gathering of grain or food, the picking of sticks, unnecessary walking, even the carrying of the slightest burden, all fell within the legal construction of the prohibition. Thus, in Jer. 17: 21, "Take heed to yourselves, and bear no burden on the Sabbath day." Now, in the very face of this express interdict, when Jesus had on a Sabbath day restored the impotent man at the pool of Bethesda, he "saith unto him, Arise, take up thy bed, and walk." John 5: 8. Considering how entirely superfluous this command was, either to the miracle, or to its manifestation, (the "arising" and "walking" being everything, the "carrying" nothing,) it is impossible not to regard this—as his cotemporaries regarded it—as a glaring and "studious violation" of the Jewish law. He could scarcely have exhibited to his startled countrymen a more striking practical affirmation, that their venerated Sabbath was but "a shadow of things to come," (Col. 2: 17,) having in itself no moral sanctity. I think it would puzzle even my ingenious and respected friend J. N. B., to show how this infraction of the liberal statute can be resolved into "a work of necessity, mercy, and piety," or into one "lawful to be done on the Sabbath;" and I hope he will have the candor to acknowledge, that the proposition under review cannot with justice be stigmatized as either "false" or "calumnious."

Again, when the disciples gathered grain on the Sabbath-day, they evidently did that which, under the fourth commandment, required extenuation, and for which extenuation was given. "Have ye never read what David did when he had need, and was an hungered," doing that "which was not lawful?" And by this very parallel, Jesus clearly teaches us that the institution of the Sabbath, precisely like that of the show-bread, was a "positive" one, for the breach of which hunger was a sufficient justification. Thus we corroborate, by additional evidence, the preceding proposition, with which, indeed, the present one is closely connected. Think you he would have justified a slight infringement on the sixth, the eighth, or the tenth commandment—on any moral law, in short, by the plea of hunger?—that he could ever have permitted the doing of that "which is not lawful" in natural duty?—that he could yet appeal to the precedent of the priests, (who, by the necessity of their office, infringe upon the literal inhibition of the fourth commandment,) and hold the unlawful doer "guiltless?" The question needs but to be asked!

But further than this, he asserts, "The Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath." The institution is subordinate to the man, and not the man to the institution. Could he have said this of any law but a positive or ceremonial one? Assuredly not! Man is subordinate to "moral" law and not moral law to the man. "Were the observation of the Sabbath a natural duty," justly remarks Bishop Warburton, "it is certain that man was made for the Sabbath; the end of his creation being for the observance of the moral law. On the contrary, all positive institutions were made for man." (Div. Legation, b. 4, sec. 6, note.) This furnishes another proof that the fourth commandment is positive, ceremonial and Jewish.

Singularly enough, J. N. B. quotes a part of this very passage to confirm its obligation! "'The Sabbath was made for man,' that is, not for the benefit of that peculiar nation, but for the good of the whole human race." To read this alone, one would think that the old Pharisees had been sad Sabbath-breakers, and that Jesus was trying to reform them by preaching up the universal obligation of this glorious institution; while every Bible student knows that the fact is just the contrary. It was Jesus who was the "Sabbath-breaker," (no offense to my friend this time, I hope; no great harm in breaking "shadows," you know,) and he was endeavoring to satisfy the clamors of its rigid observers, by teaching them that it had not this supreme authority over man, which they supposed, but that it was "made for man." Now, what sad nonsense does your correspondent make of this important passage: "You accuse me of breaking the Sabbath, but it was made, 'not for the benefit of' the Jew alone, 'but for the good of the whold human race!' Therefore your charge is groundless." This is logic, with a vengeance. The truth is, this much-perverted quotation was pronounced, not as a check upon the Anti-Sabbatarian, but to counteract the Sabbatarian; and honesty requires that it should not be employed for an opposite purpose.

Lastly, after Jesus had thus most distinctly and emphatically denied the morality of the Sabbath, by asserting, first, that hunger excused its breach, and, secondly, that it was entirely subservient to man, (neither of which could possibly be the case with any moral duty,) he concluded his lesson with the memorable declaration, "Therefore the Son of man is Lord even of the Sabbath!" That is, because it was a positive ordinance. How was he Lord of the Sabbath, except by having authority to alter or control it? And how would this reply have any force to the charge against him, unless he designed to teach, that being master of the institution, he could justly do that which, without such authority, he could not lawfully do? To what purpose did he assert his right to disobey the commandment, if the claim did not necessarily infer an exertion of that right? "If I have done what by this positive ordinance 'was not lawful,' know that I am Lord of the Institution; and this is my warrant for what I have done." Would Jesus have held such language concerning an obligation of morality? Did he ever claim the right to infringe or to alter a moral precept?

I sincerely trust that J. N. B. will now be "less surprised" at the conclusion arrived at, than he was on its former announcement. The passages in Matt. 12: 2, Mark 2: 25, John 5: 10, 9: 16, must have escaped his memory, when he observed, "This is the first time I remember to have seen 'him who knew no sin' charged with a 'studied and repeated violation' of the law." While thus confirming the charge, I hope I shall be relieved from the imputation of exhibiting any "malice prepense."

4. The fourth proposition, that the observance of the Sabbath is never once enjoined or even encouraged by the New Testament writers, and that, on the other hand, "Sabbath-breaking" is never once condemned by them, "has more show of truth," says my obliging friend, "than any of the preceding." Considering upon what impregnable foundations of scriptural authority these have been established, such an encomium is as satisfactory as it is ingenuous, and leaves but little occasion for any further illustration of this position. A single passage has been diffidently suggested by J. N. B.; it is where Paul reminds Timothy that "the law" is made for the lawless and disobedient, for the ungodly and for sinners, for unholy and profane." 1 Tim. 1: 9. After so liberal a concession, courtesy alone would forbid my being captious with his quotation. I therefore leave it, congratulating him on its applicability, and wishing him joy of all its deductions.

The comprehensiveness of the subject has already so extended the present communication, that I am compelled reluctantly to defer the consideration of the two remaining propositions to another occasion. EXODUS.

MY LITTLE DAUGHTER'S SHOES.

BY CHARLES JAMES SPRAGUE.

Two little rough-worn, stubbed shoes,
A plump, well-trodden pair,
With striped stockings thrust within,
Lie just beside my chair.

Of very homely fabric they,
A hole is in each toe;
They might have cost, when they were new,
Some fifty cents or so.

And yet this worn-out pair
Is richer far to me
Than all the jeweled sandals are,
Of Eastern luxury.

This mottled leather, cracked with use,
Is satin in my sight;
These little tarnished buttons shine
With all a diamond's light.

Search through the wardrobe of the world!
You shall not find me there
So rarely made, so richly wrought,
So glorious a pair.

And why? Because they tell of her,
Now sound asleep above,
Whose form is moving beauty, and
Whose heart is beating love.

They tell me of her merry laugh,
Her rich, whole-hearted glee,
Her gentleness, her innocence,
And infant purity.

They tell me that her wavering steps
Will long demand my aid;
For the old road of human life
Is very roughly laid.

High hills and swift descents abound;
And, in so rude a way,
Feet that can wear these coverings
Would surely go astray.

Sweet little girl! be mine the task
Thy feeble steps to tend!
To be thy guide, thy counselor,
Thy playmate and thy friend!

And when my steps shall faltering grow,
And thine be firm and strong,
Thy strength shall lead my tottering age
In cheerful peace along!

CLOSING SCENES IN THE LIFE OF DR. JUDSON.

Under this head, "The Macedonian" for February prints a letter from Mrs. Emily C. Judson to a sister of her late husband, giving some account of the closing scenes in the life of Dr. Judson. The letter is long, but perhaps not too long, considering the interest felt in the subject of it.

There was something exceedingly beautiful in the decline of your brother's life—more beautiful than I can describe, though the impression will remain with me as a sacred legacy, until I go to meet him where suns shall never set, and life shall never end. He had been, from my first acquaintance with him, an uncommonly spiritual Christian, exhibiting his richest graces in the unguarded intercourse of private life; but during his last year it seemed as though the light of the world on which he was entering had been sent to brighten his upward pathway. Every subject on which we conversed, every book we read, every incident that occurred, whether trivial or important, had a tendency to suggest some peculiarly spiritual train of thought, till it seemed to me, more than ever before, "that Christ was all his theme." Something of the same nature was also noted in his preaching, to which I then had not the privilege of listening. He was in the habit, however, of studying his subject for the Sabbath audibly, and in my presence, at which time he was frequently so much affected as to weep, and sometimes so overwhelmed with the vastness of his conceptions, as to be obliged to abandon his theme and choose another. My own illness at the commencement of the year had brought eternity very near to us, and rendered death, the grave, and the bright heaven beyond it, familiar subjects of conversation. Gladly would I give you, my dear sister, some idea of the share borne by him in those memorable conversations; but it would be impossible to convey, even to those who knew him best, the most distant conception. I believe he has sometimes been thought eloquent, both in conversation and in the sacred desk; but the fervid, burning eloquence, the deep pathos, the touching tenderness, the elevation of thought, and intense beauty of expression, which characterized those private teachings, were not only beyond what I had ever heard before, but such as I felt sure arrested his own attention, and surprised even himself. About this time he began to find unusual satisfaction and enjoyment in his private devotions; and seemed to have new objects of interest continually rising in his mind, each of which in turn became special subjects of prayer. Among these, one of the most prominent was the conversion of his posterity. He remarked that he had always prayed for his children, but that of late he had felt impressed with the duty of praying for their children, and their children's children, down to the latest generation. He also prayed most fervently, that his impressions on this particular subject might be transferred to his sons' sons and daughters, and thence to their offspring, so that he should ultimately meet a long, unbroken line of descendants before the throne of God, where all might join together in ascribing everlasting praises to their Redeemer.

Another subject, which occupied a large share of his attention, was that of brotherly love. You are, perhaps, aware, that like all persons of his ardent temperament, he was subject to strong attachments and aversions, which he sometimes had great difficulty in bringing under the controling influence of divine grace. He remarked that he had always felt more or less of an affectionate interest in his brethren as brethren—and some of them he had loved very dearly for their personal qualities; but that he was now aware he had never placed his standard of love high enough. He spoke of them as children of God, redeemed by the Saviour's blood, watched over and guarded by his love, dear to his heart, honored by him in the election, and to be honored hereafter before the assembled universe; and he said it was not sufficient to be kind and obliging to such, to refrain from evil speaking, and make a general mention of them in our prayers; but our attachment to them should be of the most ardent and exalted character—it would be so in heaven, and we lost immeasurably by not beginning now. "As I have loved you, so ought ye to love one another," was a precept continually in his mind, and he would often murmur, as though unconsciously, "As I have loved you—as I have loved you"—then burst out with the exclamation, "O the love of Christ! the love of Christ!"

His prayers for the mission were marked by an earnest, grateful enthusiasm, and in speaking of missionary operations in general, his tone was one of elevated triumph, almost of exultation—for he not only felt an unshaken confidence in their final success, but would often exclaim, "What wonders—oh, what wonders God has already wrought!"

I remarked that during this year his literary labor, which he had never liked and upon which he had entered unwillingly, and from a feeling of necessity, was growing daily more irksome to him; and he always spoke of it as his "heavy work," his "tedious work," "that wearisome dictionary," &c., though this feeling led to no relaxation of effort. He longed, however, to find some more spiritual employment, to be engaged in what he considered more legitimate missionary labor, and drew delightful pictures of the future, when his whole business would be but to preach and pray.

During all this time I had not observed any failure in physical strength; and though his mental exercises occupied a large share of my thoughts when alone, it never once occurred to me that this might be the brightening of the setting sun; my only feeling was that of pleasure, that one so near to me was becoming so pure and elevated in his sentiments, and so lovely and Christ-like in his character. In person, he had grown somewhat stouter than when in America, his complexion had a healthful hue compared with that of his associates generally; and though by no means a person of uniformly firm health, he seemed to possess such vigor and strength of constitution, that I thought his life as likely to be extended twenty years longer as that of any member of the mission. He continued his system of morning exercise, commenced when a student at Andover, and was not satisfied with a common walk on level ground, but always chose an up-hill path, and then frequently went bounding on his way, with all the exuberant activity of boyhood.

He was of a singularly happy temperament, although not of that even cast, which never rises above a certain level, and is never depressed. Possessing acute sensibilities, suffering with those who suffered, and entering as readily into the joys of the presperous and happy, he was variable in his mood; but religion formed such an essential element in his character, and his trust in Providence was so implicit and habitual, that he was never gloomy, and seldom more than momentarily disheartened. On the other hand, being accustomed to regard all the events of this life, however minute and painful, as ordered in wisdom, and tending to one great and glorious end, he lived in almost constant obedience to the apostolic injunction, "Rejoice evermore!" He often told me, that although he had endured much personal suffering, and passed through many fearful trials in the course of his eventful life, a kind Providence had also hedged him around with precious, peculiar blessings, so that his joys had far outnumbered his sorrows.

Toward the close of September of last year, he said to me one evening, "What deep cause have we for gratitude to God!—do you believe there are any other two persons in the wide world so happy as we are?" enumerating, in his own earnest manner, several sources of happiness, in which our work as missionaries, and our eternal prospects, occupied a prominent position. When he had finished his glowing picture, I remarked, (I scarcely know why, but there was a heavy cloud upon my spirits that evening,) "We are certainly very happy now, but it cannot be so always—I am thinking of the time when one of us must stand beside the bed, and see the other die."

"Yes," he said, "that will be a sad moment; I felt it most deeply a little while ago, but now it would not be strange if your life was prolonged beyond mine—though I should wish, if it were possible, to spare you that pain. It is the one left alone who suffers, not the one who goes to be with Christ. If it should only be the will of God that we might go together, like young James and his wife. But he will order all things well, and we can safely trust our future to his hands."

That same night we were roused from sleep by the sudden illness of one of the children. There was an unpleasant, chilling dampness in the air, as it came to us through the openings in the sloats above the windows, which affected your brother very sensibly, and he soon began to shiver so violently that he was obliged to return to his couch, where he remained under a warm covering until morning. In the morning he awoke with a severe cold, accompanied by some degree of fever, but as it did not seem very serious, and our three children were all suffering from a similar cause, we failed to give it any especial attention. From that time he was never well, though in writing to you before I think I dated the commencement of his illness from the month of November, when he laid aside his studies. I knew that he regarded this attack as trifling, and yet one evening he spent a long time in advising me with regard to my future course, if I should be deprived of his guidance; saying that it is always wise to be prepared for exigencies of this nature. After the month of November, he failed gradually, occasionally rallying in such a manner as to deceive us all, but at each relapse sinking lower than at the previous one, though still full of hope and courage, and yielding ground only, inch by inch, as compelled by the triumphant progress of disease. During some hours of every day he suffered intense pain; but his naturally buoyant spirits and uncomplaining disposition led him to speak so lightly of it, that I used sometimes to fear the doctor, though a very skillful man, would be fatally deceived.

As his health declined, his mental exercises at first seemed deepened; and he gave still large portions of his time to prayer, conversing with the utmost freedom on his daily progress, and the extent of his self-conquest. Just before our trip to Mergui, which took place in January, he looked up from his pillow one day with sudden animation, and said to me earnestly, "I have gained the victory at last. I love every one of Christ's redeemed as I believe he would have me love them—in the same manner, though not probably in the same degree as we shall love one another in heaven; and gladly would I prefer the meanest of his creatures, who bears his name besides myself." This he said in allusion to the text, "In honor preferring one another," on which he had frequently dwelt with great emphasis. After further similar conversation he concluded, "And now here I lie in peace with all the world, and what is better still, at peace with my own conscience. I know that I am a miserable sinner in the sight of God, with no hope but in the blessed Saviour's merits; but I cannot think of any particular fault, any peculiarly besetting sin, which it is now my duty to correct. Can you tell me of any?"

And truly, from this time no other word would so well express his state of feeling, as that one of his own choosing—peace. He had no particular exercises afterwards, but remained calm and serene, speaking of himself daily as a great sinner, who had been overwhelmed with benefits, and declaring that he had never in his life before had such delightful views of the unfathomable love and infinite condescension of the Saviour, as were now daily opening before him. "Oh, the love of Christ! the love of Christ!" he would suddenly exclaim, while his eye kindled, and the tears chased each other down his cheeks, "we cannot understand it now, but what a beautiful study for eternity!"

SPIRITUAL RECOGNITIONS.

A little girl, in a family of my acquaintance, a lovely and precious child, lost her mother at an age too early to fix the loved features in her remembrance. She was as frail as beautiful, and as the bud of her heart unfolded, it seemed as if won by that mother's prayers to turn instinctively heavenward. The sweet, conscientious, and prayer-loving child, was the idol of the bereaved family. But she faded away early. She would lie upon the lap of the friend who took a mother's kind care of her, and, winding one wasted arm around her neck, would say; "Now tell me about my mamma!" And when the oft-told tale had been repeated, she would ask, softly: "Take me into the parlor; I want to see my mamma." The request was never refused; and the affectionate child would lie for hours, contentedly gazing on her mother's portrait. But

> "Pale and wan she grew, and weakly—
> Bearing all her pain so meekly,
> That to them she still grew dearer,
> As the trial hour drew nearer!"

That hour came at last, and the weeping neighbors assembled to see the little child die. The dew of death was already on the flower, as its life-sun was going down. The little chest heaved faintly—spasmodically.

"Do you know me, darling?" sobbed, close in her ear, the voice that was dearest; but it awoke no answer.

All at once a brightness, as if from the upper world, burst over the child's colorless countenance. The eyelids flashed open, the lids parted, the wan, cuddling hands flew up, in the little one's last impulsive effort, as she looked piercingly into the far above.

"Mother!" she cried, with surprise and transport in her tone—and passed with that breath into her mother's bosom.

Said a distinguished divine, who stood by that bed of joyous death:

"If I had never believed in the ministration of departed ones before, I could not doubt it now!"

"Peace I leave with you," said the wisest Spirit that ever passed from earth to heaven. Let us be at "peace," amid the spirit-mysteries and questionings on which His eye shall soon shed the light of eternity.

[National Era.

STARTING IN THE WORLD.—Many an unwise parent labors hard and lives sparingly all his life, for the purpose of leaving enough to give his children a start in the world, as it is called. Setting a young man afloat with money left him by his relatives, is like tying bladders under him—he loses his bladders and he goes to the bottom. Teach him to swim and he will never need the bladders. Give your child a sound education, and you have done enough for him. See to it that his morals are pure, his mind cultivated, and his whole nature made subservient to the laws which govern man, and you have done what will be of more value than the wealth of the Indias. You have given him a start which no misfortune can deprive him of. The earlier you teach him to depend upon his own resources the better.

A CLERGYMAN'S LIFE.—To a person who regretted to the celebrated Dr. Johnson that he had not been a clergyman, because he considered the life of a clergyman an easy and comfortable one, the doctor made this memorable reply:—

"The life of a conscientious clergyman is not easy. I have always considered a clergyman as the father of a larger family than he is able to maintain. No, sir, I do not envy a clergyman's life, nor do I envy the clergyman who makes it an easy life."

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, February 20, 1851.

The proposition of "Exodus," that "the Sabbath was strictly a ceremonial institution," is one which cannot be fairly sustained. Both the disputants seem to be somewhat befogged, however. One of them has no difficulty in determining that the Sabbath is a positive institution, and appears to think that it is therefore ceremonial. The other seems to think that it must be moral, because it is classed with nine others that are confessedly so. "Every other command in the Decalogue," says he, "is acknowledged to be of a moral nature. How happens it that the fourth should be an exception? It is not an exception. So far from being 'strictly ceremonial,' it is eminently moral." He is obliged to admit, nevertheless, that the particular day belongs to positive law, and even goes so far as to say, that a "weekly Sabbath, rather than one oftener, or more seldom, is not of itself obvious; and every tenth day, or every fifth, or any other proportion, might have its advocates." Of this admission "Exodus" is not slow to avail himself, and proves that "J. N. B." must, according to his own principles, give up the notion that the Sabbath is "eminently moral." "This vague, problematical interval of time 'not of itself obvious,' must either be accepted as part of the moral law, or I hand back to my friend the question, 'How happens it that it should be an exception?'"

Allowing the distinction of moral and positive laws to be just, we think that "Exodus" has the advantage of "J. N. B." in this question. But, because a law is positive, it by no means follows that it is ceremonial. It only follows, that man would not have been obliged, by the law of nature, to keep a weekly Sabbath, had there been no positive institution, and that God could revoke the institution if he pleased. It does not follow, that the institution was intended as a type of Christ, or of the Gospel dispensation. In this conclusion "Exodus" greatly errs, and his attempt to fortify it by Exod. 31: 13, 17, and Ezek. 20: 12, which characterize the Sabbath as a "sign" between God and the children of Israel, is, in our opinion, a complete failure. We ask his attention, and the attention of all our readers, to the passages referred to. To our mind, they prove the universality of the institution. The Sabbath is indeed called a "sign." But of what? That to the Israelites was committed the ceremonial law—the Levitical service—that system which was designed as a shadow of things to come? Not at all. No such sentiment is taught in these texts. But, that the God who had "sanctified" the Israelites—separated them from other nations to be his own people—was Jehovah, the self-existent God, the Creator of all things. This is what the Sabbath was a "sign" of. This is what it betokened to all who turned their wondering eyes to that remarkable nation. The heathen nations, not acknowledging nor worshiping Jehovah the Creator as their God, but being set apart to the worship of dumb idols, did not observe an institution which so emphatically bespeaks the Creator of "heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is." But when they shall turn to the worship of the Creator of all, the Sabbath will become, between Him and them, a "sign" of this very thing; yea, of the very same thing of which it was a "sign" between Him and the Israelites. "It is a sign between me and you, that ye may know that I am Jehovah [not a dumb idol] that doth sanctify you." "It is a sign between me and the children of Israel forever; for [because] in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, and on the seventh day he rested, and was refreshed."

To "J. N. B." it probably appears strange, that a positive institution should be bound up with nine others "eminently moral," and all written upon stone tablets, and deposited in the ark. He seems to think that the infinitely wise God would not have made such an unnatural classification; and, for the sake of vindicating the Divine Wisdom, he goes zealously to work to show that the Sabbath is a moral institution. "Exodus," on the other hand, sees very clearly, that it is a positive institution; and because this is so evident, he imagines that no force of logic can fairly class it any where else than with the positive institutions of the ceremonial law. Unnatural as it may seem to rend it from its companionship with the other nine precepts of the Decalogue, he would much rather do it than stultify his own intellect by pretending that it is a moral precept. That it should be an important part of the moral law, and yet be a positive precept, neither he nor his opponent seems to comprehend.

Our plain and unpretending opinion is simply this: That the Bible reveals as many as three distinct systems of religion; or, perhaps, it would be more correct to say, three different parts of one religion, viz. the Moral Law, Judaism, and Christianity. The first of these was the religion of man in a state of innocency. The transgression of it made him a sinner, and thus the way was prepared for the introduction of Christianity. But before the time came for the introduction of Christianity as a perfected and finished scheme of righteousness, Judaism, as a shadow or typical representation of it, was set before the Israelites as the religion which they were diligently to observe. Christianity, however, does not set aside the Moral Law, or annul one jot or tittle of its claims. It is rather a "power" (Rom. 1: 16) to bring man back to conformity to it. Now it would seem that the wisdom of God judges no system of religion complete, unless there is incorporated with it one or more positive institutions. Christianity, therefore, has its Baptism and its Supper. Judaism has its Passover, its Feast of Tabernacles, and numerous others; in fact, it is pretty much made up of positive institutions. The Moral Law is not unique in this respect; it has its Sabbath. Such is the arrangement of Infinite Wisdom. Carnal wisdom may object to it as unnecessary, but we believe that every well-instructed mind will justify the wisdom that appointed positive institutions. They serve to promote a more thorough conformity of the worshipers to the systems of which they are respectively parts. Therefore the Sabbath, positive though it may be, is made a part of that system of religion denominated the Moral Law. Viewed in this light, its association with nine other precepts, all "eminently moral," is by no means an unnatural one. It is just as it ought to be. The idea of its being abrogated by the Gospel, because it was a positive institution, is not only unnecessary, but wholly inadmissible. A positive institution is not abrogated, unless the system of which it forms a part is also abrogated. The positive institutions of Judaism are all abrogated, because the system itself is abrogated. Those of Christianity will stand as long as the Gospel dispensation continues. So the Sabbath must stand as long as the Moral Law continues in force. We have said all this before, in other connections, but controversy creates the necessity of reitering the same things often.

The attempt of "Exodus" to make Col. 2: 16 sustain his position, that the Sabbath was a ceremonial institution, fulfilled by the death of Christ, is very well met by his antagonist. We add, that if God has made the Sabbath to cease under the Gospel, it has been done by way of fulfilling a prediction of the prophet: "I will cause all her mirth to cease, her feast days, her new moons, and her Sabbaths, and all her solemn feasts." Hos. 2: 11. But has the weekly Sabbath been made to cease among the Israelites? Do they not observe it still? Yet all those Sabbaths, and other festivals, which were typical of Christ, have been made to cease. Not one of them is observed according to the law. The festivals which the Jews keep in their dispersion, do not answer the divine requirement, for it was necessary that they should be celebrated at Jerusalem. Nevertheless, in this prophecy all Sabbath days, without exception, are as clearly included as in Col. 2: 16. Still, we see, there is a limitation of its application. Is the language of the Apostle "comprehensive and unqualified?" Not more so than that of the prophet. Why, then, does "Exodus" so pertinaciously insist that "all Sabbath days are equally included?"

There is one other text which we wish to cite in this connection; it is a very notable one; we hope both "J. N. B." and "Exodus" will ponder it well: "And he shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws." Dan. 7: 25. The use which we would make of the text is this: The prophecy looks forward to a period under the Gospel dispensation—to such a period as Paul hinted at in 2 Thess. 2: 3, 4, &c. It speaks very significantly of a change of "times," to be effected, not by Christ or his Apostles, but by some body whom Daniel calls the "little horn." It looks wondrously as if the Gospel did lend its sanction to holy time, "Exodus" to the contrary notwithstanding. For, if there was no holy time under the Gospel, how would the "little horn" effect any "change" of time? This text, therefore, must refer to the weekly Sabbath; for no other holy season, revealed in the Old Testament, was ever supposed to be sanctioned by the New. We especially commend the text to the attention of "J. N. B.," hoping that if he should ever be called to grapple with such an antagonist as "Exodus" again, he will use it. In the mean time, we hope he will put himself in a position to use it without condemning himself. Has the "little horn" ever changed the "Lord's day?" But he has changed God's rest-day into a working day, and one of God's appointed working days—the first day of the week—the day upon which God himself began to work—into a rest-day. "He shall think to change TIMES."

One thing more, and we have done with our disputants for this week. "Exodus" imagines that our Saviour's declaration, "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath," means, "The Sabbath is subordinate to man, and not man to the Sabbath." Be it so, for the sake of argument. The most that can be proved by it is, that in those cases where a rigid observance of the institution comes into conflict with that great moral principle involved in the expression, 'I will have mercy, and not sacrifice,' the latter is to be preferred. But by no means does it prove that the Sabbath was ceremonial, or was on the point of vanishing away. The Sabbath is so subordinate to man, that it shall never be the means of oppressing him. Therefore the Son of Man, in his capacity of "Lord of the Sabbath," shall vindicate it from all those austerities, and divest it of all those restrictions, which have made it burdensome. Those who, in their ignorance, imagined that they might not even do work enough on that day to satisfy the cravings of nature, did mistake its design, and rendered it burdensome.

"Jesus studiously and repeatedly violated the Sabbath," says "Exodus." "Studiously!" Only think of the expression! And he brings the matter about the corn-field as proof! Did the disciples, in this case, any more "studiously" violate the Sabbath, than David and the young men with him did about a thousand years before? At that time the Sabbath was in its full vigor. It had been five hundred years in existence, according to the doctrine of "Exodus," and had at least a thousand years to run. Did David "studiously" violate it? He did, if the disciples did; for the two cases are shown by the Saviour to be precisely parallel. The truth is, these departures from rigidness were not properly violations of the Sabbath. The Sabbath was rather honored by them, for it was thus shown what a humane and benevolent institution it was, looking always to the benefit of man, for whom it was made. The disciples departed from rigidness—such unnecessary rigidness as the Pharisees would enjoin—and yet they were "guiltless." This could not be, if their departures were, in any just sense, violations. On the whole, we think that "J. N. B." manages this point very well. We very much suspect, however, that were he disputing with a Seventh-day Baptist, he would blunder into the same inconsistency of his opponent. Like "Exodus," we should have him asking, "How was he [Christ] Lord of the Sabbath, except by having authority to alter or control it?" And, like "Exodus," we should find him maintaining, that our Lord's direct assertion of his right to change the Sabbath was, by necessary implication, an assertion of his intent to do so. He needs to study his subject well.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 27.

GLASGOW, January 24th, 1851.

In chronicling the details of our Sunday-observance agitation, we expressed the conviction, that the issue would be more general desecration of that day—if it be right to use the word "desecration" in reference to a day which God has not sanctified. Our anticipation in this respect is confessedly verified. Even the editor of "Evangelical Christendom," the organ of the Alliance Party, in the number for the present month, says that Sunday-breaking "threatens now to become more prevalent and better established than ever. Cheap excursion trains, on nearly all the railways, have multiplied the acts of desecration, and under a show of relieving the poor of our great towns, flood the country with a stream of ungodliness and pollution."

On Monday last, at the London Clerkenwell Police Office, Mr. James, the Clerk to the Holborn Union, with some of the Parish Officers of St. Andrews, Holborn, instituted a number of prosecutions before Mr. Combe, the sitting judge, "for selling and calling out oranges, &c.," the preceding day, being Sunday. The means adopted for obtaining a conviction were not straight forward—and the prosecutors were defeated in their purpose. They did not ask for punishment as the violation of a law sanctifying Sunday; but endeavored to convict the parties, under the Police Act, of obstructing the pavement, as it was alledged that two or three of the offenders would stand together upon it, or carry their baskets before them, calling out, "Two a penny, oranges." Mr. Combe, however, decided that "there is no law to prevent the selling of oranges in the streets on Sunday." It "is not illegal under the Police Act, which was intended to prevent obstruction," if the parties do not set down their baskets on the pavement. Mr. Combe added, that under the Sunday Trading Act even, although the parties might try such cases, it "would be very difficult to proceed. They may call oranges all over the country if they like." The police employed on the occasion said they would not have interfered had not the parish required them to do so; and although one of the officers was struck by one of those charged, in resisting the attempt to make him prisoner, he also was discharged, on the ground that he only resisted an illegal act on the part of the officer.

As the period of the opening of Parliament approaches, there is an increasing interest manifested as to what Government intends to do on the Papal Question. The Government organs, however, seem more than ordinarily shy in giving even definite hints. Frequent meetings of the Cabinet Council have been held during the last ten days; and the Morning Herald of yesterday says it has reason to believe that Lord Clarendon, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, has resigned office; while it has of late been affirmed that Lord John Russell maintains the decision that his famous letter to the Bishop of Durham seemed to express. The Queen herself, who is expected to deliver the Speech to Parliament in person, is said to have required an amendment on the draught of it, giving a more decided expression to the Government's purpose of resisting "the aggression." In the beginning of the month, it was announced that Lady Lyttleton (a Pusseyite) had been compelled to resign her charge as Governess of the Royal Family. If correct, these statements would seem to imply a purpose to resist the Papal measures on the part of Government; but the difficult question seems to be, what shape that resistance should take. As a letter from the Premier to the Bishop of Durham raised the commotion—which still goes on through the medium of public meetings, and the publication of innumerable pamphlets and books—so also is a recent letter by the same Bishop to his clergy regarded as most distinctly foreshadowing what those meditated measures are. If so, the Jesuits are to be required absolutely to leave the country; and English dioceses to be prohibited—even if in Ireland they are permitted. As the authority which appoints Bishops to dioceses does so as part of the restoration of the canon law, invading the liberty and endangering the life of every Protestant, as that law does, we cannot contemplate its rejection as a national wrong; while we regard the permission of any Government to such an unscrupulous fratenity as the misnamed brotherhood of Jesus to mingle with its subjects as inhuman. They are restrained by no principle of morality from any atrocity to serve the church's cause. It is stated, that one of their number has just been recognized breaking stones on one of the roads in Gloucestershire—his object, it is supposed, being to mix with the lowest of the people, to ascertain their feelings, and, under the disguise, to instil opinions favorable to their purposes. Simultaneously, this month, our two most influential periodicals, the Edinburgh and the Quarterly Reviews, discuss this question; the latter recommending a Concordat with Rome, the former denouncing such a measure as gifting, in measure, to the Pope, the rights and liberties we now enjoy. No Protestant has ever said more severe things against Popery than Father Garassi, an Italian Barnabite monk, the past three Sundays, to his countrymen assembled in London. Even in translation, these addresses are full of burning eloquence, and words of bitterest sarcasm. They are, however, probably, the utterance of patriotism only, unchastened by the power of the Gospel, of which they contain but little indication. But even for the want of this in her children, "Popedom," as he terms it, may be answerable.

We have always desired to see in this movement more of a spirit willing honestly to return to the Word of God, on the part of Protestants themselves—and have complained that it is so much awanting. In reply to the Appeal of influential Laymen of the Church of England, addressed last month to the Archbishop of Canterbury, in relation to the present posture of affairs, and a proposed "alteration of the Prayer Book," in so far as it is assimilated to Romish views, the Archbishop said, "Men's minds are at present in so excited a state that any alteration of the Prayer Book or Act of Uniformity is farther removed than ever." It now appears, however, that Lord Ashley is to propose a Bill to Parliament having this object in view; and the Morning Chronicle (a very decided Pusseyistic organ at present) yesterday bitterly intimates that the Premier has resolved to support measures to be taken with this design. No very satisfactory alterations are to be expected; but the discussion thus occasioned may elicit truth, and prove useful.

The Sabbath Recorder lately adverted to an increased use of opium throughout the United States. It is remarkable, that attention has been repeatedly called to the same fact as applicable to England—especially among "teetotalers." A correspondent of the Nonconformist lately said, that among this class, all over the country, there are many betaking to it as a stimulant. He gives the statement of a druggist in one of the towns of the West Riding, confirmatory of this. Should the use of this drug come to be general, the effects, we fear, from its growing demand upon its victim, may be worse than those resulting from the most intemperate abuse of alcoholic liquids. Sad individual cases have been here referred to, in which, beginning with the use of it as laudanum, the liquid has afterwards been abandoned as insipid, and the solid opium been used, with the frenzy following of which we read in China.

J. A. BEGG.

DR. BACON ON THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

The Independent of last week contained an article on the Fugitive Slave Law, from the pen of Rev. Dr. Bacon, who is now traveling through Europe, and dates his letter at Rome. The following extracts give the gist of the matter:—

"By the laws of nature and of nations, a slave, whenever he has the opportunity of putting himself beyond the reach of the laws that enslave him, has a right to do so, and by so doing becomes legally free."

"Our own Government not only acknowledges the right of every man to improve his social condition by expatriating himself and seeking a new home under other institutions, but it incorporates that right into its laws. It naturalizes all comers who are willing to abjure the allegiance in which they were born; and having naturalized them, it undertakes to defend them against all the claims of other sovereignties and other laws. Not only so, but our Government, and even our existence as a people, is founded on that right. We have asserted and maintained that right by arms, not only in our war for Independence, but in our second war with the foremost empire in the world. Who will tell us that a native of Virginia has not as good a right to expatriate himself as a Hungarian or an Italian, a Russian or an Irishman? By the laws of Nature, then, as understood and accepted throughout the civilized world, and especially as acted upon by our own Government, the slave, when he escapes from the reach of the laws which enslave him, becomes free by the exercise of a natural and inalienable right."

"The Constitution does not forbid me, as a citizen of a free State, to exercise hospitality toward any man, of whatever complexion, who calls at my door and asks for food or raiment or shelter. It does not require me to presume that the poor wanderer is a fugitive, from a Southern State; or if I know that he is a fugitive, it does not require me to presume that his master has any purpose or even a wish to reclaim him; or if I know that his master is in pursuit of him, and that the hounds of oppression are close upon his track, the Constitution does not require me even then to betray the trembling outcast. Nor would I betray him, God helping me, though every human power commanded me to perpetrate the baseness, and Nebuchadnezzar's fiery furnace were the penalty."

THE NEXT PEACE CONGRESS.

To the Friends of Peace in the United States:—

It is well known to the people of this country, that there have been held, within the last seven or eight years, four General Peace Congresses in the Old World—the first in London in 1843, the next at Brussels in 1848, the third at Paris in 1849, and the fourth at Frankfort in Germany last summer; each attended by a large number of delegates from different and distant parts of Christendom, and many of them distinguished not only for their talents, learning and philanthropy, but for their high standing and influence in society, church and state; men speaking various languages, living under almost every form of government, and professing a wide diversity of political and religious views, yet all drawn together by their attachment to the cause of peace as an object of common and absorbing interest to the whole human race.

These Congresses have served, as they were designed, to promote fraternal intercourse, and strengthen the bonds of amity between the people of different countries; to bring the friends of peace in particular into fuller acquaintance with each other in their great work; to devise and agree upon the best means of accomplishing their object, permanent peace among all nations; to present and keep this object more prominently before the world, as a grand desideratum of the age; and especially to fix the attention both of people and of rulers on the duty, importance and feasibility of gradually abating the enormous evils of the present war-system, and finally superseding its alledged necessity, by the adoption of rational, peaceful, Christian substitutes, far more efficacious than the sword for all purposes of international justice, security and peace.

The next of these world-congresses is to be held at London, probably about the middle of the coming July, in connection with the World's Industrial Exhibition, that grand development of the new and better spirit which has begun to pervade the nations; a demonstration that would have been impossible fifty or even twenty years ago; itself a decisive proof of the progress already made in our cause; one of the fruits of the general peace enjoyed in Europe for some third of a century, and likely to become an important auxiliary in the work of universal and permanent peace. It must of course be an occasion of great interest to all persons of enlarged, philanthropic views, and will doubtless draw together vast multitudes from every continent and well-nigh every country on the globe.

Such an opportunity for the cause of peace has never occurred in the whole history of our race; and, desirous of turning it to the best account, the American Peace Society, in concert with their co-workers in this country and in Europe, would request the friends of peace throughout the United States to aid us in procuring from their respective localities suitable delegates to the proposed Peace Congress in London next July. We address them thus early in order to give ample time for preparation. We would of course prefer the most devoted, thoroughgoing friends of our cause, more especially judicious, Christian men; but there will be required in delegates only an intelligent, cordial, active interest in the promotion of international peace; and any person of good moral character, disposed to co-operate in efforts for the abolition of war, as a custom repugnant to Christianity, and hostile to the best interests of mankind, will be welcomed to membership in the Congress. We would invite not only Peace Societies, but all other philanthropic associations, the friends of peace in any city or town, seminary of learning, and all scientific and literary societies, local churches, and ecclesiastical bodies of every denomination, to send one or more delegates. Unable ourselves to canvass the country for the purpose, we would request our friends in every part of the land to inform us, at their earliest convenience, of any suitable persons in their vicinity who may be inclined, or might be induced, to attend as delegates. The persons selected by any of the bodies we have designated, can receive, if they choose, a commission from our Society; and we request, in any event, the communication of their names to us, or to the American Peace Congress Committee, as early, if possible, as the first of June, and as much sooner as may be convenient.

The World's Industrial Exhibition is to be opened in the Spring; but, as the fee for admission will for a time be excessively high, and as all minds will be for weeks, perhaps for months, too much engrossed with that unique and magnificent demonstration to allow meanwhile a proper degree of interest in an object like ours, the Peace Congress is to be fixed at a day likely to secure the best attendance, and the largest share of public attention. We shall in due time inform our friends of the precise day of the Congress, not yet settled; but we are doubtless safe in saying now, that it will be in season for delegates to start in packets by the middle of June, or in the last steamer of that month. Past experience proves that no arrangements, satisfactory to all, can be made for taking out the delegates in a body; but we presume that a passage out and back can be had in packets from Boston, New York or Philadelphia, for $100, perhaps for $75. The former is an offer already made by some lines from the United States, and the latter by lines from Canada; so that the expense of attending the World's Industrial Exhibition and Peace Congress, need not exceed some $200; a very cheap purchase of the advantages to be derived from attendance on such a Convention and Jubilee of the World; a privilege not to be expected by any man more than once in his life.

On behalf of the American Peace Society, and by order of its Executive Committee,

CHURCH ACTION ON THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

A meeting of the Cumberland Presbyterian clergymen and other members of that Church, held at Bethel, Jan 15, adopted a strong series of resolutions against Slavery and the Fugitive Slave Law. One of the resolutions, (which were proposed by three clergymen and two laymen,) is as follows:

"That we will prepare and circulate petitions or memorials in the bounds of the Pennsylvania Presbytery, to be presented to the next General Assembly of our church, praying her to take, at least, incipient steps for the final removal of slaveholding from her communion."

At the late meeting of the Associate Reformed Presbytery of Ohio, held at Poland, Mahoning, resolutions were passed against the Fugitive Slave Law.

At the Illinois Christian Anti-Slavery Convention, held at Granville, Putnam Co., Jan. 7, non-fellowship with slaveholders was the prevailing desire, and several resolutions of this character were adopted:—

Resolved, That the complete divorce of the church and of missions from national sins, will form a new and glorious era in her history—the precursor of millennial blessedness.

A PERMANENT TEMPERANCE DOCUMENT.

The Temperance Declaration got up several years ago, and signed by eight Presidents of the United States, is soon to be put into a permanent form. The Board of Managers for the Washington National Monument, have signified to E. C Delevan their willingness to receive from him a block of marble with the Declaration inscribed upon it, and "to assign it in the great National Edifice a becoming and appropriate position." It will be placed in the structure so as to enable all succeeding Presidents to add their signatures should they desire to do so. The Declaration, as it now stands, is as follows:

"Being satisfied, from observation and experience, as well as from medical testimony, that ARDENT SPIRIT as a drink is not only needless, but hurtful, and that the entire disuse of it would tend to promote the health, the virtue, and the happiness of the community, we hereby express our conviction that, should the citizens of the United States, and especially the Young Men, discontinue entirely the use of it, they would not only promote their own personal benefit, but the good of our country and the world.

REVIVAL AT MILTON, WIS.—A letter from Bro. B. F. Bond, dated at Milton, Rock Co., Wisconsin, Feb. 4th, says that the Lord has very graciously visited the church and people of that place during the present winter. "Such a blessed time Milton never witnessed before—quite a number of our neighbors have been converted—twenty-four have joined the church by baptism—a large number of brethren from other churches, who have heretofore stood aloof, have joined us—and the good work is still going on. Elds. S. Coon and V. Hull are holding a series of meetings four miles west of Milton village."

UNION THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.—We are glad to learn that this institution, located in the City of New York, has been set free from pecuniary embarrassment, and is adding to the number of its permanent professors. For several years past the Professorship of Ecclesiastical History has been only temporarily filled; but last week a permanent Professor, Rev. Henry B. Smith, formerly of Amherst College, was inducted into the office. It is expected that the only remaining vacancy in the Seminary, the Professorship of Theology, will be filled in a few weeks by Rev. J. P. Wilson, D. D., of Philadelphia.

A CHURCH GATHERED FROM HEATHENISM.—At a recent meeting of the Board of the American Bible Society, a letter was read from the Rev. Mr. Coan, at the Sandwich Islands, remitting one hundred dollars as a donation from his church at Hilo, and stating that the same church (recently gathered from heathenism) had contributed $2,000 to various benevolent objects during the past three years—an example which churches in Christian lands may well contemplate and and imitate.

BISHOP HUGHES AND DR. BACON AT ROME.—The N. Y. Evangelist prints a letter from Rome, of recent date, saying that Bishop Hughes is there, and that the plan of making him a cardinal is much talked of. On the 5th of January Rev. Dr. Bacon, of New Haven, preached to a full audience at the American chapel, and on the next day Archbishop Hughes made a short address at the Propaganda.

PROTESTANT CHURCH AT TURIN.—We see it stated that Col. Beckwith, the well-known friend of the Waldenses, has succeeded in obtaining from the Piedmont Government permission to build a Protestant church for Italians at Turin. A fine site has been purchased, and preparations are in progress to erect a suitable building during the next Summer.

COLORED MISSIONARIES FOR AFRICA.—The Southern Baptist Board have appointed the Rev. Mr. Harden, of Baltimore, to their missions in Africa. A colored man of much promise is pursuing a course of education in the same city, with a view to labor among his countrymen under the care of the P. Episcopal Church.

THE GREAT INDUSTRIAL EXHIBITION.

The labors of two thousand men, directed by consummate skill and untiring energy, have brought nearly to completion that wonder of the age, the Crystal Palace for the Great Industrial Exhibition. The Railway Companies are making extensive preparations for the transportation of the hundreds of thousands who are expected "up to London" during the Exhibition. And now the question arises, how are all these people to be fed and lodged? Various plans are proposed, and numerous establishments are in process of erection; but it is likely that notwithstanding all that has been done, or will be done, much inconvenience will be experienced in this respect. The following description of one unique establishment in preparation for the working classes, will give some idea of the scale upon which it is thought necessary to do these things:—

"There would be in it two sleeping-rooms, containing an area of 25,000 feet, and two other dormitories of half the size. These four rooms were calculated to provide accommodation for 1,000 persons per night. Every lodger would have his separate bedroom, and it would be separated from all the others by a partition seven feet high. The upper part of the apartments would be open for the purpose of ventilation. In each room would be a good bed, and every man would have the key of his own dormitory. Each room would be five feet wide and six and a half feet long, with a bedstead extending down one side of it, upon which would be a hair or a wool mattress, with ample blankets, sheets, &c. Then the dining room would have an area of 2,500 feet, and the reading and smoking rooms would be of the same size. On the top of the building was a lantern 1,500 feet square, from which visitors could obtain an excellent view of 'Old Father Thames,' and the surrounding country. As to the victualing department, hot rolls would be baked upon the premises, and the mode of charging for food would be such that every man would only pay for just what he ate. Mr. Harrison's opinion was that a very decent breakfast would be had for 4d. or 6d., and a good dinner for 8d.; and there would be no lack of provisions there, for the contracts were already entered into. The price of lodgings would be 15d. per night, including attendance. Boots would be cleaned for a penny per pair; the barber would attend to their heads and chins equally cheap; and there would be a room for luggage, the charge for storage in which would be one halfpenny. An omnibus would run between the Mechanics' House and the Exhibition, the fare by which would be one penny."

An Indian Chief turned Preacher.—The Indian Advocate gives some account of Chilly McIntosh, better known as Gen. McIntosh, head war chief of the Creek Nation, who has been regularly ordained to the work of the gospel ministry, and is now in the employ of the Baptist Indian Board. That paper says of him:—

"Brother McIntosh is a man of good address and education, well read in general history and literature, and has been for a long time a devoted reader of the Bible. His age, and intimate knowledge of the manners, customs, and laws of his Nation, fit him preëminently for usefulness, and we look forward, with ardent expectation, to the results of his valuable coöperation in advancing the social and spiritual interests of his people."

A good Example.—The Presbyterian Herald, of Louisville, publishes a letter from a preacher who has recently met with the following strange treatment, which, he says, was as new to himself as he presumes it is unknown to most of his ministerial brethren:

"On my last visit, at the close of a year, during which I had preached every sixth Sabbath in a little Scottish church, amidst the long-leaved pines of Eastern Mississippi, every dollar of my salary was paid without a frown or complaint."

Encouraging from Hayti.—The American Baptist has a letter from Mrs. Judd, the wife of the Baptist Free Missionary in Hayti, who reports that Mr. Judd had recently baptized six converts, all females, at St. Marc. There are said to be twelve others at that place all desiring baptism, and Mrs. J. says the work has but just commenced.

Rescue of a Fugitive Slave.—In Boston, last Sabbath morning, a colored man named Shadrach was arrested as a fugitive from slavery. After a brief examination before the Commissioner, the case was adjourned to Third-day, Feb. 18th. In the afternoon, however, a band of colored men came upon the officers who had charge of the alledged fugitive, overpowered them, and bore the prisoner off in triumph.

Return of Dr. Stillman.—Our friend and correspondent Dr. J. D. B. Stillman returned from California last week in good health and spirits. He came by the interesting and adventurous route through Central America, of which he encourages us to expect some account in due time.

Latest from our Missionaries.—The last English steamer brought a letter from Bro. Carpenter, dated Shanghai, Nov. 13th, at which time our missionaries were well. They had just purchased a lot for their Chapel, inside the east gate, on one of the greatest thoroughfares of the city.

☞ The N. Y. Daily Tribune of the 13th inst., says: "A telegraph dispatch from New Orleans, dated February 8, announces the death of Mr. J. Harvey Stillman, of this city. Mr. S. was with his cousin, the late Alfred Stillman, on board the ill-fated Anglo-Norman, at the time of the explosion of that steamer. He was blown some distance into the air, and, falling into the river, was picked up by a small boat, with, as was supposed, a slight injury. He was a young man of promise, and had long been engaged in the service of Messrs. Stillman, Allen & Co."

General Intelligence.

Proceedings in Congress Last Week.

Second-day, Feb. 10.

In the Senate, several petitions were presented for the establishment of a line of steamers to Africa, against amending the Patent laws, and against the Fugitive Slave law. Mr. Bright introduced a bill explanatory of the fugitive law, declaring that suits pending and rights existing under the law of 1793, were not in any way affected by the act of 1850. The bill from the House, making appropriations to supply deficiencies, was taken up, and several amendments reported by the Committee on Finance were agreed to. The amendment by the same Committee, appropriating $754,000 to defray all the claims and demands against the United States by the Cherokee Indians, was agreed to. Several unimportant amendments were proposed, debated, and agreed to, and the bill ordered to be engrossed.

The House spent the day in a debate on the bill to establish a Board of Accounts, and finally substituted for it another, authorizing claimants to sue the United States, but adjourned before acting upon it.

Third-day, Feb. 11.

In the Senate, the usual quantity of petitions were presented, on the standing subjects of steamers to Africa, the Fugitive Slave law, Patent laws, and the Tariff. The Deficiency Bill was passed. The Senate then took up, debated, and ordered engrossed, the bill granting to the several States ten millions of acres of Public Lands, to be apportioned by the President in compound ratio of geographical area and representation of said States, according to the census of 1850, provided that the area of no State shall be computed at more than fifty thousand square miles, for the benefit of the Indigent Insane. The bill, after making the grant, declares that said land shall be surveyed and apportioned in sections and subdivisions; and where sufficient land be in a State, such land shall be taken; and any State having no public land shall select her share in the territories. When the apportionment shall be completed, patents for the land are to be issued to the several States. The States to bear respectively all expenses of sale and management of the land, and said expenses not to be taken from the proceeds of the sales. The bill further provides that the proceeds from sales of these lands shall be held by the States respectively, and be invested in stocks as a permanent fund, the capital of which is forever to remain untouched and the interest shall be appropriated to the comfortable maintenance and support of the curable and incurable insane, who are to be placed in organized State institutions. No portion of the proceeds to be applied to the purchase of the site or of the building or its repair.

The House spent the whole day upon the bill to establish a Board of Accounts, which was finally killed (laid on the table) by a vote of 100 to 96.

Fourth-day, Feb. 12.

In the Senate, an unsuccessful attempt was made to have the hour of meeting changed from 12 to 11 o'clock. The bill granting to the States ten million acres of land for the benefit of the insane, was put on its passage by a vote of 35 to 16. The resolution authorizing the President to confer the brevet rank of Lieutenant-General as a reward for meritorious services, was debated at length and ordered to be engrossed.

In the House, the Committee on Printing made a report for the relief of Thomas Ritchie in relation to the Public Printing. A warm debate followed, which occupied the whole session. No vote was taken.

Fifth-day, Feb. 13.

In the Senate, after the presentation of numerous petitions and resolutions, the joint resolution authorizing the President to confer the rank of Lieutenant-General by brevet was finally passed. The bill regulating the fees of Marshals, Clerks, and Attorneys of the United States, was considered and amended, but not finally acted on.

In the House, a bill was reported, and referred to Committee of the Whole, making appropriations for the army for the year ending June, 1852. The printing business was again called up, and the report was recommitted. The River and Harbor bill was taken up and made the text of a long talk, but no action was taken upon it.

Sixth-day, Feb. 14.

In the Senate, several unimportant reports were presented; also a number of petitions. The last half of the session was spent on the question whether Mr. Benton should be allowed to bring in again the bill to pay Missouri the two per cent. Reserved Fund, which has once been rejected. Finally, he made his speech on the merits of the case, after which leave to bring in the bill was refused.

The House spent the day in speeches on the River and Harbor bill, but no vote was taken.

Sabbath-day, Feb. 15.

In the Senate, a large number of petitions and reports were presented, which were referred in the usual manner. The House bill authorizing the Legislatures of Oregon and Minnesota to take charge of the school lands in those territories was passed; also the bill authorizing said Legislatures to employ additional clerks when in session. The House bill granting a pension to Joseph Walsh was reported, and after some debate passed. The bill regulating fees allowed to marshals, clerks and attorneys in United States Circuit Courts, was taken up, several amendments proposed and debated, and finally the Senate adjourned for want of a quorum.

The House had under consideration the River and Harbor Bill, but adjourned without taking a vote.

Anecdote of a Dog.—There is an eating house in Fulton street, which is kept by Messrs. Johnson & Rogers, and which is largely patronized. Three times a day, among the other multitude of hungry animals, is seen to enter, with perfect self-possession and apparent ease, a fine, stately Newfoundland dog, who is a regular boarder. He lives in the neighborhood, but is fed at this establishment. Whether he regulates his hours by the illuminated time piece of the City Hall or not, is unknown; but his punctuality is that of a chronometer. The waiters all know him, and take delight in receiving and obeying his call. His meal is folded up in a newspaper, generally the Sun or the Evening Mirror. He receives the package very graciously, takes it in his mouth, and marches home, never touching it until he arrives at his own premises. He is a gentlemanly dog, and adopts the usages of civilized society. There are very few dogs anywhere, that excel him in good deportment and correct behavior. [N. Y. Jour. Com.

Later from Europe—The Atlantic safe.

The steamer Africa, from Liverpool, reached New York last Sabbath evening, bringing European dates two weeks later.

She brought the joyful intelligence of the safety of the Atlantic. Of the voyage of the Atlantic and her safe arrival at Cork, Ireland, Lieut. Schufeldt, her chief officer, has furnished the following particulars:—

The Atlantic left Liverpool on the 28 December, in fine steaming condition, and without any apprehension, on the part of her officers, in regard to the voyage. It was blowing a strong gale at the time of departure, from W. S. W., so much so as to render it impossible to land her pilot. On the 29th December, at 9 30 P. M., she passed Cape Clear, and fairly commenced her homeward passage by plunging at once into a heavy head sea, and stemming strong westerly gales, which continued without intermission for the time following, up to the day of the accident.

On the 6th of January, at noon, she was in lat. 46 12, long. 41 W., it blowing strong gales from W. N. W. At 6 30 P. M., the engines were stopped, as it was first supposed by the engineers, on account of the breaking of the eccentric strap to the starboard engine—and on examination, it was determined to go ahead again, working that engine by hand; but another revolution of the wheels proved that the accident was of a much more serious nature—the main shaft was found broken completely through, (in a diagonal direction,) the bearing of the starboard pillar block, and the additional turn after the first stoppage, caused one part of the shaft to lap over the other, thus fracturing both pillar blocks, and rendering the engines perfectly useless. The ship was at once hove to under storm canvas, the wheels lashed, and all hands employed during the night, and for the following morning, in sending up her square yards, and stripping her wheels of the floats—a task at once difficult and dangerous in a gale of wind, and the decks covered with ice, but fortunately accomplished without accident.

On the 7th and 8th lying to, with the hope of an abatement of the gale and a change of wind, as the captain and all hands were extremely anxious to reach some port on our own coast. On the 9th the wind hauled to the northwest, and became quite moderate. Immediately made sail, and shaped a course for Halifax, 897 miles distant, and New York 1,400. This weather continued until meridian of the 10th, when an observation placed the ship 180 miles south and 70 miles west of her position at the time of the accident. A gale now sprung up from the southwest, and it became necessary to heave the ship to; for even with moderate weather, it was evident to all that she could do nothing by the wind under canvas. At 8 A. M. of the 11th, a large ship passed, bound to the eastward; but she either did not see, or took no notice of our signal of distress. At 10 P. M., after taking an accurate account of stores on board, and considering the apparent impossibility of reaching home with the ship in her disabled condition, the captain determined, with the assent of his officers and passengers, to bear up for the coast of Europe, which was accordingly done.

From this time to the 22d day nothing of importance occurred. We had following gales and high seas, and the ship made an average distance of 150 miles per day, and in that interval ran 1,400 miles. At 3 P. M. of the 22d she anchored in Cork harbor, which fact alone, when considering the immense size of the ship, her small spars, light canvas, and heavy machinery, is sufficient to prove her a splendid sea boat, and must add in no small degree to the reputation already acquired by her commander for prudence and seamanship. In regard to the conduct of her passengers under such trying circumstances, too much could scarcely be said. Suffice it that they bore the misfortune with becoming fortitude and cheerfulness, and testified, on leaving her at Cork, as much sympathy as those who have a more permanent interest in the good old Atlantic. The Atlantic had on board 550 tons of freight, and a considerable quantity of specie, which the Cambria was chartered to bring over, and probably sailed from Cork on the 4th direct for New York. Before the Africa left arrangements were making to tow the Atlantic to Liverpool, for the purpose of being repaired. This will possibly require three months. The Africa brings her mails and passengers.

The general news by this arrival may be summoned up in a few words. In England the abolition of the window tax is pretty certain to be accomplished. In France the President has triumphed over the Assembly; public opinion supports him in the dismissal of Changarnier. In Germany things are going on well; the Dresden Conferences are nearly over, and their upshot will be officially made pnblic. From Italy we have a renewal of the desire of Pius IX. to abandon the triple crown and seek peace in the quiet of a cloister. In Spain the Narvaez Ministry have resigned, their chief threatening to blow out his brains if the resignation was not accepted. The report of Bem's death is confirmed.

Reduction of Railroad Fare.—We hear, says the Albany Register, that the delegates from the several railroads between Albany and Buffalo, have determined to adopt a uniform rate of 2 cents per mile on all the roads from Schenectady to Buffalo. Between Albany and Schenectady the fare will be 40 cents on through passengers, and 50 off those stopping short of Buffalo. The same fare will be charged on all the trains, and will be $6,60 from Albany to Buffalo, which is about $1,00 less than the present lowest rate, and $2,50 less than last spring. The arrangement takes effect on the 1st day of April.

The Philadelphia Fugitive Case.

Euphemia Williams, whose arrest in Philadelphia on the charge of being a fugitive from slavery we announced last week, was set free by the Court. The closing scene is described by the Evening Bulletin as follows:

The counsel for the defense introduced several witnesses, who testified to having known the alledged fugitive prior to 1828, when it was charged that she had fled from Maryland, and that she then resided in Pennsylvania. Mr. David Paul Brown then addressed the Court in a forcible manner, and was replied to by Mr. McMurtrie. The Judge then reviewed the testimony on both sides, speaking of the difficulty of identifying a person after a lapse of twenty-four years. He stated, too, that, according to the evidence, at the time she was alledged to have been in Maryland, she was in Pennsylvania. He therefore discharged the prisoner. After the woman was released she was taken with her children to the Philadelphia Institute—the head quarters of the colored people. Here followed a scene of rejoicing. Speeches were made, and much excitement prevailed. The woman and her children were then placed in a carriage, and the blacks crowding around, the horses were taken out, a long rope attached, and they hauled her, amid a rejoicing crowd, to her home.

The Philadelphia Sun says:—

During the last stage of the investigation of this case, two members of the Philadelphia Bar, representing merchants and other citizens, called upon David Paul Brown, just as he was about commencing his argument, and tendered to him two checks of five hundred dollars each, to purchase the unhappy woman and restore her to her six children, in case she should be remanded by the Court. "Never mind your money," said the counsel, "I'll purchase her myself, and upon the true Christian principle, without money and without price." The result shows that he kept his word.

SUMMARY.

A project of a Railroad is now being surveyed between Hoosic and Chatham, through Rennsselaer Co., to connect the Washington Co. and Bennington Railroad with the Harlem Railroad. The former is to be finished to the Hoosic River Valley, by the 4th of July, and the latter to Chatham at the same time. There will be then wanting only 36 miles of railroad to complete a great interior railroad to Burlington, Vt., Ogdensburgh, on the St. Lawrence, and Montreal.

The magnificent steamer "Autocrat," bound from New Orleans to Memphis, with a heavy freight and large number of passengers, came in collision, on the 9th inst., with the steamer Magnolia, near Bayou Sara, going down. The Autocrat sunk immediately, and it is supposed over thirty persons were lost, including several cabin passengers belonging to Tennessee, five negro firemen, and one engineer.

The Mobile papers report that the brig Erie, of Baltimore, from New-Orleans for Rio Janeiro, was lost on the Western Reef of the Bahamas on the 2d inst. The vessel's bottom grounded to pieces, and her deck floated off, to which the crew clung and remained three days, a heavy gale prevailing the whole time. They were finally rescued by a wrecking schooner and carried into Nassau, N. P.

The Germantown (Pa.) Telegraph says, "We are informed that on the farm of John Towne, (formerly Breck's property,) in Abington township, Montgomery County, about three-fourths of a mile from Huntingdon village, a vein of Copper has been discovered, which, from the appearance of the outcrop, is supposed to be very rich."

One night, not long ago, the residence of Mr. Philo C. Calhoun, of Bridgeport, Conn., was entered by burglars, and robbed of plate to the value of $200. The robbers left the following laconic note on the table:—"Taking the Taxes for 1851. You may thank God they are so light." No trace of the villains has been discovered.

The convict Head, who escaped from the Auburn Prison on Thursday, was taken on Saturday, says the Auburn Advertiser, in Chenango County, and has been returned to his old quarters. He was detected by his prison garb, which he wore under a citizen's dress. He was so exhausted by fatigue and exposure, when taken, that he could offer no resistance.

It has been decided by the Pension Office, that a soldier engaged to serve six months and actually serving four, and hiring a substitute for the remainder, both are entitled to Bounty Land according to the actual amount of service rendered by each.

The Adjutant General recently communicated to the Senate of New York, in answer to a resolution, that the support of the Militia during the last fiscal year cost the State $20,151, and the County Treasuries $28,109, which is less than in 1847, when the present system was adopted, by $10,000.

Mr. Ganatt, while crossing the Columbia Railroad in a wagon with a lady, 22 miles from Philadelphia, was run over by the locomotive, and so severely injured that his life is despaired of. The young lady had her collar bone broken, and the horses were instantly killed.

In Tampico, and other parts of the Mexican country, a great scarcity of provisions prevails, on account of the late failure of the crops. Bread and sugar, in the former port, it is said, are sold for nearly their weight in silver.

The Maryland Reform Convention has adopted a clause allowing only those who believe in God, or rewards and punishments in this world or the next, to act as jurors, witnesses and judges.

The trial of George J. Bullock, the defaulting cashier of the Central Railroad Co., has been concluded. The jury, after a brief absence, returned with a verdict of guilty.

Henry Long, the remanded fugitive from this City, is again advertised for sale in Atlanta, Ga., by Mr. Clapton, his Richmond purchaser.

It is stated by a person writing from London the New York Journal of Commerce, that a fee of ten shillings is now charged for admission to the mammoth glass edifice in Hyde Park, and when finished the price will be increased to a guinea, and reduced as the period of the World's Exhibition advances It is further stated, that its erection cost less, in proportion to its size, than a common barn.

At Dubuque, Ia., on the 11th, Arnold Harlin, a drug clerk, threw oil of vitriol in the faces of his employer, Mr. Thedinga, and a fellow clerk named Strasser. Both were shockingly burned. Next morning Harlin's dead body was found in a field, he having committed suicide by taking prussic acid. Harlin was jealous of his victims—hence the tragedy.

The case of the Albany post-office robbers has been decided. Judge Conckling sentenced Pemberton, who turned State's evidence, to two years imprisonment, Bramhall eight years, and Gaylord eight years. These trials have occupied the U. S. Court nearly three weeks, and will cost Government not less than $10,000.

A dispatch from Washington, dated Feb. 13, says that Kossuth has communicated to the U. S. Government an entreaty for its interference with the Turkish Government in favor of his release. He also expresses his desire to come to the United States. Mr. Webster will reply favorably.

One day last week the train from New York to Albany on the Housatonic Railroad, while passing over the curve between Barrington and Van Dusensville, was thrown from the track 40 to 50 feet by the splitting of a rail. Most of the passengers were injured, some quite badly.

On the 1st of January, a beautiful and commodious building, which cost upwards of three thousand dollars, and which has been built during the past summer expressly for a public school, was presented by Capt. Cobb to the trustees of the village of Westchester.

The Governor of Illinois, in a message to the Legislature, says: "For the first time, in a series of years, the revenue of Illinois, exclusive of that devoted to specific purposes, is sufficient to meet the demands on the Treasury." The amount of the State debt is $16,627,509 91.

BENEDICT W. ROGERS, Treasurer.

Executive Committee of the Eastern Association.

AN ADJOURNED MEETING of the Executive Committee of the Seventh-day Baptist Eastern Association will be held, Feb. 26th, at 10 o'clock A. M., at the Lecture Room of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Westerly. S. S. GRISWOLD, Cor. Sec.

Temperance Celebration.

THE NINTH ANNIVERSARY of the "Unadilla Forks Washington Total Abstinence Society" will be celebrated at Unadilla Forks, Otsego Co., N. Y., on Monday, the 24th inst., at the Baptist Church. Good speakers from abroad are expected to address the meeting. Exercises will commence at 10 o'clock A. M., and continue through the day and evening.

J. F. BABCOCK, Secretary.

A. Smith, President.

Daguerrean Gallery.

GURNEY'S Daguerrean Gallery, No. 189 Broadway, has been known for years as one of the first establishments of the kind in the United States, and the oldest in the city of New York. He has recently greatly enlarged his Gallery by the addition of more rooms and large skylights, and other improvements, rendering it one of the most extensive establishments in this country. Mr. G. attends personally to his sitters, and from his great experience in the art he is enabled, at all times, to give perfect satisfaction. The large-sized pictures recently taken by his new process are universally acknowledged superior to any heretofore taken in this country. A large collection can be seen at all hours of the day. Ladies and gentlemen are respectfully invited to examine them.

New York and Boston Steamboats.

REGULAR MAIL LINE BETWEEN NEW YORK AND BOSTON, via Stonington and Providence. Inland route, without ferry, change of cars or baggage! The steamers C. VANDERBILT, Capt. Joel Stone, and COMMODORE, Capt. William H. Frazee, in connection with the Stonington and Providence, and Boston and Providence Railroads, leaving New York daily, (Sundays excepted,) from pier 2 North River, first whar above Battery Place, at 5 o'clock P. M., and Stonington at 8 o'clock P. M., or upon the arrival of the mail train from Boston. The C. Vanderbilt will leave New York Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday. Leave Stonington Monday, Wednesday, and Friday. The Commodore will leave New York Monday, Wednesday, and Friday. Leave Stonington Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday.

Christian Psalmody—Pocket Edition.

IN compliance with requests from various quarters, the publisher of the New Hymn Book—Christian Psalmody—has issued a second edition, on lighter paper and with smaller margins, by which the bulk and weight of the books are reduced about one-third, rendering them much more convenient for carrying in the pocket. The price is also reduced 12½ cents per copy. Those wishing books, of either edition, can now be supplied. Price of the larger edition from 75 cents to $1 50, according to the style of binding. Price of the smaller edition from 62½ cents to $1 00. Orders should be addressed to Geo. B. Utter, No. 9 Spruce-st., New York.

The Publisheis subjoin a few notices from the Press during the last year:—

Methodist Quarterly Review.

THIS Review contains 160 pages Octavo, printed on fine paper. At the subscription price of TWO DOLLARS a year, in advance, it is the cheapest Quarterly Journal now issued. The publishers issue it at this low price, in expectation of greatly enlarging its list of subscribers, which, though by no means what it ought to be, is yet, as it is believed, twice as large as that of any similar Journal.

While the theology of the Methodist Episcopal Church is the standard for the Review, its tone is large and liberal, and its range of topics, not only in Biblical but General Literature, is extensive, as its Table of Contents will show. Its contributors are among the ablest writers in this country, of various religious denominations.

In the Department of Literary Intelligence, this Journal is so unusually full and rich as to be almost indispensable to every theologian and literary man.

From its wide circulation, the Quarterly affords a most desirable medium of Literary Advertising. All advertisements, and books for notice, should be sent to the Editor, Rev. J. M'Clintock, D. D., 200 Mulberry-st.

The Arithmetic of War.

It is said that neither facts nor figures will lie; but it is very difficult to credit, or adequately conceive, even the well-attested statistics of property and life sacrificed by war. When such a philosopher as Dick, or such a statesman as Burke, brings before us his estimate of the havoc which this custom has made of human life in all past time, it seems utterly incredible, almost inconceivable; and still more are we staggered by the long and formidable array of figures employed to denote the sum total of money squandered on this system of human butchery.

Just glance at a recent estimate. Baron Von Reden, perhaps the ablest statistician of the age, and withal no believer in the peace cause, tells us, in a recent work of his, that the Continent of Europe alone now has full four millions of men under arms, more than half its male population between the ages of twenty and thirty; and that the support of these immense preparations for war, together with the interest and cost of collection and disbursement on the aggregate of its war-debts, amounts to more than one thousand millions of dollars a year. Let any man try to form an adequate conception of what is meant by either of these sums, and he will soon give up the effort in despair.

Take the Baron's estimate of war-debts now resting on the States of Europe—no less than $9,418,000,000. How shall we realize what this enormous sum means? Shall we count it? At the rate of sixty dollars a minute, ten hours every day, for three hundred days in a year, it would take more than 800 years, some twenty generations or more, barely to count the present war-debts of Europe alone.

Let us look for a moment at what England wasted for war purposes in 127 years, from the Revolution in 1688, to the downfall of Napoleon in 1815. The sum total squandered in actual war, besides all that she spent upon her war system in the intervals of peace, was $10,150,000,000; and if we add the interest on her war-debts contracted in that period, the grand total will reach nearly $17,000,000,000! At sixty dollars a minute, for ten hours in a day, or $36,000 a day, and 300 days in a year, it would require more than 1,574 years to count it all! Add an average of $80,000,000 a year for the current expenses of her war establishment since 1815, an aggregate of $2,800,000,000, in these thirty-five years; and we have a sum total of nearly twenty thousand millions! No wonder that the Old World is reeling and staggering under the burden of such enormous expenditures for war purposes.

Let us try some other modes of conceiving what is meant by these figures. Twenty thousand millions of dollars! It is nearly thirty times as much as all the coin now supposed to be in the world; and if these 20,000,000,000 were all in silver dollars, and placed in rows, they would belt the globe more than 160 times!

The English in Australia.

For ages Australia lay in its original condition, untrodden by the feet of white men. In 1770, Captain Cook, immortalized as a minister of civilization, observed on the eastern coast a harbor whose shores were covered with a variety of beautiful plants. He called the place Botany Bay. To him it was endeared by associations of delight; to us its name is repulsive, as attached to a sink of crime. After this voyage, accounts of the unknown Southern land were circulated through Europe. It was at this unhappy period that the oligarchy of England, blinded by selfish passion, abandoned her interests, and lost the brightest jewel in her empire. The American colonies, revolting under oppression, proclaimed their independence, and the mother State, having cast from her bosom the quest child she had nurtured, went forth again to seek a new home for her offspring in the waste places of the world. An Australian settlement was projected, for the reception of convicted criminals. An expedition was at once equipped. It consisted of two vessels of war, six transports, and three store-ships. On board were 506 male, and 192 female convicts; 160 marines, with their officers, and the usual complement of crews. Provisions, tools, implements, and materials were provided. Burdened with its load of crime, the squadron spread sail for the "Unknown Southern Land."

The expedition reached the shores of Australia in January, 1788. A sailor, named Jackson, discovered, through a gap in the line of cliffs, the magnificent harbor named in honor of its discoverer. The situation was preferred to that of Botany Bay; the boats were manned, and the people stepped out of them, literally under the shade of a forest. All was wild and silent. The tents were pitched, and an encampment was arranged, the axe and spade were set to work, and the English name and nation were for the first time established in Australia. On that distant shore, then clothed with dreary woods, there now stands the capital of a great colony, a prosperous city, embellished with beautiful structures, populous and rich, and stamped with the impress of civilization. Scarcely sixty-two years, therefore, have elapsed since the birth of a colony now outrivaling, in the rapid growth of its importance, every other in the world.

But New South Wales did not spring—it struggled into prosperity. The early years of its existence were full of trouble. The qualities of the soil were not understood; the crops were scanty; the convicts were idle and greedy; the military were insubordinate; supplies arrived at distant intervals, and the hopes of the settlers were depressed by the dread of famine. Scarcity and disease made havoc among them, and before four months had passed, a gallows cast its ill-omened shadow over the birth-place of Sydney. A youth only seventeen years of age, stained the infant city with crime, and was cut off "in the land of promise" by the hands of the hangman. Another miserable creature, during a time of want, swallowed eight pounds of flour cakes at a meal and died of surfeit. Others, sharing the ignorance of more educated classes in England, conceived the idea of escape by traveling overland to China. They started on their journey, and were never more heard of. Probably they were killed by the natives; but possibly, also, some became domesticated among them, and relapsed into the savage state of life. Recently, it is well known, some sailors did so, on the coast above Moreton Bay. The colony struggled for existence during many years.

A settlement was founded at Norfolk Island, to relieve Sydney from some of its convict population; but, in spite of every exertion, the century drew to a close while New South Wales was in the most unpromising condition. Deluded by dreams of sudden fortune, many spent their time in an unprofitable search for gold. One of the convicts, noticing the passion of his companions, resolved to profit by it. With a guinea and a brass buckle he manufactured a specimen of ore, and declared he had found it near the hills. The fraud was detected; instead of the reward he looked for, the former received a flogging, and, afterward committing a more serious offense, ended his life on the scaffold.

A contrast between the condition of the colony during the first years of its establishment with its present state, displays a remarkable result. Four years after the landing at Port Jackson, the public stock consisted of one aged stallion, two colts, sixteen cows, two calves, one ram, fifty ewes, six lambs, one boar, fourteen sows, and twenty-two pigs. At Paramatta, near Sydney, there were three hundred acres cultivated with Indian corn, forty-four with wheat, six with barley, one with oats, four with vines, and eighty-six laid out in gardens, beside seventeen belonging to the soldiers. In all, therefore, there were 118 animals fed, and 458 acres tilled. Before 1835, about 17,000,000 lbs. of wool had been shipped from New South Wales, which now contains about 7,000,000 sheep, more than 100,000 horses, nearly 1,500,000 cattle, and pigs beyond calculation. About 33,000 sheep and 10,000 cattle are slaughtered annually, producing more than 20,000 cwt of tallow. 180,000 acres are under cultivation; they produce nearly 2,000,000 bushels of grain, and more than 60,000 tuns of potatoes, tobacco and hay. From such small beginnings has New South Wales risen to this position. A sketch of its extent and resources may explain the rapid progress. [Sharpe's Mag.

Meat Biscuit Factory.

A factory has been established at Galveston, by G. Borden, Jr., called the "Meat Biscuit Factory." The meat biscuit is a newly discovered article of food, and highly esteemed on account of its alimentary qualities, and for the length of time it may be preserved. The factory contains an engine of ten horse power, which drives the machinery, consisting of biscuit machines to knead, roll, and cut the dough, a grist mill to pulverize the biscuit, and the guillotine for mincing the meat, to facilitate the boiling. The Civilian contains the following account of the process of manufacturing the biscuit:—

"There are four wooden cauldrons or tubs for boiling the meat and evaporating the liquid or broth—the two for boiling the meat holding 2,300 gallons, will each boil 7,000 lbs. of meat in 12 to 16 hours. The other two, for evaporating, will contain some 1,400 gallons each. All the tubs are heated or boiled by steam passing through long coiled iron pipes, supplied at pleasure either from the escape steam from the engine, or direct from the boiler. When the meat is so far boiled or macerated that the liquid or broth contains the entire nutriment, the meaty or corporeous portions are separated by a simple process of filtering, so that the broth goes into the evaporator pure and free from fibrous matter. It is then evaporated to a degree of consistence resembling the Golden or Stewart's Sugar House Syrup; its uniform density being determined by a liquid or syrup guage. One pound of this syrup or extract contains the nutriment of some eleven pounds of meat, (including its usual proportion of bone,) as first put into the cauldron. This extract is then mixed with the best and finest flour, kneaded and made into biscuit by means of the machines before mentioned. The biscuit is baked upon pans in an oven so constructed as to produce a uniform firmness. The proportion is as two pounds of extract are to three pounds of flour, but by baking, the five pounds of dough is reduced to four pounds of biscuit, and this will make what the inventor claims—the nutriment of over five pounds of meat in one pound of bread, which contains, beside, over ten ounces of flour. The biscuit resembles in appearance a light-colored sugar-cake. It is packed in air-tight casks or tin cannisters of different sizes, part of the biscuit being pulverized by grinding in a mill for the purpose, and thus packed with the whole biscuit."

The same paper states that the War Department, in order to test its qualities, has ordered a large amount for the troops upon the frontiers.

A Noble Spirit.

"There is an endearing tenderness," says Washington Irving, "in the love of a mother for her son, that transcends all other affections of the heart." We have just heard a touching illustration of the fact, that the love of a son for his mother may also transcend and swallow up all other affections, at a moment, too, when he might well be pardoned for remembering only his own great trials. Some two years ago, a young man, belonging to Philadelphia, was returning by railroad to that city from the town of Reading, Pennsylvania. By an accident which happened to the train as it was approaching town, and while he was standing upon the platform, he was thrown off, and fell partly under the wheel of the succeeding car; and his right arm, "marrow, bones, and all," was crushed to a jelly, and dropped uselessly at his side. This, however, was fortunately his only injury. He was a young man of determined nerve, and of the noblest spirit. He uttered no complaint—not even a groan. When the train arrived at the depot, a carriage was immediately called, when, attended by his friend, he said, to the coachman, "Drive at once to Dr. M——'s, in Walnut street." Had n't you better go immediately home?" asked his friend.

"No," said he, "I don't want them to know any thing about it until it is all over."

Our hero, for he was a hero, was deaf to all the counter remonstrances of his friend, and they drove rapidly to the house of the eminent surgeon alluded to. They were shown into the parlor, and the doctor was summoned. After an examination, "Well, my dear fellow," said the surgeon, for he was well acquainted with his patient, "you know, I suppose, what must be done?"

"I do," he replied; "and it is for the purpose of having it done that I am here."

"My surgical table," said the Doctor, "is below."

"Can it not be done without that?" asked the sufferer. "I cannot be tied—I cannot be held. Amputate my arm here, Doctor; I shall not flinch; I shall not interfere with your operations."

The limb was bared; two attendants, medical students in the house, were summoned; the arm was taken off above the elbow, while the patient sat as he had requested, uttering no groan, nor speaking a single word while the operation was being performed. The dressings were applied; and, attended by his friend, the patient had reached the door, on his way to his own house, which was very near by, when he turned round to the surgeon, and said: "Doctor, I should like to look at my arm once more; pray let me see it." The surgeon raised the mangled limb; the patient glanced at the bloodless hand, and said: "Doctor, there is a ring upon the middle finger of that hand; won't you take it off for me? My MOTHER gave me that ring when she was on her death bed. I can part with my arm, but while I live, I can't part with that ring." The ring was slipped from the cold, white finger. "Put it on that finger," said he, holding out the same finger of his left hand. As he was leaving the door, with his attendants, to enter the carriage, he said: "How shall I break this thing to my poor sister?" Is not this a true "hero," reader? [Knickerbocker.

The Habits of Swallows.

In the summer of last year, says an English paper, one of a small batch of very enthusiastic ornithologists in Methven, after discussing the migratory habit of various kinds of birds, differed from his friends on the question, "whether the swallow, on its return after its winter absence, took up house in the same locality it had migrated from." He maintained the negative, giving such plausible reasons as induced the coterie to devise some method for obtaining a settlement of the question. The only method, therefore, was to catch a swallow. This they ingeniously contrived to do. They captured a female as she was feeding her young. Taking great care of her, they sewed a small piece of red ribbon about her neck, in such a manner that it would not, in ordinary circumstances, get loosened, and then sent her to the broad expanse. The badged bird reared its young, and continued in the neighborhood until the migrating season, when, with its fellows, it disappeared. Great was the anxiety of the naturalists this spring to discover if it would return. Group after group appeared, but not the ribboned favorite. At length, on the 12th day of April, among the last influx of returning emigrants, appeared the identical bird, thereby overthrowing the hypothesis that they do not revisit their former haunts. But what is worth still more notice, is the circumstance that it built its nest and reared its this year's brood in precisely the same spot it did the year previous. It flew again to sunnier lands at the approach of the cold weather.

The Kentucky Negro Bill.

A bill, in its character "cruel, uncalled for, and impolitic," and affecting the condition of free negroes, has recently passed the popular branch of the Kentucky Legislature. The bill provides that each county assessor shall annually report to the Clerk of the County Court the name, age, sex, and color of every free negro and mulatto, and that the Clerk shall keep a record thereof, and shall in the month of July, every year, issue a summons against all such negroes, with certain ages, commanding them to appear before him, there to exhibit their free papers or give proof of their freedom. The Clerk is also to make a record of the name, age, sex, hight, and visible marks of such free negroes as appear before him, and state when they were emancipated and by whom, or born free; and for this service the Clerk is to receive a fee from the free negroes or mulattoes; and if the free negro fail to appear, or fail to pay the fee, or comply with the law in other respects, he is made liable to a fine of ten dollars; and if the fine and costs are not paid instanter, the "convict" is to be hired out to any one who will pay the amount for the shortest period of service. Another section of this inhuman bill provides, that if any free negro acquires, in any way except by descent, a title to real estate or slaves, such real estate or slaves shall be forfeited to the State.

THAWING FROZEN VEGETABLES.—The Farmer and Rambler says that frozen vegetables, fruits, &c., may be thawed in such a manner that they will receive but very little injury from freezing and thawing. If the frozen substance be immersed in cold water, whose temperature is but little above that of freezing, the frost will soon be extracted without injury.

If frozen vegetables be covered up in the ground, or closely covered with moss, cloths, mats, &c., and laid in a dark cellar, the frost will be gradually extracted without material injury to the article.

By these modes of thawing, the change is gradual, hence it has but little effect. But if a frozen vegetable or fruit be put into warm or hot water, or carried into a warm room, or placed by a fire, the sudden change from a frozen to a thawed state, will destroy it as completely as though it had been baked or boiled. Thus it appears that the thawing, rather than the freezing, destroys the vegetable.

CORDIALITY BETWEEN A CANARY AND A MOUSE.—For some weeks past, in Mr. Timmon's shop, Navan, Eng., a mouse has been in the habit of entering the cage of the canary, and feeding there quite unconcerned. At first it was noticed that when the mouse attempted to enter the cage the bird sat with feathers erect and wings poised, to pounce upon him as soon as he made his appearance. Several engagements took place between them before a friendly reconciliation could be accomplished. The canary had the best of the battle when on the perch, but when the mouse got him on the bottom of the cage he was generally worsted. A few days since, however, the mouse was observed to carry something in its mouth from another part of the shop, and deposit it in the cage, which on examination proved to be manna. The bird partook of the present, and from that time there seems to exist the utmost friendship between them, the mouse having full liberty to feed unannoyed, which he avails himself of, five or six times a day.

WATCHMAKING IN GENEVA.—One of the principal kinds of employment in Geneva, for a large part of the population, is watch-making. We were informed that ten thousand persons were engaged in this particular branch of industry. Even little girls are employed in polishing the delicate parts of the machinery. The best workmen rarely earn more than two dollars a day—the poorer, of course earn less. One simply makes the chains, another certain wheels, while others work at the setting up, as it is called, that is, putting the plates together. Very beautiful watches, of superior quality too, compared with the ordinary run of such articles in the United States, appear very cheap indeed. A lady desired to exchange, at a manufacturing establishment, a superior gold watch of large size for a smaller one by paying the difference. Only ten dollars would be allowed for hers—the weight of the case—the inside being condemned as execrable, although a good time keeper, and cost a round sum. Watches that might cost $100 in Boston or New York, according to the representation of the manufacturers, would not exceed $40 or $50 in Geneva.

HORSE DISTEMPER.—A correspondent of the Boston Cultivator says:—

"When a horse has contracted this distemper, he appears stupid, has a cough, discharges at the nose, and in advanced stages, swellings appear under the throat and on various other parts of the body. For the relief of animals thus afflicted, I feel desirous to give my mode of treatment. It is this: On the first appearance of the disease, commence feeding the horse with ginger, a table spoonful three times a day, mixed with grain, keeping the bowels loose at the same time with some gentle purgative. One pound of ginger will in ordinary cases be sufficient to cure a horse. He should be worked moderately every day, and covered with warm blankets at night to keep him from taking cold. It is highly necessary that he should be exercised, and when thus treated, I have not known it to fail of a cure in my practice, which has been limited."

SIR PHILIP SIDNEY.—This eminent man was governor of Flushing, (Neth.) and general of the horse, under his uncle, the Earl of Leicester. His valor, which was esteemed great, and not exceeded by any of his age, was at least equaled by his humanity. After he had received his death wound, at the battle of Zutphen, and was overcome with thirst from excessive bleeding, he called for drink, which was soon brought him. At the same time, a poor soldier, dangerously wounded, was carried along, who fixed his eager eyes upon the bottle just as Sir Philip was lifting it to his mouth. Sir Philip immediately presented it to him, with the remark, "Thy necessity is greater than mine."

AN ARTESIAN MILL.—There are many ways by which a motive power can be obtained, among the most singular of which is a mill owned by Dr. Withers, a resident of Milwood, Green county, Ala., which he very properly designates the Artesian Mill. The power employed in driving this mill is obtained from the water of six small Artesian wells; the depths of which range from three to six hundred feet. From these wells issues a stream of water equal in volume to one thousand gallons per minute. The mill, when in motion, has the appearance of a self-acting machine, as there is no water discernible under it, like any other. It is an ingenious invention, and the only one of the kind yet known.

ATTEMPT TO POISON ON SHIPBOARD.—The Barnstable Patriot says that a letter has been received in that town from Capt. Wm. Loring, of bark Governor Hinckley, in which he says that when ten days out of New York for London, an attempt was made by the cook to poison the officers and passengers on board his bark by introducing some poisonous substance into their coffee. The captain and mates, the captain's daughter, and two or three passengers, partook of the coffee, but not in sufficient quantities to prove fatal to any of them. They were immediately taken with vomiting, and remained sick for some time from its effects, but recovered for the most part before reaching London.

THE LATEST CURIOSITIES.—A fence made of the railing of a scolding wife.

A plate of butter made from the cream of a joke.

A small coin from the "change of the moon."

The original brush used in painting the "signs of the times."

The very latest contracts with the "Trade Winds."

The chair in which the sun sets.

A garment for the naked eye.

The hammer which broke up the meeting.

A buckle to fasten a laughing-stock.

The animal that drew the inference.

Eggs from a nest of thieves.

A bucket of water from "All's well."

THE KING OF THE POTATOES.—We received on Saturday afternoon, by the Georgia, says the N. Y. Tribune, the most remarkable specimen of the potato tribe which has ever been seen in this city. It was raised by Mr. Henry Fuller, on his farm near Portland, Oregon, and by him forwarded to Messrs. Crane & Rice, of the California Courier, who have transmitted it to us for presentation to the American Institute in this city. After the voyage of 7,000 miles, it is as fresh and sound as if just dug from the earth. The circumference of this monster potato is 23½ inches, and its weight 3½ lbs. We should like to see this beaten on the Atlantic side of the Rocky Mountains.

NORTH CAROLINA COAL.—A space of fifteen miles in length, by four to five miles in width, situated in Moore and Chatham counties, North Carolina, has been lately explored by Professor Johnson, who reports having found unmistakable signs of a deposit of the best kinds of bituminous, semi-bituminous, and anthracite coal. He states that the deposits extend a distance of thirty miles, by four or five miles in width, embracing a space of about 150 square miles. It is said also that the deposits reach a depth of seven feet two inches, being greater than any like deposits in England.

A returned California dog has made his appearance at his old home in Burlington, Iowa. He was left at the mines by his master, but by some means has worked his passage back.

Variety.

An English paper relates the following:—A farmer had discovered that a fox came along a beam in the night to seize his poultry. He accordingly sawed the end of the beam nearly through, and in the night the fox fell into a place whence he could not escape. On going to him in the morning, he found him stiff, and, as he thought, lifeless. Taking him out of the building, he threw him on the dung-hill; but in a short time Reynard opened his eyes, and seeing all was safe and clear, galloped away to the mountains, showing more cunning than the man who ensnared him.

The Cleveland Plaindealer of Jan. 23 says: Ten thousand times ten thousand and thousands of thousands of pigeons are seen wending their way from the South until they reach the Lake shore, when they would suddenly perform a somerset, and turn back in the direction they came. The mild weather of the last few days has no doubt deceived them, and when they get in sight of the snows of Canada, they turn back. It is said that millions are found dead on the snows of the Province.

The group of statuary ordered by Congress of the sculptor Greenough, emblematic of the early settlement of our country, is nearly ready for shipment. The artist will receive $20,000. Messrs. Everett, Prescott and Choate, have petitioned the Senate for an appropriation to enable Hiram Powers, the great American sculptor, to complete for the Capitol the statue of "America." The model is said to be a master-piece of art.

A number of scientific experiments have recently been made by a distinguished chemist of Paris, the results of which have positively established the fact that, for agricultural purposes, plaster, or the sulphate of lime, in itself, possesses no alkali basis, or fecundating powers; that, in order to be useful for such purposes, it must be mixed with ammoniacal ingredients; and that it may be replaced by any matter which contains ammonia.

In London and its suburbs there are 95 Ragged Schools, attended by more than 10,000 children, taught by nearly 1400 unpaid teachers. The majority of them are open during the week as well as on Sundays, where vagrant children are fed and partly clothed, and taught either in the day or evening. Connected with them are "industrial classes," in which young men are instructed in the trades during the evening.

A squirrel, sitting on a hickory tree, was once observed to weigh the nuts he got, in each paw, to find out which were good and which were bad. The light ones he invariably threw away, retaining only those which were heavier. It was found, on examining those he had thrown away, that he had not made a mistake in a single instance. They were all bad nuts.

Dr. Darwin was of opinion, that if a deaf person dreamed of hearing, the internal parts essential to the function were unimpaired. The same remark, says Dr. Smith, of Boston, is applicable to the blind. I have inevitably found that the incurably deaf, as well as the incurably blind, never dream of hearing or seeing.

When a certain lady who had been charmed by his writings, but had never seen his person, wrote to Mirabeau, saying how much she longed to see him, and begging that he would describe himself to her, he complied with the wish of the enthusiast in these brief and self-adulatory terms:—"Figure to yourself a tiger that has had the small pox."

Of all metals, platinum has the greatest specific gravity, and is, consequently, the least in bulk; gold comes next; then, in a nearly regular gradation, lead, mercury, silver, bismuth, copper, iron, tin, and antimony; and then sodium and potassium, a pound of the two last being equal in bulk to at least twenty pounds of platinum.

It is found, by a recent census, that in consequence of the introduction of railroads, the number of horses in England has been reduced from 1,000,000 to 200,000. It is computed that it requires as much land to subsist one horse as it does to subsist eight men. Consequently, it would appear that the 800,000 horses displaced by railroads make room for an additional population of 5 400,000.

The Cathedral of Notre Dame, in Antwerp, is one of the finest gothic buildings in all Europe. The principal spire is 460 feet high. There are 600 stairs to climb before reaching the top. There are 99 bells in the tower, the largest of which weighs 16,000 pounds, and requires 16 men to ring it.

Some French stock-jobbers last summer employed swallows taken from their nest at Lyons, and carried to Paris, to convey intelligence to Lyons of the fluctuation in prices. The birds returned to their nests with remarkable speed. Other speculators, however, discovering the trick, caused all the swallows that appeared about Lyons to be shot.

The Homestead Exemption Law of the State of New York went into operation on the 1st Jan. It exempts from sale on execution, for debts hereafter contracted, the lot and buildings thereon, occupied as a residence and owned by the debtor, being a householder, and having a family, to the value of $1000.

When rabbits, squirrels, and various other gnawing animals, are fed on soft meats, their teeth sometimes grow so long and crooked as to prevent them from taking food; and instances have occurred, in which, to preserve life, it became necessary to break off or extract the teeth.

"One of our ancient contributors," says the Literary Gazette, "of whom we used to beg some attention to punctuation in his MSS., used to retort, 'Do you take your servant for a dog? I am not a pointer!'"

In man, the brain averages in weight 1-35th of the body; in the dog, 1-120th; in the horse, 1-450th; in the sheep, 1-750th; and in the ox, 1-800th. Generally speaking, eight-tenths of the brain is composed of water.

"Alabama," in the Indian tongue, signifies "rest." An Indian chief, fleeing southward, struck his tent-pole in the ground and exclaimed, "Alabama! Alabama!" "Here we rest! Here we rest!"

London contains 300,000 houses, which cover an area 14 miles long and 7 miles wide. Between the 1st of January, 1839, and January, 1850, 64,058 new houses were built, forming 1652 streets.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year of this Seminary, for 1850 and '51, will commence the third Wednesday in August, and continue forty-four weeks, including a short recess between the terms, and one of ten days for the winter holidays.

The year is divided into three terms:—

The first, of 14 weeks, begins Wednesday, August 21st, and ends Wednesday, November 27th.

The second, of 15 weeks, begins Monday, December 2d, and ends Friday, March 14th.

The third, of 14 weeks, begins Tuesday, March 18th and ends Tuesday, June 24th.

Board of Instruction.

GURDON EVANS, A. M., President,
And Professor of Mathematics and Natural Science.

Rev. JOSEPH W. MORTON,
Professor of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, Spanish and Moral and Intellectual Science.

Mrs. SUSANNA M. SPICER, Preceptress.

ADOLPH ROSENHAYN,
(Late of Friedrick Wilhelm College, Berlin,)
Teacher of German, Piano Forte, and Assistant in Greek and Latin.

Other competent Teachers will be employed as occasion may demand.

TEACHERS' CLASSES will be formed, as usual, at the beginning of the Fall and middle of the Winter Terms, and continue seven weeks.

In the Common Branches, classes will be formed at the commencement of each term; but in the higher, the interest of the student, as well as the welfare of the Institution, demand that a more systematic course of study be pursued.

In the Natural Sciences, Elementary Chemistry and Philosophy will be pursued during the Fall Term Agricultural Chemistry, Astronomy, and Physiology during the Winter Term; Botany and Geology during the Summer Term.

Classes will be formed in Latin, French, and German, at the commencement of the Fall Term; in Hebrew, Greek, and Spanish, at the commencement of the Winter Term, and continue through the course of study.

In Mathematics, Geometry is studied in the Fall, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, and Astronomy, Surveying, Navigation, &c., in the Summer Term

The course of instruction in Agriculture is thorougly scientific, embracing study and recitation in the best authors. Instruction is given in a well-furnished laboratory, in the analysis of soils, ashes of plants, manures, &c. and the modes of testing for their constituent elements. The attention of farmers who wish to give their sons a practical education is especially called to this department.

Board in private families, from $1 25 to $1 50. Many students board in clubs for 60 to 75 cents.

TUITION—to be settled upon entering school—from $3 00 to $5 00. EXTRAS—For Drawing, $1 00; Oil Painting, $5 00; Chemical Experiments, $1 00; Writing, including stationery, 50 cents; Piano Forte, $8 00; Use of Instrument, $2 00; Agricultural Chemistry, including chemicals, apparatus, and fuel, (breakage extra,) $12 00.

It is very desirable that students should enter at the beginning of the term; yet they are received into classes already formed at any time.

For farther information, address Gurdon Evans, J. W. Morton, or Rev. J. R. Irish, President of the Corporation.

Sabbath Tracts.

The American Sabbath Tract Society publishes the following tracts, which are for sale at its Depository, No. 9 Spruce st., N. Y., viz:

No. 1 Reasons for introducing the Sabbath of the Fourth Commandment to the consideration of the Christian Public. 28 pp.

No. 2 Moral Nature and Scriptural Observance of the Sabbath. 52 pp.

No. 3 Authority for the Change of the Day of the Sabbath. 28 pp.

No. 4 The Sabbath and Lord's Day A History of their Observance in the Christian Church. 52 pp.

No. 5 A Christian Caveat to the Old and New Sabbatarians. 4 pp.

No. 6 Twenty Reasons for keeping holy, in each week, the Seventh Day instead of the First Day. 4 pp.

No. 7 Thirty-six Plain Questions, presenting the main points in the Controversy; A Dialogue between a Minister of the Gospel and a Sabbatarian; Counterfeit Coin. 8 pp.

No. 8 The Sabbath Controversy The True Issue. 4 pp.

No. 9 The Fourth Commandment False Exposition. 4 pp.

No. 10 The True Sabbath Embraced and Observed. 16 pp.

No. 11 Religious Liberty Endangered by Legislative Enactments. 16 pp.

No. 12 Misuse of the Term Sabbath. 8 pp.

No. 13 The Bible Sabbath. 24 pp.

The Society has also published the following works, to which attention is invited:

A Defense of the Sabbath, in reply to Ward on the Fourth Commandment. By George Carlow. First printed in London, in 1724; reprinted at Stonington, Ct., in 1802; now republished in a revised form. 168 pages.

The Royal Law Contended for. By Edward Stennet. First printed in London, in 1658. 60 pp.

An Appeal for the Restoration of the Lord's Sabbath, in an Address to the Baptists from the Seventh-day Baptist General Conference. 24 pp.

Vindication of the True Sabbath, by J. W. Morton, late Missionary of the Reformed Presbyterian Church. 64 pp.

These tracts will be furnished to those wishing them for distribution or sale, at the rate of 15 pages for one cent. Persons desiring them can have them forwarded by mail or otherwise, on sending their address, with a remittance, to GEORGE B. UTTER, Corresponding Secretary of the American Sabbath Tract Society, No. 9 Spruce-st., New York.

THE EQUALITY OF THE RACES.

Reply to D. E. Maxson.

Before any farther consideration of this very intricate and important subject, I think it necessary to point out the peculiarities of form and feature incident to the negro variety of the Ethiopian race, and what distinguishes him in a particular manner from all other people upon the earth. "In the negro variety," says Hugh Murray, "the skin is black; hair short, black, and woolly; skull compressed on the sides, and elongated towards the front; forehead low, narrow, and slanting; cheek bones very prominent; jaws projecting; nose broad and flat; lips thick, and thrown back." The same peculiarities of form and feature are given to this people by Cuvier, Buffon, Summer, Lawrence, Pritchard; in short, by all who have written upon the subject. By reference to this description, it will be perceived that darkness of complexion is not his only distinctive trait; neither can mere darkness of complexion, in any nation, establish an affinity between them and the negro race, when the other negro traits are not exhibited in their formation.

My friend, in his article of February 6th, in the Sabbath Recorder, says that, "according to the classification of most naturalists, many of the Caucasians are niger, black." He says, moreover, that he is "well sustained in saying that the negroes are 'black men.'" These propositions, taken together, amount to this, and nothing more, that all negroes are black men, but that all black men are not negroes, which admission utterly invalidates his subsequent arguments, that certain nations were negroes, because they were the blackest people known to the Jews and Greeks. "To history be the decision referred;" but not the least shadow of historical testimony does he bring to prove that the nations in question have ever been, either in ancient or modern times, identified by naturalists as exhibiting any negro characteristics of physical structure which are not shared in common with some varieties of the Caucasian type. Quoting from Anthon's Classical Dictionary, he says, "On the whole, it may be considered as clearly established, that the Cush are the genuine Ethiopian race." But this by no means proves that they belonged to the negro variety of that race. W. Swainson says, "The Ethiopian race presents three variations, considered by Cuvier as secondary, and by Blumenbach as primary. These are—1. The American Indian; 2. The Malay; 3. The Negro." Now, to assert that the American Indians or the Malays were Negroes, because they were considered as referable to the Ethiopian race, would be a curious way of reasoning; yet it is precisely in this manner that my friend attempts to establish his hypothesis that the ancient Egyptians and Ethiopians were identical with the modern Negroes. M. Cuvier describes the Ethiopian race as "extending in former times over North and South America, the Negro countries of Africa, a portion of the East Indies, including the inhabitants of Malacca, Sumatra, the innumerable islands of the Indian Archipelago, and the great Pacific Ocean." Any one having the least knowledge of the different tribes, must be aware that many of them are very different from Negroes; yet all of them are referable to the Ethiopian race, which proves decidedly that a man or a nation may be called Ethiopian that exhibits few, if any, Negro traits.

My friend enters into a very laborious discussion to prove that the Egyptians were the descendants of Cush and Mizraim, which point granted, establishes directly the reverse of what he would wish, since the Negro tribes are universally admitted to have descended from Canaan. Hear the language of history. Lawrence says, "The curse pronounced upon Canaan has been unquestionably fulfilled. Learned commentators agree in considering that central Africa was peopled by his descendants. In them the human form is most debased, the divinity of mind least developed. They still exhibit those leading resemblances which rendered Cain a type of Canaan. With few exceptions, they are to this day but wanderers and vagabonds upon the earth." By taking for granted what he ought to have proved—namely, that the ancient Egyptians and Ethiopians were Negroes, and identified as such by the concurrent testimony of history and natural science, he has professed to prove that Caucasian civilization originated from the Negroes. Establish the point that these nations were not Negroes, and the whole fabric of his long and labored dissertation tumbles to the dust. By the classification of naturalists, the Hindoos are referable to the Caucasian type. This can be learned even from the common school geographies. According to Diodorus Siculus, Ethiopia was peopled by the Gymnosophists from India or Hindostan. The question is not whether there was a civilized Ethiopian nation, but whether that nation, according to the testimony of history, can be identified as Negroes; not simply as being dark complexioned, since my friend himself admits that many of the Caucasians are niger, black. Gibbon says, "The Abyssinians still retain the olive complexion of the Arabs, and afford a shrewd conjecture that two thousand years are insufficient to change the color of the human race." Hugh Murray says, "The Abyssinians are small in person, but neither in form or feature do they resemble the Negro." Bruce represents the women as being, many of them, fair and beautiful. They are placed, by all writers upon the subject, in the list of Caucasian nations. It would be truly interesting to learn by what process they were changed from Negroes to the other race. Another reference to Hugh Murray, and I have done with this point. He says, "The comparison between the Gheez and Amheric vocabularies, with those of the Chaldeans, Arabs, and Hebrews, demonstrates an indisputable affinity between them and the people of Abyssinia."

We now come to consider the ancient Egyptians, and to refer to history the decision, not whether they were the descendants of Cush, but whether they were Negroes. Buffon says, "There can be no doubt but that the ancient Egyptians were Syrian Caucasians." W. Swainson places the ancient Egyptians in the list of the Syrian Caucasian nations. The same is done by J. Olney, and a host of others. The Copts are universally admitted to be the descendants of the ancient Egyptians, but these are not black. Guthrie says, "The Copts are swarthy, or sunburnt, in their complexions." They are thus described by Baron Larrey: "The Copts do not resemble Negroes; but after the most minute anatomical examination, I find that they exhibit the characteristics of the Abyssinians. Their skin is of a dusky yellow; their face full, without being puffed; their eyes fine, limpid, and opening in the form of an almond, and with a languishing look; the mouth middle-sized; the lips thick, but less so than the Negroes, and not, like theirs, thrown back; the hair curling, but not woolly. The sculptures on the most ancient monuments represent under the same form and features the ancient Egyptians, when the country was ruled by its native kings." Again, my friend remarks, "Blumenbach, who has collected much valuable information from the examination of mummies, says that the Egyptian race consists of three varieties, the most prominent of which is the Ethiopian; secondly, the Hindoos; and, thirdly, the Berbers." Even this would make the Caucasian predominant in his constitution, especially when we consider in what latitude the word Ethiopian is employed by this same naturalist. Gibbon says, "The geographers of antiquity have frequently hesitated to what portion of the globe they should ascribe Egypt. Ptolemy and Strabo, with the moderns, fix the Isthmus of Suez as the boundary between Asia and Africa. Dionysius, Mena, Pliny, Sallust, Hirtius, and Sulinus, have preferred for that purpose the western branch of the Nile, or even the great Catabathmus, which would assign to Asia not only Egypt, but part of Lybia;" whereas, all authorities are unanimous in placing the Negro countries in the interior parts of Africa, and along its western coasts. Bishop Summer remarks, "The Negro tribes are the descendants of Canaan, and they have always inhabited the interior parts of Africa." Hugh Murray says, "Different branches of the African type spread over that continent, except in those parts which lie north and east of the Great Desert, which are occupied by the Caucasian Syrians, in whom all traces of the Negro formation disappear." "Beyond the utmost limits of the Moors," says Gibbon, "the vast and inhospitable desert of the south extends a thousand miles to the banks of the Niger. The ancients, who had very faint and imperfect accounts of the great peninsula of Africa, were sometimes tempted to believe that it must remain forever destitute of inhabitants. Carthage would have trembled at the strange intelligence that the countries on either side of the equator were filled with innumerable nations, who differed in their color from the ordinary appearance of the human species." From all accounts, it is certain that the Negro nations were scarcely known to the ancients; although, in the British Museum are representations taken from the catacombs of Egypt, upon which Negroes are seen in the style and attitude of a conquered people. In these pictures, according to Belzoni, the Egyptian monarch is seen surrounded by his guards, while among the other figures, loaded with chains or in supplicating postures, the Jews may be distinguished by their physiognomy, the Negroes by their features and complexion, and the Medes by their dress."

It is so generally conceded that the Gypsies are the descendants of the ancient Egyptians, who abandoned their native country when it was invaded by Sultan Selim, in 1517, that it seems almost unnecessary to multiply proofs upon that point. The word Gipsy, however, is manifestly a derivative of Egyptian. They are styled Egyptians in the legal statutes enacted against them during the reigns of Mary and Elizabeth of England. Sir Matthew Hale declares them to be Egyptians. Munster and Spelman, the former of whom was contemporary with their first appearance in Europe, affirm the same. That the Egyptians, or Gypsies, are not Negroes, we may take for granted from the fact that not one of the numerous writers upon their race and nationality have ever thought of ascribing to them the peculiarities of color, form, and structure, universally attributed to and beheld in the Negro race.

In this place, a short recapitulation of the question at issue, and the principal arguments upon both sides, cannot be considered as unnecessary. In speaking of the Negroes, my friend remarked, in a former article, that "the world had bowed for ages before the shrine of intellectual greatness reared by Euclid, a Negro; that classics had borrowed their richest gems from Æsop, a Negro; and that the church of God owes much of its success to the faithful labors of some distinguished fathers, who were Negroes." "We claim, and summon the history of man for witness," he continues, "that the Negro, under the like circumstances, stands upon an equality with the Caucasian in moral and intellectual endowment." Again we hear that "Euclid was taught by Negroes, and that he had been a teacher of Negroes for four thousand years," which sounds rather startling, as, according to that assumption, the mathematician must have been contemporary with the sons of Noah. But what proofs has he brought to support all this. With respect to Euclid, nothing, except what every one knew before, that he was Professor of Mathematics at Alexandria. That he was a native of that city, an Egyptian, or a Negro, rests upon a supposition, for which he has not adduced a single word of historical testimony. Alexandria was a Grecian city, founded by Alexander the Great, who selected that site in consequence of its facilities for commanding the Indian trade. He erected and endowed its academy, and invited thither all the learned men of the time. It was here that Aristotle from Greece met Hipparchus from Chaldea. It was here that the Indian sages discoursed with the wise men of Athens. Euclid came with the rest; but, ignorant of the interest which in after years would gather about his name, the memory of the nation or the country to which he belonged has not been perpetuated. Under the article Euclid, in Lempriere's Biographical Dictionary, we have the following account: "Euclid, a most celebrated Mathematician and Astronomer, who collected all the fundamental principles of pure mathematics, which had been delivered down by Thebes, Pythagoras, and Eudoxus, which he digested into order and regularity, with many others of his own, on which account he is said to have been the first who reduced arithmetic and geometry into the form of a science. When this great man was born, or what was his country, we have no distinct account; but he flourished, as appears from Proclus' Comment upon his Elements, about 277 years before Christ, and taught mathematics at Alexandria with vast applause." According to this account, he was contemporary with Ptolemy Lagus, the successor of Alexander in the kingdom of Egypt, who, like his great predecessor, was a patron of learned men. For aught we know, Euclid might have come from India, where algebra and the mathematical sciences had already made great progress. For aught we know, he might have been a Grecian, the disciple of Aristotle; indeed, his name favors the last supposition. After this, I leave the reader to judge of the consistency of the assertion, "that Euclid was a Negro, that he was taught by Negroes, and that he had been a teacher of Negroes for four thousand years."—Guthrie says that "Æsop was the first Greek fabulist." Lempriere's Biographical Dictionary states him to have been a Phrygian. I refer my readers to the article Æsop in that work, which is too long to be inserted here. It is my opinion, that if Dr. Cheeny's account was subjected to close criticism, it would refer itself, like the former, to a supposition.—I have yet to learn Negroes; and what civilized nations, either ancient or modern, have been Negroes. What he has said of the ancient Egyptians and Ethiopians, proves nothing at all, since he has taken for granted, without any attempt at proof from the testimony of history, that these nations were black Negroes, instead of black Caucasians. The testimony of Anthon, to which he appeals, is inconclusive and utterly invalid, upon this point, since the question at issue is not concerning the Ethiopian race in general, but the Negro variety of that race. To show that these nations were not Negroes, I have brought the testimony of eminent naturalists, who rested nothing on supposition, but the strictest anatomical examination. I have defined the geography of the Negro countries, which were never considered as including either Egypt or Abyssinia; and I have shown from the testimony of history, that the descendants of these people at this day are not Negroes. He says that the modern Egyptians are chocolate color, but supposes that this change has been wrought by the operation of a law which is at work all the world over, turning the whites black and the blacks white. I confess my ignorance of any such law, unless it is the law of marriage, by which the amalgamation of the races is effected. Gibbon was ignorant of this law; for he says that "two thousand years are insufficient to change the color of the human race." Hugh Murray was ignorant of this law; for he says that "the Abyssinian, in the same latitude with the negro, has retained from time immemorial the Caucasian form and physiognomy." The learned compiler of the Encyclopedia of Arts and Sciences was ignorant of this law; for he says that "the sun-burnt complexion of the Gypsies receives no darker stain from the burning sun of Africa, nor exhibits any fairer tint from the temperate skies of Europe." Moreover, what Fathers of the Christian Church were it appears remarkable, if the Egyptians were negroes, and are turning white, that the same phenomenon is not exhibited by other negro tribes.

I am much obliged to my friend for establishing the identity of the Egyptian nations, as all arguments tending to overthrow the supposed negro character of the one must thereby have a direct bearing upon that of the other. He has also clearly established their ancient renown and civilization—a deep, but involuntary, witness of the superiority of that race which first invented and has perpetuated the arts and sciences. What if they were called Cush and Æthops, signifying "black-faced?" What if the Jews and Greeks spoke of them as being the blackest people with whom they were acquainted? By no construction of language can this be made to prove that they were identical with the Negro, whose black face, though the most ostensible, is the least radical of the differences between him and the Caucasian race.

THE THREE PAINTERS.

Nature, in sportive mood, they say,
Produced a painting—'twas a child,
Tender and fair as opening day—
The artist viewed her work and smiled.

Time, an old painter, saw the piece—
"'T was pretty, but it wanted tone—
"I'll take the picture, if you please,
And add some touches of my own."

Some ringlets round the face he threw,
Gave animation to the eyes,
Put in some teeth of pearly hue—
"The work improves," the painter cries.

He dabbled at the piece again,
Deepen'd the tints and gave it strength,
Mark'd lines of lassitude and pain,
And added something to the length.

Old Death approach'd, and shook his head—
"'T is tawdry, and it wants repose:
Too bright—knock out those lights," he said,
And instantly the eyelids close.

The tints grew faint, the form appear'd to waste
In prostrate attitude—the piece was set—
"'T is mine," he cried—"exactly to my taste,"
And placed it in his own dark cabinet.

CLOSING SCENES IN THE LIFE OF DR. JUDSON.

[Concluded.]

After our return from Mergui, the doctor advised a still further trial of the effects of sea air and sea bathing, and we accordingly proceeded to Amherst, where we remained nearly a month. This to me was the darkest period of his illness—no medical adviser, no friend at hand, and he daily growing weaker and weaker. He began to totter in walking, clinging to the furniture and walls, when he thought he was unobserved, (for he was not willing to acknowledge the extent of his debility,) and his wan face was of ghastly paleness. His sufferings too were sometimes fearfully intense, so that in spite of his habitual self-control, his groans would fill the house. At other times a kind of lethargy would steal over him, and he would sleep almost incessantly for twenty-four hours, seeming annoyed if he were aroused or disturbed. Yet there were portions of the time when he was comparatively comfortable and conversed intelligently; but his mind seemed to revert to former scenes, and he tried to amuse me with stories of his boyhood—his college days—his imprisonment in France, and his early missionary life. He had a great deal to say on his favorite theme, "The love of Christ," but his strength was too much impaired for any continuous mental effort. Even a short prayer, made audibly, exhausted him to such a degree that he was obliged to discontinue the practice.

At length I wrote to Maulmain, giving some expression of my anxieties and misgivings, and our kind missionary friends, who had from the first evinced all the tender interest and watchful sympathy of the nearest kindred, immediately sent for us—the doctor advising a sea voyage. But as there was no vessel in the harbor bound for a port sufficiently distant, we thought it best, in the meantime, to remove from our old dwelling, which had long been condemned as unhealthy, to another mission-house, fortunately empty. This change was at first attended with the most beneficial results, and our hopes revived so much, that we looked forward to the approaching rainy season for entire restoration. But it lasted only a little while, and then both of us became convinced, that though a sea voyage involved much that was exceedingly painful, it yet presented the only prospect of recovery, and could not, therefore, without a breach of duty, be neglected.

"Oh, if it were only the will of God to take me now—to let me die here!" he repeated, over and over again, in a tone of anguish, while we were considering the subject, "I can not, can not go! this is almost more than I can bear! was there ever suffering like our suffering?" and the like broken expressions, were continually falling from his lips. But he soon gathered more strength of purpose; and after the decision was fairly made he never hesitated for a moment, rather regarding the prospect with pleasure. I think the struggle which this resolution cost injured him very materially; though probably it had no share in bringing about the final result. God, who saw the end from the beginning, had counted out his days, and they were hastening to a close. Until this time he had been able to stand, and to walk slowly from room to room; but as he one evening attempted to rise from his chair, he was suddenly deprived of his small remnant of muscular strength, and would have fallen to the floor but for timely support.

From that moment his decline was rapid. As he lay helpless upon his couch, and watched the swelling of his feet, and other alarming symptoms, he became very anxious to commence his voyage, and felt equally anxious to have his wishes gratified. I still hoped he might recover—the doctor said his chances of life and death were in his opinion equally balanced—and then he always loved the sea so dearly! There was something exhilarating to him in the motion of a vessel, and he spoke with animation of getting free from the almost suffocating atmosphere incident to the hot season, and drinking in the fresh sea breezes. He talked but little more, however, than was necessary to indicate his wants, his bodily sufferings being too great to allow of conversation; but several times he looked up to me with a bright smile, and exclaimed, as heretofore, "Oh the love of Christ! the love of Christ!"

I found it difficult to ascertain, from expressions occasionally dropped, from time to time, his real opinion with regard to his recovery; but I thought there was some reason to doubt whether he was fully aware of his critical situation. I did not suppose he had any preparation to make at this late hour, and I felt sure that if he should be called ever so unexpectedly, he would not enter the presence of his Maker with a ruffled spirit; but I could not bear to have him go away, without knowing how doubtful it was whether our next meeting would not be in eternity; and perhaps, too, in my own distress, I might still have looked for words of encouragement and sympathy, to a source which had never before failed. It was late in the night, and I had been performing some little sick-room offices, when suddenly he looked up to me and exclaimed, "This will never do! You are killing yourself for me, and I will not permit it. You must have some one to relieve you. If I had not been made selfish by suffering, I should have insisted upon it long ago."

He spoke so like himself—with the earnestness of health, and in a tone to which my ear had of late been a stranger, that for a moment I felt almost bewildered with sudden hope. He received my reply to what he said with a half-pitying, half-gratified smile, but in the meantime his expression had changed—the marks of excessive debility were again apparent, and I could not forbear adding, "It is only for a little while, you know."

"Only a little while," he repeated mournfully; "this separation is a painful thing, but it does not distress me now as it did—I am too weak." "You have no reason to be distressed," I answered, "with such glorious prospects before you. You have often told me it is the one left alone who suffers, not the one who goes to be with Christ." He gave me a rapid questioning glance, then assumed for several moments an attitude of deep thought. Finally, he slowly unclosed his eyes, and fixing them on me, said in a calm, earnest tone, "I do not believe I am going to die. I think I know why this illness has been sent on me—I needed it—I feel that it has done me good, and it is my impression that I shall recover, and be a better and more useful man."

"Then it is your wish to recover?" I inquired. "If it should be the will of God, yes. I should like to complete the dictionary, on which I have bestowed so much labor, now that it is so nearly done; for though it has not been a work that pleased my taste, or quite satisfied my feelings, I have never underrated its importance. Then after that come all the plans that we have formed. Oh, I feel as though only just beginning to be prepared for usefulness."

"It is the opinion of most of the mission," I remarked, "that you will not recover." "I know it is," he replied, "and I suppose they think me an old man, and imagine it is nothing for one like me to resign a life so full of trials. But I am not old—at least in that sense—you know I am not. Oh! no man ever left this world with more inviting prospects, with brighter hopes or warmer feelings—warmer feelings"—he repeated, and burst into tears. His face was perfectly placid, even while the tears broke away from the closed lids, and rolled, one after another, down to the pillow. There was no trace of agitation or pain in his manner of weeping, but it was evidently the result of acute sensibilities, combined with great physical weakness. To some suggestions which I ventured to make, he replied, "It is not that—I know all that, and feel it in my inmost heart. Lying here on my bed when I could not talk, I have had such views of the loving condescension of Christ, and the glories of heaven, as I believe are seldom granted to mortal man. It is not because I shrink from death that I wish to live, neither is it because the ties which bind me here, though some of them are very sweet, bear any comparison with the drawings I at times feel towards heaven; but a few years would not be missed from my eternity of bliss, and I can well afford to spare them, for your sake and for the sake of the poor Burmans. I am not tired of my work, neither am I tired of the world, yet when Christ calls me home, I shall go with the gladness of a boy bounding away from his school. Perhaps I feel something like the young bride, when she contemplates resigning the pleasant associations of her childhood, for a yet dearer home—though only a very little like her—for there is doubt resting on my future." "Then death would not take you by surprise," I remarked, "if it should come even before you could get on board ship." "Oh, no," he said, "death will never take me by surprise—do not be afraid of that—I feel so strong in Christ. He has not led me so tenderly thus far, to forsake me at the gate of heaven. No, no; I am willing to live a few years longer, if it should be so ordered, and if otherwise, I am willing and glad to die now. I leave myself entirely in the hands of God, to be disposed of according to his holy will."

The next day some one mentioned in his presence, that the native Christians were greatly opposed to the voyage, and that many other persons had a similar feeling with regard to it. I thought he seemed troubled, and after the visitor had withdrawn, I inquired if he still felt as when he conversed with me the night previous. He replied, "Oh yes; that was no evanescent feeling. It has been with me, to a greater or less extent, for years, and will be with me, I trust, to the end. I am ready to go to-day—if it should be the will of God, this very hour; but I am not anxious to die—at least, when I am not beside myself with pain."

"Then why are you so desirous of going to sea? I should think it would be a matter of indifference to you." "No," he answered quietly, "my judgment tells me it would be wrong not to go—the doctor says criminal. I shall certainly die here—if I go away I may possibly recover. There is no question with regard to duty in such a case; and I do not like to see any hesitation, even though it springs from affection."

He several times spoke of a burial at sea, and always as though the prospect was agreeable. It brought, he said, a sense of freedom and expansion, and seemed far pleasanter than the confined, dark, narrow grave, to which he had committed so many that he loved. And he added, that although his burial-place was a matter of no real importance, yet he believed it was not in human nature to be altogether without a choice.

I have already given you an account of the embarkation, of my visits to him while the vessel remained in the river, and of our last sad, silent parting; and Mr. Ranney has finished the picture. You will find in this closing part, some dark shadows, that will give you pain; but you must remember his present felicity is enhanced by those very sufferings; and we should regret nothing that serves to brighten his crown of glory. I ought also to add, that I have gained pleasanter impressions in conversation with Mr. R., than from his written account, but it would be difficult to convey them to you; and as he whom they concern was accustomed to say of similar things, "You will learn it all in heaven."

During the last hour of your sainted brother's life, Mr. Ranney bent over him and held his hand; while poor Pinapah stood at a little distance weeping bitterly. The table had been spread in the cuddy, as usual, and the officers did not know what was passing in the cabin, till summoned to dinner. Then they gathered about the door, and watched the closing scene with solemn reverence. Now—thanks to a merciful God!—his pains had left him, not a momentary spasm disturbed his placid face, nor did the contraction of a muscle denote the least degree of suffering; the agony of death was passed, and his wearied spirit was turning to its rest in the bosom of the Saviour. From time to time, he pressed the hand in which his own was resting, his clasp losing its force at each successive pressure; while his shortened breath (though there was no struggle, no gasping, as if it came and went with difficulty) gradually grew softer and fainter, until it died upon the air—and he was gone. Mr. Ranney closed his eyes, and composed the passive limbs—the ship's officers stole softly from the door, and the neglected meal was left upon the board untasted.

They lowered him to his ocean grave, without a prayer; for his freed spirit had soared above the reach of earthly intercession, and to the foreigners who stood around it would have been a senseless form. And there they left him in his unquiet sepulchre; but it matters little, for we know that while the unconscious clay is "drifting on the shifting currents of the restless main," nothing can disturb the hallowed rest of the immortal spirit. Neither could he have a more fitting monument than the blue waves which visit every coast; for his warm sympathies went forth to the ends of the earth, and included the whole family of man. It is all as God would have it, and our duty is but to bend meekly to his will, and wait, in faith and patience, till we also shall be summoned home.

REV. DR. NELSON.

Forty years since infidel principles were much more extensively circulated in Kentucky than at present. The writings of Paine and Voltaire were read in every circle of society. About the time of which we speak, probably a few years earlier, a young man of ardent temperament, and of no inconsiderable degree of intellectual force, commenced the study of medicine in the then small village of Danville. An incipient scepticism was soon implanted in his mind.

His studies completed, he spent some time with the army at the North, and subsequently at the South, as Surgeon's Mate. With a high bearing and proud spirit, he possessed acuteness and vigor, and an admiration for honesty. He detected a disregard for truth in the writers who had been his text books, upon subjects involving the interests of eternity.

He read farther, and discovered that his system rested upon a tissue of falsehood and fallacious reasoning. He renounced infidelity, became a Christian, and a minister of God's holy word. He spent a life of unusual devotion in the effort to draw the attention of men to Christ, and the revelation of an immortality beyond the grave.

As his crowning service he wrote, in the full maturity of his rich Christian experience, a book upon the subject which had chiefly interested him—a compend of the reasonings which had occupied him—which had dwelt as a living presence in his soul—which, in public and private, had striven within him, and found expression in a thousand strains of most impressive eloquence. "The Cause and Cure of Infidelity" was compiled as few books have the good fortune to be compiled; it was condensed from the accumulated impressions of an active and gifted mind, concentrated through years upon a single point.

It is the utterance of a man who walked with God, who was caught often to the third heaven, and who most vividly realized, throughout life, the vitality and power of the truths to which he was a witness. In fact, Dr. Nelson's book is not one of evidences so much as one of direct testimony—the startling and direct testimony of one who "has seen," and bears witness to the truth.

We were but a child when Kentucky was blessed with the ministrations of that great and good man, yet even now the light of his calm earnest eye beams often upon us, as, when awed and thrilled, we listened to his high reasoning upon prophecy, revelation, and the world to come. We comprehended little of him then, save his sincerity. None could have heard him—child, saint, or sinner, without feeling him to be a man of God. He spoke with "the power and demonstration of the Spirit." The life and character of Dr. Nelson, faithfully portrayed, would be replete with instruction. Indeed, examples such as his should be precious in the eyes of the Church—they should not be suffered to perish from memory. [Presb. Herald.

"You are rather late this morning, William," said good Mr. Risewiththesun to a laggard apprentice who came at a late hour. "Yes, sir; but 'better late than never,' is an old saying," replied William. "Better never late," said the master, "is an axiom of far more worth, though it may not be so old."

When Lycurgus, of Sparta, was about to reform and change the government, one advised him that it should be reduced to an absolute popular equality. "Sir," said the lawgiver, "begin it in your own house first."

REVERENCE FOR SACRED THINGS.

We do not believe that the wood, brick, mortar, and other materials which enter into the structure of a church edifice, are any more holy than the same kind of materials in any other building. In short, we do not believe that, under the Christian dispensation, a building is holy in any such sense as the Jewish temple was. We have no idea that the services performed on the opening of a house of worship, whether called consecration, or dedication, or any thing else, confer any sacredness upon it, or render the worship of those assembled within its walls a whit more acceptable to God than that of those assembled in a school-house or a barn. "In every place, incense shall be offered unto my name, and a pure offering." Mal. 1: 11. And the High Churchman, who would have you take off your hat reverently the moment you enter the doors of Trinity, although no worship is being performed there at the time, has studied his Bible to but little purpose.

We think, however, that some run about as far to the opposite extreme. To make as conspicuous a proclamation as possible of their want of reverence for the house of worship, they walk into it with a light and careless air, they keep their hats on till they have reached the pew, they put them on the moment the benediction is pronounced, they keep up vain conversation with one another till the minister rises to open the services, one takes out his pen-knife to pare his finger nails, another fumbles over the leaves of his hymn-book, a third leans his head on the forward pew and begins to read a newspaper, the chorister in the gallery is busy in turning over the music book, and in a softly manner whistles over the tunes, not a few indulge a good nap during time of sermon, and too often jocular and noisy remarks are heard among the people as they pass out of the house. Now, to our mind all this is exceedingly unbecoming. If people have no reverence for the place, they ought at least to have some for the God before whom they profess to appear. "God is greatly to be feared in the assembly of the saints, and to be had in reverence of all them that are about him." When we enter the house of a friend, we conduct ourselves respectfully, not out of regard to the building and its furniture, but out of regard to him who dwells there. So when we enter the house of God, we should behave with sobriety and reverential awe. It is, if not the dwelling place of the Almighty, his audience chamber, where, for the time being, he manifests himself graciously to sincere worshipers. The preacher may be but an earthen vessel, it is true, but if he speaks the words of truth, we should consider it the same as if God himself were speaking to us. And who, that felt himself to be addressed by the great Searcher of hearts, would laugh and whisper to his neighbor, or amuse himself by twirling his cane, or twisting his handkerchief about his fingers?

We fear that, in these days of degeneracy, the good old plan of teaching children to carry themselves in a staid and careful manner on the Sabbath, to walk reverently to the place of worship, to treat with respect the ministers of religion and all good people, to handle the Bible with care, and to be very devout under the administration of religious ordinances, is in danger of being supplanted by an irreverent looseness, which tends more to infidelity than to piety. Of Edward the Sixth it is related, that in his library one day, being desirous to reach a book on a high shelf, he was offered a large Bible as his footstool. But, with strong expressions of disapprobation towards the attendant who had made it, he refused the offer. Now, some may think this an unnecessary superstition, and argue very plausibly that the paper, ink, and binding of a Bible are no more holy than those of any other book. But we cannot help thinking, that he who accustoms himself to treat the Book with irreverence, will soon learn to treat the truths it contains in the same manner. A work on geometry, or on chemistry, we may kick about, and be as well convinced of the truths which it contains as if we had taken the best care of it. But not so with the Bible. That deals with the heart and with the conscience, and we need all the help which the principle of association can give, to get the heart thoroughly under its influence.

What a Pastor can do.—At the Anniversary of our Tract Society, last fall, Bro. J. R. Irish, pastor of the Church at DeRuyter, urged strenuously the importance of pastoral agency in the collection of money for tract purposes. The history of operations in his church shows what may be done when the pastor takes the work in hand. In DeRuyter and Truxton, last year, the contribution for tracts fell short of fifteen dollars. "This year, in connection with pastoral visits, and with frequent cautions not to give more than duty to the Master requires, the subscriptions will amount to nearly or quite sixty dollars."

Temperance in College.—A letter of Edward C. Delavan says that it is now some two years since Mr. Gough visited and lectured to the students in Union College. A majority of the several classes then became members of the Temperance Society. Of the two classes which have since entered, every member has voluntarily pledged himself to Total Abstinence.

DEDICATION.

Our brethren in Shiloh, N. J., have just completed a beautiful house of worship, and, with the usual formalities, have dedicated it to the Lord. The dedication took place on Thursday, the 13th inst., in presence of a large concourse of people. The discourse was founded on John 4: 24—"God is a Spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth." The audience was solemn and attentive, and the services throughout were felt by all to be of an interesting character.

The Shiloh Church is one of the oldest in our denomination, having been constituted more than a hundred years ago. Eld. John Davis, who for more than thirty years officiated as its pastor, is still living, and though quite feeble in health, is able to be present at its meetings. He is now the oldest living member. On the day of dedication he offered the introductory prayer.

The old meeting-house, an ancient brick structure, has been converted into an academy, with lower and second stories, and is now occupied by the flourishing school of which our esteemed brother Larkin is principal.

We sincerely congratulate our Shiloh brethren on their success in completing so commodious and beautiful a house for the name of the Lord. May many souls be born there. Bro. Wm. M. Jones, late of the Haytien Mission, officiates as their pastor for the present. His labors, we trust, will not be in vain in the Lord. When we left, which was on Second-day of last week, a series of meetings was in progress, and the church was apparently struggling in prayer for an outpouring of the Spirit. We shall await with anxiety farther news from that place.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 28.

Glasgow, February 7th, 1851.

Our Queen has this week personally addressed Parliament; and although on the absorbing topic of "Papal Aggression" little is said, the Speech on this point seems to give general satisfaction. It is, however, the avowed aim of Government to put nothing into this document likely to provoke an amendment upon the usual motion of acknowledgment. There is, therefore, a studied indefiniteness in the language used. Her Majesty declares her determination to maintain the rights of the Crown, while religious liberty is to remain unimpaired. In the House of Lords, Lord Cumoys, and in the House of Commons, Mr. Austey, both Roman Catholics, supported the Government, expressing satisfaction in the Speech, and condemning the Papal Brief. Lord Lansdowne, in the Lords, intimated that "a bill would be introduced which he believed would effectually check any encroachment on the Royal prerogative." In the Commons, intimation was given that this Bill would be brought in to-night, and its import be "to prevent the assumption of certain ecclesiastical titles with respect to places in the United Kingdom"—and is, therefore, to apply to Ireland as well as Great Britain. The Bill is to be brought in by Lord John Russell, who, in speaking upon the subject, by a reference to history, showed that what is now attempted by the Pope, had always been resisted by the Government of the country, even previous to the Reformation. But there is still an earnest desire to know what is actually to be done should the Pope and his Cardinal force upon us "the red stockings" and the canon law.

Meanwhile, the Papists are steadily proceeding in their course. A new bishopric has been created in Ireland, and the fact is flung in the face of Government, in a tone of defiance, by the Roman Catholic newspapers. To-morrow, it is announced, they are to start a new weekly newspaper in Glasgow. In London they have purchased a large piece of ground at Westminster, on which, it is stated, they purpose to erect a magnificent cathedral. But the Cardinal is not without his troubles. The priests of one of the English Dioceses (Beverly in Yorkshire) have openly protested against the powers conferred upon him, as an infringement upon their rights as Englishmen. A lady in Jersey, who had given him some hundreds of pounds for the purpose of building some ecclesiastical erection, prosecutes him for repayment of the sum advanced, as he has abandoned the intention of building in that island. In the Court of Chancery, also, an action has been raised by the family and nearest of kin of a Frenchman, deceased, M. Carre, to restrain him and other trustees from applying funds left by the deceased, on his death-bed, under the suggestion of priests, for building Roman Catholic buildings. The amount is said to be £7000. The motion is allowed to stand over, the trustees having demanded time to answer the affidavits, which very seriously affect the character of the priest who officiated at the death-bed. A letter to the Cardinal has also been published, from which it appears that Mr. Pearson, M. P., had endeavored to induce him to make acknowledgment that the publication of the Papal Brief had been made by him with a view to a prosecution at common law for the offense. Wiseman, however, would make no such acknowledgment; and it is said that the evidence cannot easily be otherwise established, although it is difficult to see why. Lady Morgan continues a controversy as to whether "St. Peter's chair" at Rome has upon it a Cufic inscription embracing the Mahommedan symbol, There is one God, and Mahommet is His prophet. Her ladyship, in a book on Italy, published many years ago, states this as a fact, on the testimony of the French philosophers who accompanied Napoleon when he entered Rome. The chair which bears the name of Peter, having been brushed and brought into the light, they averred was found so inscribed. When Lady Morgan announced this, it greatly scandalized the faithful; and Wiseman, then a man of little mark in Rome, took up the cudgel in defense of the orthodoxy of the chair, and for the punishment of such audacity. Her ladyship was not aware of this until his appointment as Cardinal made his antecedents to be better searched out; but so soon as her attention was called to the abusive pamphlet, she, in the spirit of "the Wild Irish Girl," attacked with the keenest irony the new-fledged dignitary. The matter has occasioned some amusement; while, on the part of the incredulous as to Peter's chair, a call has been made that the chair be again brought to the light of day, as the best means of determining its orthodoxy, if not of testing its earliest ownership. SPIRIT RAPPINGS.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Nothing is more natural than the curiosity which has been excited in the community to know the facts, origin and design of these mysteries, and to what category they belong. How far we may be justified in gratifying this curiosity, may with some be a matter of doubt. But if we are unable to arrive at satisfactory conclusions by attending to these demonstrations—and I am led to believe that few have become satisfied in this way—then we must take another method; and I know no better than the Word of God—the only reliable source of religious information.

My first inquiry will be, In what manner, and by what means, are the present communications obtained? The reply will be, Through the well-understood medium of clairvoyants; and, (as those professing some knowledge in the theory say,) electricity or magnetism is what constitutes this medium between the natural and spirit world. All clairvoyants are not mediums, but all mediums must be clairvoyants. These mediums must be present, or no communication can be had. Through their aid, it is understood that St. Luke, St. Paul, or some other of the inhabitants of the spirit world, are present, and willing to communicate. If some person present wishes a deceased friend named, he can be called up, and questions put by the living are answered by the spirits of the dead; and, when required, long communications are made by certain raps, explained by the artist or medium, by which means difficult questions are solved, expositions of Scripture given, doctrines advocated, lost property described, its place of deposit told, the state of happiness or misery of the dead ascertained, any desirable information given, and future events foretold.

Admitting that these communications are really, as assumed, supernatural, or of spirits, which it is not my present object to investigate, we might take it for a fact that their design is also apparent, and the origin should be a matter of interest; for it is assumed that these mysterious demonstrations are the evidence of a new state of things—a new era in the world, or dispensation to the church. But, as some of the "spirits" admit that communications with spirits and angels in the time of our Saviour were by clairvoyance, or what is now called so, it will be conceded that this state was known at least two thousand years ago, and the clearest case on record is more than three thousand years ago. See 1 Samuel 28: 7. Saul said to his servant, Seek out a woman that hath a 'familiar spirit;' and he said to her, "I pray thee divine by the familiar spirit, and bring me him whom I shall name to thee." The woman being a good medium, complies, and Saul directs her to call up Samuel. She describes what she sees, the gods coming out of the earth, (so she was a clairvoyant;) and the communication was had, whether by rapping, or by other means, is not told. Suffice it to say, that it professed to be Samuel, and communicated as Samuel probably would have done, and foretold what proved true to the letter.

I will name one other instance, from the New Testament—Acts 12th chapter. Paul was annoyed by a damsel who was possessed with a spirit of divination and soothsaying. She seemed zealous on the subject of religion, and stated truly of Paul and Silas, "These men are the servants of the Most High God, which show unto us the way of salvation;" and thus she did many days. But she had the spirit of divination; she had not only a familiar spirit, but was possessed by it, which Paul cast out as unclean. We learn from this that she too was a clairvoyant, under the control of certain men, her "masters," who used her for divining or fortune-telling; and whether she received communications as modern subjects do, by rapping, we are not informed.

These two cases may be sufficient to show that the arts in question are as old as history; and the Scriptures inform us that they were used in Egypt, by the nations driven out of Canaan, (Deut. 18: 10, 11,) by the Babylonians, (Daniel 3,) and by the Israelites, (2 Kings 21.)

I hope no one will take exceptions at these comparisons. Names are of but little consequence; it is the thing itself, and not the name, that I have been presenting. It is now known as "psychology," "mesmerism," and "spirit rappings." It was then known as "necromancy," "sorcery," "magic," "astrology," "witchcraft," "soothsaying," "divining," &c. It may be thought, by some, doubtful whether the ancient and the modern arts are the same, as this places the modern art in a very unpopular category; and some might be startled at being denominated necromancers, witches, or wizards; but such is the art they practice or defend. "A necromancer," says Mr. Webster, "is one who pretends to foretell events by holding converse with departed spirits, or with the dead." Necromantia—"Answers given by spirits called up." (Ainsworth.) It is a term convertible for witchcraft, divination, consulting of familiar spirits, magic, sorcery, and the like, by the same authority; and it is proved from the cases referred to, that the woman of Endor was a necromancer. She had a familiar spirit, and held communication with the dead, or pretended to do so.

I have not given my opinion as to whether ancient or modern psychology and necromancy are really what they profess—whether St. Paul, or St. Luke, or St. Peter, are really present at those exhibitions, or whether the prophet Samuel was present with Saul and the woman of Endor. My opinion would be of no consequence. It is competent, in the last-mentioned case, to know, that he answered the description, and talked like the prophet, stated facts, and foretold future events correctly; and if it was a delusion, it was never detected, or found out, as we learn of. This may be said of the modern psychological developments; and they claim no advantages in comparison over the former case. Some persons, "charmed," will argue, that this is science, and therefore a proper study, an unexceptionable avocation. But what it now is it ever was, and God's prophets knew as well its origin and tendency as modern apologists. Then let us take their testimony.

Deut. 18: 9—12—"When thou art come into the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee, thou shalt not learn to do after the abominations of those nations. There shall not be found among you any one that maketh his son or his daughter to pass through the fire, or that useth divination, or an observer of times, or an enchanter, or a witch, or a charmer, or a consulter with familiar spirits, or a wizard, or a necromancer. For all that do these things are an abomination unto the Lord; and because of these abominations, the Lord thy God doth drive them out from before thee."

Leviticus 19: 31—"Regard not them that have familiar spirits, neither seek after wizards, to be defiled by them; I am the Lord your God."

Leviticus 20: 6, 7—"And the soul that turneth after such as have familiar spirits, and after wizards, to go a whoring after them, I will even set my face against that soul, and will cut him off from among his people. Sanctify yourselves, therefore, and be ye holy; for I am the Lord your God."

2 Kings 21: 6—"And he made his son pass through the fire, and observed times, and used enchantments, and dealt with familiar spirits and wizards; he wrought much wickedness in the sight of the Lord, to provoke him to anger."

The Apostle Paul places the sin of witchcraft in a catalogue of the most abominable works of darkness. Galatians 5: 19, 20—"Now the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these, adultery, fornication, uncleanness, laciviousnes, idolatry witchcraft," &c. Its existence is in other passages proven by the notice it receives, and the evils with which it is classed.

After what has been named, will not those who have been in doubt respecting these demonstrations, have the prudence to approach them with great caution, if they are placed in circumstances to approach them at all? If this is the same art (or science, if you prefer it) with that described in the Scriptures, we should flee it as a dangerous epidemic—a most fatal contagion. If we attempt to excuse it, because we may be pleased with its developments, and we can not discover its evil effects, that it is the very nature of the disease; it is "charming," it is "enchanting," it is "bewitching," for such are its characteristics in olden times. If it were suspected to be dangerous, it would be avoided; if known to be sinful and ruinous, it would be shunned as a serpent that charms only to devour. J. M.

PETITION OF PENNSYLVANIA SABBATH-KEEPERS.

The following petition has been circulated among the German Sabbath-keepers of Pennsylvania, and several copies of it, numerously signed, have been forwarded to the Legislature. It is desired, that each church or neighborhood of Sabbath-keepers in the State should at once take steps to have the petition extensively circulated, and forward to some member of the Legislature from the region where the petitioners reside.

To the honorable, the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in general assembly met:

We, your petitioners, members of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination, (and others,) living in the County of   would respectfully represent, that there reside several hundred individuals in different Counties in this State, who are members of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination, who consider themselves in duty bound to observe the seventh day of the week, commonly called Saturday, as the Sabbath. The existing laws compel this society of Christians, either to observe the first day of the week, (commonly called Sunday,) as the holy Sabbath, which they cannot conscientiously regard as such, or subject them to fines or imprisonment. And as the law of God only requires one day out of seven for rest, and allows six days for labor, your memorialists think that they are not fairly treated, when they are compelled by the law of 1794 to keep the first day of the week as the Sabbath, in addition to the seventh; and by such means being compelled to keep two days in a week; as the law of God, (in their estimation,) requires them to keep the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath, and the law of the State, the first. They imagine that it is not the spirit or meaning of the constitution of this State, or of the United States, that any religious society, or any God-fearing persons, should be forced into measures of this kind by coercive laws. They have been repeatedly prosecuted, and compelled to pay fines and costs, for performing secular duties on Sunday, and therefore your memorialists humbly and respectfully ask for the enactment of a law to exempt them from the provisions of the first section of the Act entitled "An Act for the Prevention of Vice and Immorality," passed the 22d day of April, 1794.

THE BOSTON FUGITIVE-SLAVE RESCUE.

The rescue of the alledged fugitive slave Shadrach, (of which we gave some account last week,) is likely to lead to important results. Shadrach, we are happy to learn, is now safe in Canada—one important result at least. Several persons, white and colored, have been arrested on the charge of aiding or abetting in the rescue. Among the former is Elizur Wright, editor of the Commonwealth, and Charles Davis, Esq., a member of the Suffolk bar. Each of these gentlemen has been held to bail in $3,000 to appear for examination at a future day. When their cases come up for trial, several important questions, including that of the constitutionality of the law, will probably be pretty thoroughly sifted—another important result. Riotous and mobocratic proceedings are to be deprecated in all cases; but if there is any case which can furnish a shadow of justification for them, it is such a case as this. The Commonwealth has the following remarks on the effect of this proceeding in a legal point of view:—

"The only possible way by which the constitutionality of the law can be brought before the Supreme Court of the United States is in a suit for false imprisonment against the commissioner and marshal; and in order to bring such a suit, it is indispensably necessary that the alledged fugitive should be at liberty. The rescue, then, so much complained of, is only a legal step, like an entry on land for the purpose of laying the foundation for a suit to test the title. The man who enters on his own land may be sued for trespass, and those who help the fugitive to escape may be indicted for a rescue; but whether there is any trespass or rescue, will entirely depend upon the question whether the person in possession, whether of the land or of the alledged fugitive, have any legal title, and that is the very point to be tried."

The following Proclamation of the President of the United States shows how much importance is attached to the case by the General Government. If attention should be so thoroughly roused to the importance of suppressing mobs, that the thing would be kept in mind until some poor abolitionist in a Southern State needs protection, it would be well.

Proclamation.

Washington, Tuesday afternoon,
February 18th, 1851.

Whereas, information has been received, that sundry lawless persons, principally persons of color, combined and confederated together for the purpose of opposing, by force, the laws of the United States, did, at Boston, Massachusetts, on the 15th of this month, make a violent assault on the Marshal or Deputy Marshal of the United States, for the District of Massachusetts, in the Court House, and outrage the said officers, and did, by force, rescue from their custody a person arrested as a fugitive slave, and then and there a prisoner lawfully holden by the said Marshal or Marshals of the United States, and other scandalous outrages did commit, in violation of law—Now,

Therefore, to the end that the authority of the laws may be maintained, and those concerned in violating them brought to immediate and condign punishment, I have issued this my proclamation, calling on all well disposed citizens to rally to the support of the laws of their country, and requiring and commanding all officers, civil and military, who shall be found within the vicinity of this outrage, to be aiding and assisting, by all means in their power, in quelling this and other such combinations, and assisting the Marshal and his Deputies in re-capturing the above mentioned prisoner.

And I do especially direct that prosecutions be commenced against all persons who shall have made themselves aiders or abettors in or to this flagitious offense. And I do further command that the District Attorney of the United States, and all other persons concerned in the administration or execution of the laws of the United States, cause the foregoing offenders, and all such as have harbored or concealed such fugitive contrary to law, to be immediately arrested, and proceeded with according to law.

Given under my hand and the seal of the United States, this 18th day of February, 1851.

MILLARD FILLMORE.

Daniel Webster, Secretary of State.

Progress of Missions.—The number of missionaries employed in heathen countries by the various denominations of evangelical Christians, is believed to be not less than 1,500. Including their assistants, native and foreign, the number will exceed 7,800. It was recently stated by Rev. Dr. Anderson, at Boston, that there was contributed in this country, during the past year, for foreign missions, an aggregate of $740,000. For home missions, including church edifices, the support of preaching, &c., there has been expended nearly $9,000,000. Connected with the denominations, in the United States, are 3,000,000 church members, 29,000 churches, and 23,000 ministers. The same classes of Christians in Great Britain contribute for foreign missions, $2,000,000 annually, and for home missions an amount nearly equal to those made in this country for the same object.

Encouraging.—The consistory of Breslau, in Prussian Silesia, has issued a circular, reminding not only clergymen, but all other clerical functionaries, that it is unbecoming their sacred calling to take out game certificates, or to join in shooting or sporting in general.

The Boston Fugitive.—The Commonwealth says that Sherwood, or, as he is generally called, Shadrach, spent the Sunday after his escape very quietly in a town less than one hundred miles from Boston. He arrived when the family were sitting down to a late breakfast, of which he declined to partake. He accepted, however, a glass of cold water, and then, falling upon his knees, thanked God for his deliverance, and prayed most earnestly for a continuance of His mercies. Mr. Sherwood has been, for many years, a devoted member of the Methodist Church.

Having rested through the day, the fugitive attended an Anti-Slavery Lecture in the evening, disguised in the dress of a woman, and remaining unsuspected by the audience. One of the speakers asked them what would they do if Shadrach were among them, instead of being on his way to Canada. He enjoyed the meeting highly, it being the first abolition gathering that he had ever seen. A little company met in the house where he spent the night; at the close of the evening, Sherwood sang a hymn, and again prayed in an earnest and impressive manner.

He is said to be very calm, and to have expressed his perfect confidence in the protection of God. He declared that, at the worst, his claimant should have had nothing but a dead body to carry from the State. On Monday morning, he left for the North, and is now enjoying the security which the Free Soil of Canada gives to every human being.

Progress of a Pound of Cotton.—The following is an account of the travels of a pound of manufactured American cotton:—"The Cotton was sent from the United States to London; thence to Manchester, where it was spun into yarn; thence to Paisley, where it was woven; next to Ayreshire, to be tamboured; and then to Dumbarton, where it was hand-sewed. It was then again sent to Paisley; whence it was conveyed to a distant part of Renfrewshire to be bleached, and then returned to Paisley. It was afterwards sent to Glasgow and finished; and from Glasgow it was taken to London From its shipment in America, till its arrival in the London warehouse, it must have journeyed 3000 miles by sea, and 920 by land. Its value was increased by the processes of the manufacturer 2,000 per cent.; whilst no less than 150 persons were engaged in its carriage and preparation."

Baptist Statistics.—One of our exchanges says that the Minutes of the last Anniversary of the "Indiana Baptist General Association," show that in that State there are of that denomination of Christians, 38 Associations, 582 Churches, 277 Preachers, 30 Licentiates, and 25,242 Communicants; of these last 1568 were baptized during the last year. Last year the Baptist Denomination had 38 home missionaries in the field, who baptized 422 persons, rode 26,526 miles, and preached 3,282 sermons. The same report shows that the Regular Baptists have in the United States 20 Colleges, 9 Theological Institutes, and 762,211 Communicants, which shows that as a whole the Denomination is rapidly increasing.

Extinction of a Persian Sect.—The Persian sect of Babis, whose main doctrine is said to be the denial of the existence of God, and who recognize no other authority than that of their chief, has at last been extinguished. They had been persecuted for two years, and their Chief, Bab de Shiraf, put to death at Tauris, when they betook themselves to Lingrain, which they fortified. The city was stormed by a considerable body of troops under Mehemet Chan, and most of the Babis fell in the struggle. The prisoners will doubtless all be killed. They are accused of scandalous offenses against the religion and morals of the country.

Geo. Thompson at Springfield, Mass.—Geo. Thompson, Esq., M. P., was very shabbily treated at Springfield, Mass., last week. He was announced to speak on the subject of American Slavery on Second-day evening; but a company of rowdies got together, burnt him in effigy, and created such a disturbance that Hampden Hall was closed by the owners through fear of damage. On the following day, however, Mr. Thompson had an opportunity to speak to a small audience. Shame on Springfield!

The Accident to the Atlantic.—Messrs. Stillman, Allen & Co., of the Novelty Iron Works, builders of the Engines of the Atlantic, have published a Card, to the effect that they are in no way responsible for the shafts which gave out. The shafts which they had provided were, according to their judgment, of the best character; but in consequence of a difference of opinion between them and the Agent of the Company, they were not permitted to use them, but were required to use another set, made under the direction of the Company, and on its responsibility.

Value of Property in New York.—The property on the corner of Broadway and Wall street, 50 feet by 75, has been purchased by a new bank for $110,000, being nearly $30 per square foot. The corner of Broadway and Pine street, 43 feet by 100, has been sold for $115,000, about $27 per foot. The corner of Chatham and Duane streets, 25 feet by 82, has been purchased by a bank, at $50,000. Elegant buildings are to be erected in each case.

Common Schools of the State of Ohio.—The irreducible school and trust funds of Ohio amount to $1,683,596 63; the total amount of school moneys distributed by the State among the several school districts in 1850, was $297,272 81; and the total amount paid for Common School purposes in 1850, including the amount raised in school districts, was $560,764 00. During the last fifteen years the State of Ohio has distributed, exclusive of the amount raised by districts, to the Common Schools, $3,620,188 40.

"The Sabbath-School Visitor" for March (No. 3) is issued this week. Persons desiring the numbers from the beginning of the year can be supplied.

General Intelligence.

Proceedings in Congress Last Week.

SECOND-DAY, Feb. 17.

In the SENATE, numerous petitions were presented, among which was one that naval vessels be sent to California to bring home Americans now there. A petition from Maine, for the repeal or essential modification of the Fugitive Slave Law, led to a long and warm talk about "agitating" the slavery question, in which Messrs. Butler, Atchinson, Hamlin, Chase, Berrien, Seward, Badger, Bradbury, Hale, Foote, Cooper, Pearce, and Rhett took part. A resolution was offered, but laid over, that the President be requested to lay before the Senate, if compatible with the public interest, any information he may possess in regard to the alledged recent case of forcible resistance to the execution of the law of the United States in the city of Boston, and to communicate to the Senate what measures he had adopted to meet this occurrence, and whether, in his opinion, any additional legislation is necessary to meet the exigency of the case and to more rigorously execute the existing laws. A Joint Resolution was introduced, authorizing a naval vessel to receive and bring to this country Kossuth and his companions. The Postage Reduction Bill was taken up, talked about a while, and the Senate adjourned.

The HOUSE spent the whole day upon the River and Harbor Bill, but adjourned at a late hour without coming to any result.

THIRD-DAY, Feb. 18.

The SENATE, after receiving and referring several petitions, took up the resolution calling on the President for information in regard to the rescue of the alledged slave in Boston, and after spending most of the session in discussing this affair in connection with the Shay Rebellion, the Invasion of Cuba, &c., the resolution was unanimously adopted. A resolution was offered in favor of reducing the expenses of the Army and Navy, which was laid over. The House Postage Bill was taken up, and an amendment in favor of a uniform two-cent rate of letter postage was rejected. An amendment to allow newspapers of not over 300 square inches to pass through the mails at one-fourth the rates fixed for large papers was adopted, and the Senate adjourned.

The HOUSE passed a few private bills and then took up the River and Harbor Bill, and after considerable sharp talk, passed it, or, rather, a substitute, which does not differ materially from the original bill.

FOURTH-DAY, Feb. 19.

In the SENATE, bills were reported to indemnify the master and owners of the Spanish schooner Amistad, and to establish a Branch Mint in California. The Judiciary Committee reported back three petitions from Pennsylvania, asking for the repeal of the Fugitive Slave Law, stating that legislation on the subject was wholly inexpedient; they were accordingly discharged from the further consideration of the subject. The Postage Reduction Bill was taken up, and two or three amendments voted on, but no substantial progress was made.

The HOUSE talked about Steamships and Mails, and indicated a disposition to extend the Steamship Mail System; but little was effected, however.

FIFTH-DAY, Feb. 20.

In the SENATE, numerous petitions on the standing subjects were presented. Mr. Cooper also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Pennsylvania in favor of Steamers from Norfolk to Antwerp, and from San Francisco to Shanghai, China. The Postage Reduction Bill was then talked about considerably, and the Franking Privilege upheld by 34 to 13.

The HOUSE talked a while about Steamships, and then took up the Appropriation Bills, passing the West Point, the Revolutionary Pension, the Naval Pension, and the Indian Service Bills—four bills, appropriating $8,000,000, at a single sitting.

SIXTH-DAY, Feb. 21.

In the SENATE, a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in reference to Mr. Ewing's Indian Annuity Decisions, while Secretary of the Interior, induced a spicy debate, in which Messrs. Ewing, Turney, and Douglas took part. The President sent in a lengthy reply to the resolution calling for information in regard to the rescue of the alledged slave in Boston. The remainder of the session was spent in talking about the Boston affair.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Giddings asked leave, which was not granted, to introduce a resolution that the President be requested to inform this House, if consistent with the public interest, whether a subject of the British Crown, and also a member of the British Parliament, has been recently insulted in Springfield, Mass., and his personal liberty endangered, by citizens of that State, in violation of our treaty stipulations with the British Government. Mr. Johnson of Tennessee offered a joint resolution, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, providing for an amendment of the Constitution of the United States, in substance, to elect the President directly by the people; Senators by the people of the respective States; and the terms of the U. S. Judiciary to be limited. Several private bills were passed, the Bill for the support of the Post Office Department was discussed, and the House adjourned.

SABBATH-DAY, Feb. 22.

The SENATE spent a good deal of time to no purpose in talking about the President's Message in relation to the Boston affair. Next the Indian Appropriation and Navy Pension bills were appropriatly referred, together with several private bills. The bills appropriating moneys for the payment of revolutionary pensions, and for the support of the West Point Military Academy, were reported and passed. The debate on the Special Message was then resumed, and Messrs. Downs, Hale, Clemens, Borland, Turney, Chase, Dodge, Douglass, and Cass, spoke upon the question whether the Fugitive Slave Law had been and could be generally executed. The subject was postponed to Second-day, and the Senate adjourned.

In the HOUSE, the bill making appropriation for the Post Office Department was passed. The Fortification Bill was then taken up, and several speeches were made for and against the whole system of fortifications after which the bill was laid on the table.

California News.

California news to Jan. 15, two weeks later, has come to hand since last. The following summary embraces all important items.

The Legislature assembled on the 6th of December, and a quorum being present, immediately organized, and appointed its officers. The message of Gov. Burnett was transmitted the succeeding day. A few days subsequent to the meeting of the Legislature, Governor Burnett tendered to that body his resignation, and Lieut. Governor McDougal was inaugurated as Governor the subsequent day. On an election for President of the Senate, in place of the Lieut. Governor, Hon. D. C. Broderick, of San Francisco, was chosen.

Hon. T. Butler King, the new collector of the Port, has arrived and entered upon the duties of his office. The Assessors for the city and county have just completed their labors and made their returns. They put down the value of real estate in San Francisco at $16,950,915, and in the county, outside of the city, at a little less than half a million dollars. The aggregate of tax in the city and county, $224,388 41.

The Indian difficulties and depredations, which have been perpetrated in the upper counties of the State, have subsided, and the tribes generally seem now to be quiet.

Business throughout the cities of California, is extremely dull. Goods have been sold at uncommonly low rates, in some instances lower than the first cost in New York.

The want of rain in the mountains has been a serious drawback upon the labors of the miners. Still, considerable amounts of dust are daily purchased by the bankers, though not so much as would have been thrown into market but for the dryness of the season.

There was great excitement on account of new discoveries of gold in the beach sands on the coast, of wonderful richness. Other rich discoveries have also recently been made.

The amount of gold dust cleared at San Francisco, from January 1 to 15, was $2,295,000. The number of vessels arrived 106, with 474 passengers; do. cleared 62, with 1,058 passengers. Tonnage entered, 28,611; cleared, 18,895.

Extremely rich diggings have been discovered in the main street of Placerville, and nearly the whole street has been staked off and dug up. One claim yielded $222 in one day, and not less than $48 per day since digging commenced.

The entire levee around Sacramento City, extending nine miles, has been completed. The cost, including its erection, engineering, committees, &c., will range from $160,000 to $170,000.

European News.

On Fifth-day last the U. S. Mail steamship Baltic, Capt. Comstock, which sailed from Liverpool on the 8th inst., reached this port, making the passage in a little less than twelve days, which beats the late voyage of the crack steamer Africa by nearly two days and a half.

The English news centers in the opening of Parliament, which took place on the 4th inst. Her Majesty opened the session in person. The speech to Parliament announces the settlement of the Danish question; the maintenance of general peace; that the Brazils are about to adopt more vigorous measures for the extirpation of the slave trade; and the satisfactory state of the revenue after the reduction effected in taxation during the last session. In regard to the Papal Aggressions, the speech says:—

"The recent assumption of certain ecclesiastical titles conferred by a foreign power has excited strong feelings in this country, and large bodies of my subjects have presented addresses to me, expressing attachment to the throne, and praying that such assumptions should be resisted. I have assured them of my resolution to maintain the rights of my crown, and the independence of the nation, against all encroachment, from whatever quarter it may proceed. I have at the same time expressed my earnest desire, and firm determination, under God's blessing, to maintain, unimpaired, the religious liberty which is so justly prized by the people of this country. It will be for you to consider the measure which will be laid before you on this subject."

In the House of Commons, on the 7th inst., Lord John Russell developed his proposed measure in relation to Papal Aggressions. The substance of it was, that the Government had determined not to appeal to the law, but to the Legislature. After much deliberate consideration, they had decided neither to attack the law as it stood, nor to introduce new measures, the effect of which might be dubious. He saw but little difference between the assumption by a Catholic prelate of the title of Archbishop of Canterbury, and that of Archbishop of Westminster. The change from vicars apostolic to bishops gave the prelate in question certain rights over properties bequeathed for religious purposes. He proposed, then, that all such gifts and bequests made to Catholic prelates should be null and void—that any act done by them in their official capacities should be null and void—that property so bequeathed should at once pass to the Crown—and that all Catholic functionaries should be prohibited from assuming titles derived, not only from Anglican dioceses, but from any district or place in the United Kingdom.

In the House of Commons, on Thursday, Mr. Fagan, of Cork, presented a petition from inhabitants of St. Johns, Newfoundland, who suffered from the fire of 1846, complaining that of the sum of £60,000 collected for their relief, £50,000 was withheld from them, and praying for an investigation into their circumstances.

A dreadful steamboat explosion occurred at Glasgow on Wednesday, Feb. 5, by which six men lost their lives. On the same night, and in the same river, (or near its entrance,) the Thistle steamer ran down the brig Laurel, from Demarara, in which fourteen men perished; and on the same night, and near the same place, the steamer Vanguard ran down a schooner, in which four men were drowned.

The steamship Pacific, Capt. Nye, arrived at Liverpool Feb. 3, after one of the severest passages which the Captain has ever encountered. He was thirty hours locked up in floating ice, which tore away portions of his paddle floats, and subsequently he encountered very severe weather.

The steamer Atlantic will be brought round to Liverpool, as soon as the weather permits.

The use of flax cotton in the manufacture of both woollen and cotton goods is attracting a great deal of attention in England at present.

From France, the only fact of importance is, that the long talked of Dotation Bill was presented to the National Assembly by M. Germiny, Minister of Finance. It asks for an extraordinary credit, on the budget of 1851, of 1,800,000 francs, to enable the President to meet the incidental expenses of his high office. The supplementary grant last year was 2,160,000 francs. The Legitimatist and Republican parties both threaten to oppose the bill. The Committee appointed to consider the bill have reported against it by a very large marjority.

From Germany, we learn that the Austrians have occupied the free city of Hamburg, and that these unwelcome guests are preparing to occupy Lubeck with a detachment of 1,800 troops. The new Government for Holstein has published a proclamation to the inhabitants of the Duchy. The fundamental laws of the 15th September, 1848, are abolished, and the Diet dissolved.

The Austrians are re-inforcing their armies in Lombardy, evidently with a view to suppress any attempt which may be made to revolutionize those provinces in the ensuing spring. It is stated on authority that several conspiracies have been discovered in Vienna, and that political discontent is extremely rife in that city.

A SAD CASE.—The community of Quincy and Braintree, Mass. was recently excited by the discovery of two dead bodies in a wood, frozen stiff. Both were dressed in men's clothing, but one proved to be the body of a female. Subsequent investigations identified them as the bodies of two persons passing by the names of John Green and George Sands, who came into the region the first of November last, and after working at boot-making a short time, suddenly disappeared. During their brief stay they were full of talk about "the spiritual knockings;" and their stock of literature consisted of the "Spirit Messenger," the "Univercœlum," the "Great Harmonia," and "Indiana." They consulted Mr. LeRoy Sunderland several times during their stay upon the system of communication with the spirit world. On bits of paper among their effects were found these scraps of this newly luminous philosophy: "Death is only an event: only a circumstance in the eternal life, and the experience of the human soul." "Death is simply a birth into a new and more perfect state of existence." "Never be depressed, but be cheerful, be joyous, be exceedingly glad ever, though death be knocking at your door." The Coroner's jury returned as their verdict, that the woman was shot with the pistol by the man, who afterwards destroyed himself with the same weapon.

It now appears, from western papers, that they were John Grieve and his wife Hannah, of Zanesville, Ohio—noted for their romantic freaks—who disappeared from that place in October last, and were supposed to be drowned. [Independent.

HORRIBLE AFFAIR.—A gentleman recently from Holmes Co., Miss., has detailed to us the particulars of a dreadful scene which occurred a few days since near Lexington, in that county. An engagement had existed for some time between a Mr. Tate and Miss Sheppard, in the Harlem Creek District, in that county, to which, however, the father of the young lady refused his consent. The young couple had agreed to run away for the purpose of getting married, and for that purpose were to start from a wedding party in the neighborhood. He met the young lady as arranged, at the party, and asked her publicly whether she was ready to fulfill her promise and go with him; and on her declining, he drew a pistol, shot her dead in the room, and attempted to destroy himself, but in this was frustrated, and is now in Lexington jail on the charge of murder. [N. O. Picayune.

PRO-SLAVERY RIOT.—A correspondent of the Philadelphia Sun gives an account of a disgraceful proceeding at Columbia, Pa., the 8th inst., by which a few ruffians prevented Cyrus M. Burleigh from lecturing on the Fugitive Slave Law—they having locked out the lecturer and his audience. Finding how things were, Mr. Burleigh retired, and a search was made after him by the mobites, who threatened to "ride him on a rail," "tar and feather him," &c.; but, not finding him, they went to the house of a respectable colored man, William Whipper, which they stoned, without doing much injury. Three of the mobites were caught in their beds by the constable on Thursday—seven in all being arrested, three of whom were discharged on Friday, and Hogentogler, Wilson, Yeanish, and Brown, were held, in the sum of $300 each, for their appearance at the next Court. [Tribune.

THE RICHEST CASE YET.—'The Anthropologist' has just been started at Milwaukee, Wis., to expound and diffuse the new revelations from 'kingdom come' now being made by means of clairvoyance, 'rappings,' etc. The first number gives an account of an interview by 'rappings' with the spirit of Capt. West of the steamship Atlantic, who informed his interrogator, that the Atlantic struck an iceberg on her eighth day from Liverpool, while battling with a furious, protracted storm, and was utterly lost, with all on board!

DANGEROUS EXPERIMENT.—We learn from the Boston Journal that a young lady in Chelsea, a subject of Mr. Cutter, was thrown into a trance by an amatuer professor of the "science" of Mesmerism, on Sunday last, and became uncontrollable. She rushed out of the house in a delirious state, ran down upon a wharf, and had it not been for the timely interference of two young men, would probably have thrown herself overboard. She was taken back to the house, and a physician sent for, whose daily attendance has since been necessary.

SUMMARY.

The citizens of Muscatine, Iowa, have formed a regular Society for the purpose of giving reliable information to such persons as think of migrating from Europe or from the old States to the Great Western Valley. The prices of lands, wild or improved, the wages of labor, inducements for mechanics, artisans, manufacturers, &c., will be promptly and gladly communicated. All who think of going West will please write postpaid, (if in German) to L. Matzinger, or (if in English) to Henry O'Connor, Muscatine, Iowa.

The Falls of Niagara have again receded, through another break-down of the ledge of rock over which the stream runs. This is the second tumble down of rocks there this winter; and if it is considerable in extent, and shall be followed by a few more such launches, people now alive may see these celebrated Falls converted into a rapid, or a succession of rapids, and Lake Erie lowered thereby several feet.

Mr. L. L. Burdick, of Utica, has succeeded in inventing a new cylinder printing press, which is certainly far ahead of any thing now in use. This press prints both sides of the paper by one revolution; will print twice as fast as Hoe's press, and do its work as well or better than the Adams press, and it requires but half the labor, in feeding it, while the cost of the machine, it is believed, will be less than that of any power press. There is one of these presses now at work in Utica.

Great efforts are being made at Washington just now to bring forward the project for a line of steamers from California to China, in connection with which is a proposition to connect another line with these from Norfolk and Philadelphia to Antwerp, thus making America the center of the commercial intercourse between the European and Asiatic world.

Two ladies of Southampton will exhibit a gigantic piece of Berlin embroidery at the World's Fair. It has cost them ten months' labor, covers three thousand square inches, and represents Abraham, the father of all nations, offering up his son Isaac upon the altar, with an angel appearing in the clouds, with distant landscape and scenery. On the top, looking through the foliage, is a symbolical representation of the Almighty figuratively uttering the sublime expression in holy writ, "Lay not thine hand upon the lad."

A dispatch from Utica, N. Y., dated Feb. 20, says that they have had a great flood in that region. The damage to the West Canada Creek Railroad Company is $5,000. The Plank Road Company, $1,000. Hydraulic Company, $500. The dam and bridge at Newport, $2,000; and fences and lumber, $5,000. Black River had risen to a great height, doing much damage; the particulars not yet fully known.

There are now on the stocks at Essex, Ct., no less than seventeen fishing vessels, of from sixty to eighty tons burden, and of very beautiful models. Fourteen of them are for Gloucester, and their average value will exceed $3,000 each. Several of them are nearly finished, and the keel of not one was laid until after the first of November last. About as many more are cont[illegible] for, and will be finished the coming Spring.

Officer A. M. C. Smith recently arrested in New York a man named Jas. B. Somers, alias G. H. Carter, charged with being a fugitive from Chittenango, N. Y., where he is wanted to answer an indictment for forging notes of hand in the name of Dr. S. P. Townsend and others; also to answer a charge of obtaining goods by false pretences. He was sent back in the custody of Deputy Sheriff Frederick of Onondaga County, who came on to procure his arrest.

An Edict has been issued by the Cuban authorities, citing Don Francisco Castro and Don Lucas Castro, two wealthy citizens of Trinidad, who have gone to the United States for the purpose of coöperating with conspirators who are forming plans to revolutionize Cuba, to deliver themselves up to the Commission Militaire for trial; otherwise to be declared rebels, and their property confiscated.

An important event in the history of the present Legislature of Illinois is the passage of the Central Railroad bill, a measure by which she will be enabled to reap the advantage of the magnificent donation of land made at the last session of Congress. This road will run from Cairo, at the Southern extremity of the State, through the center of the State Northerly, with branches to Galena and Chicago.

The European mails brought by the steamship Africa were received by the New York Post-Office at 12 o'clock on Saturday night. They contained 102,095 letters, which were assorted and ready for delivery in eight working hours after they were in hand. At the same time, the regular business of the Post-Office was progressing as usual.

A public meeting was recently held at St. Paul, Minnesota, at which "Hole-in-the-Day," the young Chief of the Chippewas, made a speech, in which he complained of the imperfect fulfillment of the treaties with them by the United States, and gave a most distressing description of the suffering and starving condition of his tribe.

We learn, says the New Bedford Standard, that a short time since, two young ladies, formerly subjects of Great Britain, were admitted to become citizens of the United States, on petition to the Judge of our Police Court. This is probably the first instance of a woman being naturalized in this county, if not in the State.

Hon. Horace Mann, in a letter addressed to a State Convention held in Winthrop, Maine, "to oppose the Fugitive Slave Law," says: "The law to which you refer is such a condensation of various iniquities, that it is impossible, within the brief compass of a letter suitable to such an occasion, to analyze it and lay open its manifold wickedness."

Chancellor Walworth has reported to the Supreme Court that the Wheeling Bridge is an impediment to the present and future Navigation of the Ohio River, and that it ought to come down or be raised 60 feet on the Ohio side and 23 feet at the Virginia abutment; the cost of which he estimates at $208,000.

Commodore Richard F. Stockton was on Friday last elected to the United States Senate from New-Jersey for six years from the 4th of March next.

Commodore Jones, whose trial by Court Martial has been going on at Washington for some time past, has been found guilty of speculating in gold dust with the public funds, and is suspended from his command for five years, half of the time without pay. The President has approved the sentence.

The (Allegany County) Republican Era states, that Corrigan, the man who shot David Romer, on the 5th instant, while the latter was on his way to the mill, has been indicted for murder by the Grand Jury of Allegany Co. The Era says, the murder caused the most intense excitement at Belfast.

Mungwudans, a chief of the Chippewa or Ojibwa tribe of American Indians, was in Rochester the other day, dressed in all the ornate finery of his native costume, with a Corinthian capital of eagle's feathers for a head dress. He is a powerful, majestic and handsome specimen of the Native Americans.

The frigate St. Lawrence sailed last week, with the articles for the World's Fair. After discharging her freight at Portsmouth, she will proceed to France, for the purpose of bringing to this country the remains of Capt. Paul Jones.

The Detroit (Mich.) Free Press, of Feb. 10, says that Rev. Mr. Neil, lately from Philadelphia, and now settled at Franklin, in Oakland County, was recently bitten by a rabid dog, and his physicians entertain no hopes of his recovery.

The Delaware Legislature has passed the "Bed Bill," and it is now a law. It exempts $100 from execution or distress for rent, and goes into operation on the 4th of July next, but does not affect any existing contracts.

The brig Eureka, for Chagres, reported by the Buffalo papers to be lost, with nearly two hundred souls on board, is said to have put into a South American port, with her passengers in a state of starvation.

The value annually of the trade in iron and lumber which the region watered by the Allegany river sends to Pittsburg is estimated to exceed four millions of dollars.

Nineteen hundred and twelve ships arrived during the past year at the port of New York, bringing 232,778 passengers, of whom 19,972 were American citizens, 117,038 only were Irish emigrants!

The steamer Bride, Captain Amsden, from New Orleans, exploded her boilers, on Red River Feb. 17, killed two persons and wounding five others.

The packet ship Devonshire, on her last voyage from New-York to Portsmouth, made the run in fourteen days and six hours. This is almost equal to the voyages made by the steamers.

The store of J. McGrew, Cincinnati, was robbed of 35 gold watches, (valued at over $3,000) on the 13th inst.

A bill has passed the Legislature of Illinois exempting a Homestead, to the value of $1,000, from execution.

Jesse Hutchinson, the father of the Hutchinson family, died on Sunday, at his residence, near Milford, N. H.

The present winter, in all parts of France, has been, so far, of an extraordinary and almost unprecedented mildness.

A magnificent gold watch has been sent as a present, by young men in California, to Senator Douglass.

The wire suspension bridge over the Niagara river, was finally opened on the 5th inst.

The price of tickets to Jenny Lind's Concerts at New-Orleans has been reduced to one and two dollars.

The painter Nicola Ranieri died in the Abruzzi in December, aged 101. He never drank wine nor any other spirituous beverage and kept his memory and a cheerful spirit to the last.

In the McDonough will case the Judge has given his decision in favor of the cities of Baltimore and New-Orleans, and against the States of Louisiana and Maryland.

Letters from Cayene to January 8th, state that the yellow fever was raging terribly there. The Governor and many of the principal citizens had died.

An Italian picture dealer in London lately bought an old picture for a song. It proves to be a portrait of the Princess Colonna by Micheal Angelo and is valued at $30,000.

The press on which Benjamin Franklin worked when he was learning the printer's trade, is for sale at the office of the Newport (R.I.) News.

Agents Wanted,

FOR THE "BEST JUVENILE MAGAZINE IN AMERICA."

WOODWORTH'S YOUTH'S CABINET, elegantly illustrated, and filled with the choicest gems for the young, has recently entered upon a new volume. It is more attractive and popular than ever. "It is a little world within itself," to use the langunge of a metropolitan newspaper; and the price is only $1 a year.

Now is the time for Agents. The publisher wishes to employ fifty or more gentlemen, in different parts of the Union—North, South, East, and West—to act as Agents for the work. Their business will be to travel and to obtain subscribers. There is no periodical, of whatever character, which commands so ready and so general favor as Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet. It is a universal favorite. Those who devote their time wholly or mainly to the interests of this publication, will receive a compensation which cannot fail to be satisfactory.

Persons desiring an agency will please address the publisher (post-paid) with responsible testimonials as to character and ability. No time should be lost, as now is the best time to subscribe. Every particular respecting the agency will be immediately forwarded on application. Specimens of the work sent gratis.

D. A. WOODWORTH, 118 Nassau-st., N. Y.

In Preparation—Valuable New Works.

NATIONAL SERIES OF AMERICAN HISTORIES.—GOULD & LINCOLN have in course of preparation a series of Histories of the most interesting and important events which have occurred in the United States since the first settlement of the country. They will embrace the trials and adventures of the early colonists, both at the North and the South, their peculiarities of character and manners, their intercourse and conflicts with the natives, the gradual development of their institutions, sketches of their prominent men in both the Church and the State, incidents in the Revolution, with various other subjects of interest of more recent date. It is intended to be a NATIONAL SERIES OF AMERICAN HISTORY, adapted to the popular mind, and especially to the youth of our country, illustrated with numerous fine engravings; each volume to be complete in itself; yet, when all are published, to form a regular consecutive series, consisting of twelve or more volumes, 13mo, of about 300 pages each.

Cyclopedia of Anecdotes of Literature and the Fine Arts.
ALSO,
CYCLOPEDIA OF SCIENTIFIC ANECDOTES.

The First, containing a copious and choice selection of Anecdotes on the various forms of Literature, of the Arts, of Architecture, Engravings, Music, Poetry, Painting, and Sculpture, and of the most celebrated Literary Characters and Artists of different countries and ages.

The Second, containing a similar selection respecting the various Sciences and Mechanical Arts, of their most distinguished votaries. The two together, embracing the larger portion of the best Anecdotes in Ancient and Modern collections, as well as in various Histories, Biographies, and Files of Periodical Literature.

The whole classified under appropriate subjects, alphabetically arranged, and each supplied with a very full and particular index of topics and names, by author of "Cyclopedia of Moral and Religious Anecdotes;" the whole to be comprised in Sixteen Numbers, at 25 cents per Number, making two large 8vo volumes of about 700 pages each, illustrated with numerous fine engravings. The first number will be issued about the first of April, to be continued semi-monthly until completed.

Daguerrean Gallery.

GURNEY'S Daguerrean Gallery, No. 189 Broadway, has been known for years as one of the first establishments of the kind in the United States, and the oldest in the city of New York. He has recently greatly enlarged his Gallery by the addition of more rooms and large skylights, and other improvements, rendering it one of the most extensive establishments in this country. Mr. G. attends personally to his sitters, and from his great experience in the art he is enabled, at all times, to give perfect satisfaction. The large-sized pictures recently taken by his new process are universally acknowledged superior to any heretofore taken in this country. A large collection can be seen at all hours of the day. Ladies and gentlemen are respectfully invited to examine them.

New York and Boston Steamboats.

REGULAR MAIL LINE BETWEEN NEW YORK AND BOSTON, via Stonington and Providence. Inland route, without ferry, change of cars or baggage! The steamers C. VANDERBILT, Capt. Joel Stone, and COMMODORE, Capt. William H. Frazee, in connection with the Stonington and Providence, and Boston and Providence Railroads, leaving New York daily, (Sundays excepted,) from pier 2 North River, first wharf above Battery Place, at 5 o'clock P. M., and Stonington at 8 o'clock P. M., or upon the arrival of the mail train from Boston. The C. Vanderbilt will leave New York Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday. Leave Stonington Monday, Wednesday, and Friday. The Commodore will leave New York Monday, Wednesday, and Friday. Leave Stonington Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday.

Christian Psalmody—Pocket Edition.

IN compliance with requests from various quarters, the publisher of the New Hymn Book—Christian Psalmody—has issued a second edition, on lighter paper and with smaller margins, by which the bulk and weight of the books are reduced about one-third, rendering them much more convenient for carrying in the pocket. The price is also reduced 12½ cents per copy. Those wishing books, of either edition, can now be supplied. Price of the larger edition from 75 cents to $1 50, according to the style of binding. Price of the smaller edition from 62½ cents to $1 00. Orders should be addressed to Geo. B. Utter, No. 9 Spruce-st., New York.

Methodist Quarterly Review.

THIS Review contains 160 pages Octavo, printed on fine paper. At the subscription price of TWO DOLLARS a year, in advance, it is the cheapest Quarterly Journal now issued. The publishers issue it at this low price, in expectation of greatly enlarging its list of subscribers, which, though by no means what it ought to be, is yet, as it is believed, twice as large as that of any similar Journal.

While the theology of the Methodist Episcopal Church is the standard for the Review, its tone is large and liberal, and its range of topics, not only in Biblical but General Literature, is extensive, as its Table of Contents will show. Its contributors are among the ablest writers in this country, of various religious denominations.

In the Department of Literary Intelligence, this Journal is so unusually full and rich as to be almost indispensable to every theologian and literary man.

From its wide circulation, the Quarterly affords a most desirable medium of Literary Advertising. All advertisements, and books for notice, should be sent to the Editor, Rev. J. M'Clintock, D. D., 200 Mulberry-st.

Miscellaneous.

The Poor Man to his Son.

BY ELIZA COOK.

Work, work, my boy, be not afraid,
 Look labor in the face,
Take up the hammer or the spade,
 And blush not for your humble place.

Hold up your brow in honest pride,
 Though rough and swarth your hands may be,
Such hands are sap-veins that provide
 The life-blood of the nation's tree.

There's honor in the toiling part,
 That finds us in the furrowed fields;
It stamps a crest upon the heart
 Worth more than all your quartered shields.

Work, work, my boy, and murmur not,
 The fustian garb betrays no shame;
The crime of forge-soot leaves no blot,
 And labor gilds the meanest name.

And man is never half so blest
 As when the day is busy spent,
So as to make his evening rest
 A holiday of glad content.

God grant thee but a due reward,
 A guerdon portion fair and just,
And then ne'er think thy station hard,
 But work, my boy, work, hope, and trust!

From the Liberia Advocate.

Exploration of the Interior of Africa.

One of the missionaries to Liberia lately made an exploring tour of 253 miles on foot into the interior. He passed through thirty villages of the Goulas, Deys, Queaks, and Condoes. In his report he says:—

"Such a country as we passed through in that missionary tour, I have not seen surpassed in either of the fifteen West India Islands which I have visited, from Trinidad to Tortola and the Virgin Island. It is an elevated, mountainous country. Ranges of mountains, running most generally parallel with the line of coast—from Northwest to Southeast—rise up before the delighted eye of the traveler, convincing him that he is no longer in the land of burning sands and deleterious swamps, such as are encountered in proximity with the shores, but in quite another region. And such are the gradual undulations of its surface as would greatly facilitate the objects of agriculture. There are few, if any, very steep acclivities—nothing like the bold, precipitous mountains of our Eastern States. Beautiful and extensive vallies lie at the base of these mountains, which gently slope down to the level country lying between them.

"It is a well watered country. During the eight hours' travel which we were frequently obliged to perform in a day, we never walked more than two hours or two and a half at one time, without coming to some beautiful stream of cool and very pure water, either a tributary of the St. Paul's or some other of the many smaller rivers which intersect that African Canaan. And here it may be proper to add, that my attention was directed to an examination of the adaptation of these streams to the purpose of machinery, sites for mills, &c., and hesitate not to affirm, that within the Gaulah country especially, any number of the most eligible situations may be found, where, at any time during the year, good water power may be obtained, for any of the purposes which an enterprising community, agriculturists and mechanics, may require. My journey was performed in the very middle of the dry season, and yet we found plenty of water in the different streams.

"It is a well timbered land. Through an extensive forest of acres, of miles, which lay in our return route, I was so struck with the gigantic trees of immense hight, which reared their towering heads and united their luxuriant foliage in forming above us one dense and rich canopy, that I called the attention of the colored ministers of the Liberia Annual Methodist Conference, who accompanied me, to this evidence of the richness of the country which God had given to the Africans, and to which their exiled brethren were invited by so many powerful considerations. I measured several trees, and my journal, kept at the time with scrupulous exactness, records 23, 24, 25 feet as the circumference of many of them within six feet of the ground. Let me remark, that the variety and superior quality of the wood found in these forests, and indeed all along the borders and around the settlement of Liberia, from Grand Cape Mount to Cape Palmas, or Maryland, cannot be excelled any where within the torrid zone. From a species of poplar, soft and adapted to all the purposes for which the white pine is used in America, up to the teak, a variety of mahogany, a beautiful species of hickory very abundant at Cape Palmas, the iron wood, the brimstone, susceptible of a polish for furniture of surpassing beauty, and many others, an almost endless supply may be found.

"It is an exceedingly fertile soil. The immense undergrowth of shrub and vine interwoven around the giants of the forest, so thick, so impenetrable, without much effort, and through which a root path only conducts the traveler, is the best proof of this. But the grains, roots, fruits, and vines of the tropics, all concentrate here, and may be raised with a degree of comparative ease, a rapidity of growth and an abundance almost incredible. I have stood erect under the branches of a cotton tree in a Goulah village, as they spread forth from the main trunk, laden with bolls, and supported by forked sticks to prevent their being broken down by their own weight, and found, on measuring, that the tree covered a space of ten feet in diameter. On examining the staple, as the ripened bolls burst into maturity, it was found as good and equal in the fineness of its fibre to the cotton of any country. As to coffee, I will only borrow the words of the report as a comment on themselves: 'Coffee of a quality superior to the best Java Mocha is raised in Liberia, and can be cultivated with great ease to any extent.' It is a country where tobacco, that great article of commerce, may be cultivated in any quantity with great success.

"But the region in the vicinity of Liberia is one of great mineral wealth. This remains for science to fully develop, but we may confidently arrive at this conclusion from what has been discovered. Of the gold coast your Committee say right, when they assert that 'England has received altogether $200,000,000 of gold from Africa. Liberia is adjacent to the gold coast.' But I would speak of what is better than gold—iron. And such is the purity of the iron ore obtained by the natives of Africa, immediately in the vicinity of Liberia, which they describe as being abundant, that they have no furnaces; they need none. All their rude agricultural and warlike instruments are made by them of ore so pure that when heated it becomes at once sufficiently malleable to admit of being wrought into any shape or form. They make knives, bill-hooks, war cutlasses, spears, axes, hoes, &c., out of this ore, without the process of smelting."

The Mormon Country.

A correspondent of the Rockfork (Ill.) Forum writes from Salt Lake City in these terms, touching the country, its products, and prosperity:—

"I must say a word about wheat. For wheat this climate is everything that I had ever heard or dreamed of. From one bushel sowing, they have raised as high as 169 bushels; it was sowed in drills, and covered four acres. Fifty bushels here is about a fair yield to the acre. You need not think there is any gammon about this; the wheat tells larger stories for itself than the inhabitants. I never saw the like in any country. It is like Egypt in the seven plentiful years—the land yields by handfuls. Corn does not do well, it being too frosty; peas, beets, carrots, onions, and vegetables generally, do well. I have seen a great many melon vines, but think they will not accomplish much without something to shelter them from the cool night air.

I am writing at a table in the city, and the great valley lays out like a level plain before me, from 20 to 40 miles wide, and extending something like two hundred miles from terminus to terminus, and thousands upon thousands of cattle feeding upon the rich bottom lands belonging to the city. Every city lot here contains 1 1-2 acres, and each man that moves here may pay $1 50 for recording the same, and then go and build a home for his family, with nothing more to pay save his tithe money, which is one-tenth of his earnings. This goes into the treasury for church purposes, as well as for public works. The improvement made here in the three years the Mormons have been here is astonishing. The houses are built of unburnt brick, called "doubies," and are comfortable and genteel dwellings. They have fine flouring mills and saw mills now in operation, and others going up. Their lumber is chiefly sawed out of the fir tree, and is not so good as pine, although it answers very well as a substitute.

Coal has been found in great abundance in the Valley, and I am informed that they are now making a railroad on which to transport the same to the city. Stone coal is now $1 per bushel in the city, and charred coal 50 cents. Salt is obtained out of the Lake in its native state, and when ground is far superior to any salt which you receive from the East. It is possible that you, in the Mississippi Valley, may yet be supplied with the article of salt from this Lake. I am satisfied that for the next 20,000 years the Rocky Mountains will furnish the world with potash and salæratus. The Valley of the Platte and Sweetwater can do it without half trying.

A Fairy Spot.

Mrs. Farnham, the lady who projected the transportation of a bevy of young ladies from the Atlantic coast to the Pacific, has recently written a letter home of considerable interest. Though a private letter, it has found its way into the Post Office, and become public property. She is located, it seems, on a fine rancho, 70 miles south of San Francisco, on the north side of Monterey Bay. The region she represents as a perfect fairy land. She thus describes it:—

"It is very heavily timbered, and beautifully watered with clear living streams running through valleys of the most fertile soil, on which delicious vegetables grow ten months of the year. The region is specially famed for potatoes, which become almost a fruit here. The farm I live on is charmingly situated, about a mile from the old Mission, and two from the beach, on which a tremendous surf breaks and thunders day and night. From my house, 'La Libertad,' I look over the coast table and range of mountains, the hills of Monterey, and the bay, and a near landscape exquisitely diversified by plain and wood, hill and valley, and almost every shade that herbage and foliage, in a country without frost, can show. The rainy season is about a month old, and the earth as green as it is at home in June. Another month will pile it with clover, and less than another, varigate it with an inconceivable variety of the most exquisite flowers. This is the land of flowers as well as gold. Our prairies are quite insignificant in their floral shows compared to it. The country and climate are faultless—except in the lack of showers through the dry months. Nearly everything one can desire may be grown upon one's own farm."

A Monster of the Deep.

In some parts of the ocean there are enormous sea animals, called Sepia, which are a kind of polypi. They have very long legs, and are said sometimes to seize upon the coral divers along the cost of Italy. Mr. Beale tells the following adventure with a creature of this sort:—

While upon the Boein Islands, searching for shells on the rocks, which had just been left by the receding tide, I was much astonished at seeing at my feet a most extraordinary looking animal, crawling towards the retreating surf. I had never seen one like it before. It was creeping on its eight legs, which, from their soft and flexible nature, bent considerably under the weight of its body, so that it was lifted by the efforts of its tentacula only a small distance from the rocks.

It appeared much alarmed on seeing me, and made every effort to escape, while I was not much in the humor to endeavor to capture so ugly a customer, whose appearance excited a feeling of disgust, not unmixed with fear. I however endeavored to prevent its escape, by pressing on one of its legs with my foot; but although I used considerable force for that purpose, its strength was so great that it several times quickly liberated its member, in spite of all the efforts I could employ in this way, on wet, slippery rocks. I now laid hold of one of the tentacles with my hand, and held it firmly, so that the limb appeared as if it would be torn asunder by our united strength. I gave it a powerful jerk, wishing to disengage it from the rocks to which it clung so forcibly by its suckers, which it effectually resisted; but the moment after, the apparently enraged animal lifted its head, with its large eyes projecting from the middle of its body, and letting go its hold of the rocks, suddenly sprang upon my arm, which I had previously bared to my shoulder for the purpose of thrusting it into holes in the rocks to discover shells, and clung, with its suckers, with great power, endeavoring to get its beak, which I could now see, between the roots of his arms, in a position to bite.

A sensation of horror pervaded my whole frame when I found this monstrous animal, for it was about four feet long, fixed so firmly to my arm. Its cold slimy grasp was extremely sickening, and I immediately called aloud to the captain, who was also searching for shells at some distance, to come and release me from my disgusting assailant. He quickly arrived, and taking me down to the boat, during which time I was employed in keeping the beak away from my hand, quickly released me by destroying my tormentor with the boat knife, when I disengaged it by portions at a time. This animal was that species of Sepia which is called by whalers "rock squid." Thus are these remarkable creatures, from the different adaptation of their tentacles and slight modifications of their bodies, capable of sailing, flying, swimming, and creeping on the shore, while their senses, if we may judge from the elaborate mechanism of their organs, must possess corresponding acuteness and perfection.

Science versus Sentiment.

At the trial of the Abbe Gothland and Madame Dusablon for poisoning the housekeeper of the former, which took place the first week in December, 1850, at the assizes of La Charente, in France, a professional argument occurred between M. Leseur, the celebrated chemist, and another medical witness, whether the poison had been administered in successive doses or otherwise; and during the discussion, an allusion was made to a former victim, named Soufflard, by Dr. Gigon, the antagonist of Leseur, who advanced some erroneous statement with regard to the results of the post mortem examination, which was immediately refuted by Leseur, who, in his scientific enthusiasm, exclaimed vehemently, "I ought to be able to decide the question, for I myself cooked him from head to foot!"

This melancholy facetiousness recalls irresistibly to memory an anecdote of Gall, the phrenologist, who was one day lecturing upon the organ of Tune. "Gentlemen," said the veteran professor, exhibiting at the same time a superbly-formed skull, "here is the head of my excellent friend Colonel Hartmann, one of the finest musicians in the Austrian empire."

"Give us its history!—give us its history!" cried a score of his listeners.

"It is a very simple one," said the German, with a smile of grave self-gratulation; I lately received intelligence of the death of my excellent friend, which had just taken place at Vienna; and you may imagine my delight on learning that the musical development was most extraordinary. I hastened to possess myself of so valuable a testimony to the truth of the immortal science of phrenology—and here it is. Gentlemen, pass round the head of Colonel Hartmann!"

For Wine Drinkers.

The perfectly trustworthy correspondent of the London Morning Chronicle, now engaged in investigating the agricultural condition of France, gives the following information, which will prove interesting to all in general, and not a few in particular. We have ourselves witnessed precisely the same process in Italy:—

"Very venerable and decidedly picturesque as is the process of wine-treading, it is unquestionably rather a filthy one; and the spectacle of great brown horny feet, not a whit too clean, splashing and spralling in the bubbling juice, conveys at first a qualmy species of feeling, which, however, seems only to be entertained by those to whom the sight is new. I was everywhere assured, that all efforts had failed to construct a wine press capable of performing the work with the perfection of the human feet. No mechanical squeezing, I was informed, would so nicely express that peculiar proportion of the whole mixture of the grape which forms the highest flavored wine.

"The manner in which the fruit was tossed about was pointed out to me, and I was asked to observe that the grapes were, as it were, squeezed in every possible fashion, and from every possible side, worked and churned and mashed hither and thither by the ever-moving toes and muscles of the foot. As far as any impurity went, the argument was, that the fermentation flung as scum to the surface every atom of foreign matter held in suspension in the wine, and that the liquor ultimately obtained was as exquisitely pure as if human flesh had never touched it."

Education in Illinois.

The Biennial Report of the State Superintendent of Common Schools in Illinois gives the following results:—

The number of Common Schools in the 73 counties returned is 3,307. Estimating for the 26 counties not included in the above, the whole number of schools is set down at 4,410. In 66 counties there are 2,641 organized school districts, and the same number of school-houses. Of the latter, 1,508 only are represented as in good repair. 370 are log houses, 927 frame, 139 brick, and 37 stone.

In 69 counties, the number of children who attended school the last year, was 111,982. Estimating for the 30 counties from which reports on this subject were not made, the whole number is put down at 161,751, being over one third of the whole number under 21 years of age. There are 108 District Libraries in the counties from which reports have been made. There is a great want of good teachers in the schools of the State. The number of acres embraced in the sixteen sections granted to the State for school purposes, is 97,844,889. From the imperfect character of the returns of School Commissioners, it is impossible to ascertain what amount of these lands remains unsold. Hitherto there has been no attempt made to apply the College and University Fund, or the proceeds of the Seminary Lands, to the purposes for which they are specially designed. It is suggested that the time has probably arrived when some arrangement may be properly made to carry out the intention of Congress, and fulfill our own obligations, by devoting these funds to their legitimate objects.

The Old Stone Mill at Newport, R. I.—The Literary World adduces a fact which seems to shed decisive light on the long-vexed question as to the origin of the ancient stone edifice at Newport, which many have supposed to be a relic of the Northmen.

"In the will of Governer Benedict Arnold, which was executed in 1679, in speaking of his burial, he directs that his body should be buried in a certain plot of ground, 'on the line or path leading from my house to my stone-built wind-mill.' From this it follows that the structure was then a wind-mill belonging to the Governor, and was distinguished from surrounding wind-mills as being built of stone. No other one of stone now exists, or is known to have existed. The place of the Governor's sepulture is still known, and the present ruin is the wind-mill specified. It might be a question worth pursuing, to inquire whether in that part of England whence Gov. Arnold came, it was customary to build structures of that kind on arches. At any rate, such a mode may be easily accounted for in various ways, without the necessity of resorting to Scandinavian architecture."

Advantages of Large Wheels to Horse Carts.—The advantages of large wheels to horse carts are obvious, as they greatly increase the facility of draught, and tend to lessen the number accidents to which all two-wheeled carriages are liable, from the shaft horse falling down. By adopting large wheels and a bent axle, the cart becomes less liable to such accidents, as the centre of gravity, (the fore end of the cart body,) and the centre of suspension, (the axle,) are brought much nearer together, the former being placed nearly over the latter, at a small distance only from it. A horse falling with a loaded cart so constructed, will experience but little increase of weight upon him while down. The centre of gravity will be thrown forward but in a very trifling degree. In carts, &c., it will almost always happen that the centre of gravity will be above the point of suspension (the axle,) but in gigs, &c., the body may be placed below that point when the body will always maintain the erect (that is a horizontal) position, and should the horse fall down, will operate to lift him up again. A gig so constructed will be almost beyond the possibility of those serious and frequently fatal accidents which occur from the falling of horses.

Anecdote of Kosciusko.—The celebrated Polish General, Kosciusko, wished to send some bottles of good wine to a clergyman at Solothurn; and, as he hesitated to send them by his servant, lest he should smuggle a part, he gave the commission to a young man of the name of Zeltuer, and desired him to take the horse which he usually rode. Young Zelteur, on his return, said to Kosciusko that he would never ride his horse again, unless he gave his purse at the same time. Kosciusko asked what he meant? He replied, "As soon as a poor man on the road takes off his hat and asks for charity, the horse immediately stands still, and will not stir till something is given the petitioner; and, as I had no money about me, I was obliged to make a motion as if I was giving something in order to satisfy the horse." A higher eulogium could not be pronounced.

Pressure of the Atmosphere.—The pressure exerted by the atmosphere at the surface of the earth, is equal to 14.6 lbs. on every square inch, and that equally in all directions. The surface of a man of ordinary stature is about 2160 square inches: hence the atmospheric pressure which his body sustains amounts to the enormous sum of 31,336 lbs. This great pressure is not sensible, because it is balanced by the re-action of elastic fluids within our bodies; but if the equilibrium were suddenly to be destroyed, the consequences might be fatal. Thus, on the summit of a high mountain, where the pressure of the atmosphere is much diminished, a man feels great fatigue, breathing becomes difficult, the pulse beats faster, and frequently the blood has started from the eyes and ears, and other tender parts of the body.

A Mr. Lynton has lately made a communication to the Asiatic Society of London, descriptive of a mode of punishment peculiar to the criminal code of the Celestial Empire.

A Chinese merchant, named Hiamly accused and convicted of killing his wife, was sentenced to die by the total deprivation of sleep. The execution took place at Amoy, in the month of June last. The condemned was placed in prison under the surveilance of three guardians, who relieved each other every alternate hour, and who prevented him from taking any sleep, night or day. He lived thus for nineteen days, without having slept for a single minute. At the commencement of the eighth day, his sufferings were so cruel, that he begged, as a great favor, that they would kill him by strangulation. [N. Y. Sun.

A Fact for Farmers.—Dr. T. Baldwin has recently made public the result of several years' investigation and experiments upon manures, and various ways of fertilizing the soil. He states that the best and speediest way to fertilize any soil is to cover it over with straw, bushes, or any raw material, so as to completely shade it. The surface of the earth thus being made cool, dark, damp, and close, soon undergoes a chemical process like putrefaction, and becomes highly fertilzed. This plan of fertilizing, he says, may be applied with success to any soil whatever, no matter how poor, and the result will be astonishiug.

The Three Best Doctors.—A judical officer of some distinction, in the interior of the State, gives the following results of his experience with the three best doctors he could procure for his wife. She had been sick, he said, for two years, and was daily getting worse, though he had an allopathic physician to call daily; he then procured a homœopathic doctor, and for six months his wife improved perceptibly; but at the end of that time the doctor broke his leg, and could no longer continue his attendance, whereupon the lady speedily and entirely recovered.

The Population of California.—Some idea may be formed of the heterogeneous character of the population of San Francisco from the following figures, which the San Francisco Courier derives from the census agent:—

The census of San Francisco is not completed, but out of 9,425 persons enumerated, 5,956 were born in foreign countries, 795 in the State of New York; 615 in Massachusetts; 1,917 in other States; 109 (children) in California; 28 (children) at sea; 2 (children) in the Rocky Mountains; 1 (child) in Nebraska Territory; and 1 (child) in Patagonia.

The whole number of persons enumerated in San Francisco, at the last accounts, was 12,625, including the above, of whom 7,423 are foreigners, and 5,202 are American born citizens—1,270 of whom were born in Massachusetts, and 1,191 in New York.

Variety.

In the Wisconsin Legislature, there are 33 natives of New York; 12 of Vermont; 5 of Massachusetts; 3 of Kentucky; New-Jersey, 2; Maine, 2; Connecticut, 2; Pennsylvania, 2; New-Hampshire, 2; Ohio, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, each 1. Natives of Foreign Counties—Germany, 3; Prussia, 3; Scotland, 3; England, 3; and Canada, Norway and Switzerland, each 1. Nine of the Senators are farmers, 4 lawyers, and the remaining portion workingmen with one exception. In the Assembly—Farmers, 32; lawyers, 12; workingmen, 11; and the remainder miscellaneous.

There is a Swede in this city, says the Cleveland Plaindealer, by the name of Lindenbergh, waiting for the arrival of Jenny Lind, whom he claims as his cousin. Her real name he says is Lindenbergh, her father and his father being own brothers, but her father, owing to political troubles in Sweden, changed his name, either before or soon after Jenny was born, to Lind, dropping the two last syllables. This is not an uncommon thing in those monarchial countries.

It is asserted, upon pretty good authority, that a process has recently been discovered by a citizen of Larria, Germany, named Berluland, by which he can manufacture a superior article of leather, by resolving it into a liquid state. This process manufactures it from certain refuse and waste animal substances. It is said that he has established a manufactury near Vienna, but no part of the process is explained. He first resolves the substances into a state of fluidity, and can then cast it into any form desired.

Official returns made to the Foreign Office in London, show that from the year 1840 to the year 1848, inclusive, 594 vessels, containing 37,824 slaves, were captured by the British squadron, and 556 of them condemned. It has been estimated by the English statician McQueen, that the loss sustained by slave-traders in consequence of the captures or presence of African cruisers, from the year 1800 to 1847, was £30,240,000.

The use of Tar and Feathers in the punishment of crime is one of great antiquity. Richard I., in his voyage to the Holy Land, ordained thus:—"If any one is convicted of theft, let his head be shaved, like Champion's; let melted pitch be poured upon it, and feathers shaken over it, that he may be known, and let him be put ashore at the first land to which the ship approaches."

When Lieut. O'Brien was blown up, in the "Edgar," and thrown on board the "Admiral," all black and wet, he said to the commander, with pleasantry, "I hope, sir, you will excuse my dirty appearance, for I left the ship in so great a hurry, that I had not time to change my dress."

The Sharon Iron Company, in Ohio, of which every workman is a stockholder, is in full operation, working up about 25 tuns of pig metal per day into bar iron, nail plates, &c. They will shortly put in motion 15 or 20 nail machines, which will enable them to manufacture 70 or 80 kegs of nails per day. The iron manufactured by this Company is represented to be excellent.

Strange questions are agitated in the debating clubs down east. The last was—What is the difference between a fac simile, and a sick family? And the next will be—What is the difference between the bridge of sighs, and the size of a bridge? The former was decided in favor of the negative.

The Richmond Whig says, that a citizen of Virginia, named James S. French, has recently made an important improvement in locomotive steam engines, which gives them accelerated power in overcoming extraordinary grades.

To injure a man's sight, says the Albany Dutchman, there is nothing worse than sudden wealth. Let a woodsawyer draw a ten thousand dollar prize, and in less than a month he will not be able to recognize even the man that "used to go security for him."

A little boy, hearing his father say—"There is a time for all things," climbed up behind his mother's chair, and whispering in her ear, asked—"When is the proper time for hooking sugar out of the sugar-bowl?"

"Cabbage," says the Edinburgh Review, "contains more muscle sustaining nutriment than any other vegetable whatever. Boiled cabbage and corned beef make fifty-two as good dinners in twelve months as a man can eat."

The length of the projected railroad from Utica to the Erie Road at Deposite, is 84 miles. The cost is estimated at $1,700,000. The route is through the valley of the Unadilla and Susquehanna. The net profits of the Road are estimated at 8190,000.

A correspondent of the Boston Traveler says that the emigration to Oregon last season, was greater than ever before, amounting from 4,000 to 5,000. He says that the settlement of the territory is rapidly progressing, and it will soon become a State.

Cincinnati has 115,000, Pittsburg, 84,000, and St. Louis 77,000 inhabitants.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year of this Seminary, for 1850 and '51, will commence the third Wednesday in August, and continue forty-four weeks, including a short recess between the terms, and one of ten days for the winter holidays.

The year is divided into three terms:—

The first, of 14 weeks, begins Wednesday, August 21st, and ends Wednesday, November 27th.

The second, of 15 weeks, begins Monday, December 2d, and ends Friday, March 14th.

The third, of 14 weeks, begins Tuesday, March 18th and ends Tuesday, June 24th.

Board of Instruction.

GURDON EVANS, A. M., President,
And Professor of Mathematics and Natural Science.
Rev. JOSEPH W. MORTON,
Professor of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, Spanish and Moral and Intellectual Science.
Mrs. SUSANNA M. SPICER, Preceptress.
ADOLPH ROSENHAYN,
(Late of Friedrick Wilhelm College, Berlin,)
Teacher of German, Piano Forte, and Assistant in Greek and Latin.

Other competent Teachers will be employed as occasion may demand.

TEACHERS' CLASSES will be formed, as usual, at the beginning of the Fall and middle of the Winter Terms, and continue seven weeks.

In the Common Branches, classes will be formed at the commencement of each term; but in the higher, the interest of the student, as well as the welfare of the Institution, demand that a more systematic course of study be pursued.

In the Natural Sciences, Elementary Chemistry and Philosophy will be pursued during the Fall Term Agricultural Chemistry, Astronomy, and Physiology during the Winter Term; Botany and Geology during the Summer Term.

Classes will be formed in Latin, French, and German, at the commencement of the Fall Term; in Hebrew, Greek, and Spanish, at the commencement of the Winter Term, and continue through the course of study.

In Mathematics, Geometry is studied in the Fall, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, and Astronomy, Surveying, Navigation, &c., in the Summer Term.

The course of instruction in Agriculture is thorougly scientific, embracing study and recitation in the best authors. Instruction is given in a well-furnished laboratory, in the analysis of soils, ashes of plants, manures, &c. and the modes of testing for their constituent elements. The attention of farmers who wish to give their sons a practical education is especially called to this department.

Board in private families, from $1 25 to $1 50. Many students board in clubs for 60 to 75 cents.

Tuition—to be settled upon entering school—from $3 00 to $5 00. Extras—For Drawing, $1 00; Oil Painting, $5 00; Chemical Experiments, $1 00; Writing, including stationery, 50 cents; Piano Forte, $8 00; Use of Instrument, $2 00; Agricultural Chemistry, including chemicals, apparatus, and fuel, (breakage extra,) $12 00.

It is very desirable that students should enter at the beginning of the term; yet they are received into classes already formed at any time.

For farther information, address Gurdon Evans, J. W. Morton, or Rev. J. R. Irish, President of the Corporation.

THE EQUALITY OF THE RACES.

Reply to D. E. Maxson. [Concluded.

If, after what has been said, more decisive proofs that the ancient Egyptian and Ethiopian nations were not negroes, are required, still more can be produced. I have already defined the geography of the negro countries; but anticipate the query, Were there negroes no where else? To this I shall reply in the language of history. On page 794, volume 12th, of the Encyclopedia, published in 1748, we find the following testimony: "True Negroes have existed, as nations, no where but in the torrid zone, and only in three regions situated in that zone, to wit, Senegal, in Guinea on the western coast of Africa, in Nubia, and in what is called New Guinea or the Papuons Land. In Nubia, however, their empire is only recent." On the same page, we are likewise informed, that "the principal nations of Ethiopia have never been Negroes." Again, "they were called Ethopians, in consequence of the darkness of their complexion, at a time when the true Negro was not known." I might multiply these testimonies indefinitely, but shall leave the subject with the remark, that I have neither made quotations from, nor depended upon the accounts of, obscure and illiterate travelers, or visionaries, but of naturalists and historians, whose knowledge and veracity are universally known and admitted.

According to M. Gosselin, Hanno, the Carthagenian, first passed through the Pillars of Hercules, and explored the coast of Africa. The inhabitants are described as exhibiting, in their appearance, the modern negro traits. They were in a state of nature, entirely naked, and feeding upon the spontaneous produce of the earth. The moment the sun disappeared, they collected together in groups, and the whole live-long night their songs and shouts of merriment saluted the ears of the astonished voyagers. Time passed away; great Caucasian nations arose, advanced to civilization, and embalmed their names in the immortality of renown bestowed by song and history. The twelfth century of the Christian era arrives; and again the negro tribes of Africa are brought to view. They inhabit the same identical countries; they exhibit the same peculiar traits. But what progress have they made in civilization or the arts? The same as the hippopotami that swam in their rivers. Hear the testimony of history. An Arabian who wrote at that period, and whose works were first printed in Arabic at Rome, subsequently translated into Latin, and finally into the French language, gives a very distinct account of the negro nations. He says that "they never traveled abroad, that they had no regular government, and that they were destitute of the knowledge which the Arabians were favored with." About the same time, John Leo, a Moor, who was a native of Grenada, but who had resided some time in Africa, published an account of these same nations. He says that "they lived in common, having no property in land, no superior lord, but supported themselves upon the natural produce of the country, which afforded plenty of roots, game, and honey." Subsequently, he says that "the Moors taught them the Mahometan religion, and the arts of life." Again, "they were ignorant of the use of iron and money." Again, "they were contented and happy; they lived without toil and without superfluities." But such content is rather the mark of idiocy, than of a high, noble, aspiring nature. It is the content of the brute, that is perfectly satisfied if he can get a sufficiency of food to satisfy the demands of nature. The difference between the Negro and the Caucasian is here exhibited. The former remained for ages without the least vestige of improvement; the latter emerged from an equally low state to the highest degree of civilization. By them has a large proportion of the inhabited world been twice conquered; once by the arts of Greece, and once by the arms of Rome. But the Negro had no higher aim than to satisfy his appetite; no greater ambition than to ensnare the game; no loftier devotion than the worship of small pieces of wood, or tufts of feathers, performed not unfrequently with cannibal rites. Two centuries after, Alonzo Gonzales, the captain of a Portuguese ship, landed upon the negro coast, and took several captives, whom he carried into slavery, and thus commenced that cruel and unrighteous trade.

Here we may pause and ask a few questions, taking for granted that the negro race is equal in mental capability with the Caucasian race. If he actually possessed the same intellectual endowment, the same capacity for self-development, the same inventive ingenuity, the same far-reaching foresight, why was he not in a situation to repel the invaders? No natural advantages were enjoyed in Europe that Africa did not afford; why, then, did he not possess, like the others, fortified cities, fleets, and armies? Who taught the Caucasians to build ships, and to chain the elements [illegible] the world [illegible] insight [illegible] might [illegible] the negro teach himself? He has not. Hugh Murray says, "The Negro race has ever remained in a rude and barbarous state. Their cities are congregations of huts; their laws the despotic whim of the reigning chief. Incessantly occupied in war or the chase, they seek not to perpetuate their ideas. They have no written language, nor even a code of hieroglyphics. Abundantly supplied by nature with all the necessaries of life, they have retained their character unchanged, after centuries of intercourse with the most enlightened nations." Gibbon says, "The inaction of the negroes does not seem to be the effect either of their virtue or their pusillanimity. But their rude ignorance has never invented any effectual weapons of defense or of destruction; they appear incapable of forming any extensive plans of government or of conquest; and the obvious inferiority of their mental faculties has been discovered and abused by the nations of the temperate zone. Sixty thousand blacks are annually embarked from the coast of Guinea, never to return; but they are embarked in chains; and this constant emigration, which in two centuries might have furnished armies to overrun the globe, accuses the guilt of Europe, and the weakness of Africa."

My friend says, "The negro nations have fallen, and so have Tyre, Carthage, Greece, and Rome." But, according to this learned testimony, the negro nations have not fallen, for they never rose. These great Caucasian nations which he mentions, have indeed been supplanted; but their blood still animates the veins of the world's great masters. Ages succeeding ages has it produced nations to whom Egypt and Ethiopia, in their palmiest days, were mere children. They might, indeed, rear pyramids, but could they fashion a book? They might weave linen, but could they produce literature. The monuments reared by the Mexican Indians were, probably, quite as wonderful as theirs; but the works of the coral insect are more stupendous than either. It was the invention of letters that particularly showed the divinity of the human mind. It is the perpetuation of his ideas that, above all things else, distinguishes man from the brute. The only writing of either Egypt or Ethiopia was hieroglyphical; and in this respect, likewise, they resembled the Mexican Indians. Gibbon says, that "the use of letters is the principal circumstance that distinguishes a civilized people from a herd of savages, incapable of knowledge or reflection; and without them no people has ever made any considerable progress in the abstract sciences, or possessed in a high state of perfection the useful and agreeable arts of life."

My friend enters into a laborious metaphysical discussion on the nature of the soul, the annihilation of its faculties, and similar subjects; and attempts to prove, that we must either admit the equality of the races, or deny their unity. I will inform him, that we are not reduced to any such extremity. He says, "The aboriginal Australian is not incapable of European civilization." True, but the question is, would he ever civilize himself, as the Caucasian nations have civilized themselves? Again, he says, "The African may be brought up to the intellectual standard of the European." Could he bring himself up? Who brought the European to his present exalted state? He quotes from Dr. Pritchard, that the Hottentots and Bushmen of South Africa present humanity in its most degraded form, and has not attempted to prove that they ever could, or ever would, improve by their own energies. "Thus," he concludes, "I have the best testimony of the literary world, that not only the Negroes, but tribes of other races immensely below him, are capable of Caucasian civilization." Granted; they might be civilized to a certain degree, but they would never improve and civilize themselves. If the testimony of Cuvier, Buffon, and all other naturalists, can be depended upon, there is neither tribe nor race upon earth below the Negroes in the mental scale. He also says, that the various races are "psychologically identical," but that fails to establish their equality.

Macleay, a very learned naturalists, has advanced a theory upon which this question may safely rest. He says that "every group of organized beings divides itself into two branches of affinities, which, finally uniting again at its opposite extremities, form a circle; and that this disposition of affinities holds good, not only in every group, of whatever magnitude and denomination, but througout the animal and vegetable world." With respect to birds, and some kinds of animals, this theory rests upon no presumptive evidence, but it has been demonstrated to be a fact. Reasoning from analogy, it applies to the races of men. Of a group thus arranged, it would be impossible for any one to occupy a position isolated from the rest; yet it by no means holds, that every one must stand upon a level. The Negro is not considered as holding any nearer affinity to the brute than does the Caucasian. He is admitted into the full brotherhood of humanity, and the immortality of his soul stands upon as firm a basis as that of his more elevated brother. We have made no effort to cast the odium of inferiority upon the negro, because, to an inferiority like this, we cannot perceive that odium attaches. Is the swine odious, because to him nature has denied the physical beauty and instinct of the horse? Is any man odious, because he is inferior to his companion in natural or acquired talents, especially when his inferiority may be attributed to causes over which he had no control? Neither can such inferiority be any excuse or apology for his oppressors. If God and nature have bestowed upon the Caucasian a superior capacity for improvement and intellectual development, it becomes five-fold incumbent upon him to assist, and to seek to ameliorate the condition of the weaker races. If the races do indeed stand upon an equality, let every one take [illegible] the [illegible] for such [illegible] well do we know, that [illegible] Caucasian [illegible] too many instances betrayed their holy trust. Well do we know, that their superiority has been too often employed to tyrannize and oppress; yet we must insist that from them the other nations have derived their civilization; because such is the concurrent testimony of historians and naturalists. We must insist, that if Jackson, Ward, and Garnet, have become great, it is from contact with them. At least, we do not hear of such men being produced among the negroes, who, "in their native purity," are idolizing their fetiches. Moreover, I conceive that "native purity," as applied to a barbarous and savage people, would have come with more propriety from the pen of a materialist, who would consider that "the state of nature was the reign of God," than from that of a Christian, who will concede the natural depravity of the human heart.

Are we then to be considered as cherishing unholy prejudices against the Negro, because, in our opinion, an overruling Providence has bostowed upon him a smaller measure of intelligence than he has granted to the Caucasian? Are we to be considered as shutting our hearts and sympathies against him, because we are loath to banish that instinct of nature, by which, throughout the whole animal kingdom, kind assimilates and mingles with kind? So long as the human eye is delighted with the form and lineaments of beauty, I believe that the Caucasian will prefer the presence and society of his own race. Sincerely do we commiserate the condition of the Negro. Most sincerely do we respond to the sentiment of my friend, "Let him up." Although great have been our differences upon other points, here our opinions precisely concur. Let him up; nay, more—help him up. He is a man—a brother—only weaker. For the sake of Him, therefore, who was high, but who, for our sake, and for his sake, consented to be made low; for the sake of Him who was rich, but who became poor to help us in our great extremity; let us be ready at all times to help this outcast by all legitimate means. We are not his oppressors; neither are we their apologists; but we are the citizens of a country where slavery is tolerated, not because it is approved, but because it cannot be avoided. We are citizens of a country with whose social system it was wove before the foundation of the Federal Government. We do not conceive ourselves accountable either for its institution or its perpetuation. We do not conceive it to be our duty to disclaim allegiance to our country by disobeying its laws, or array ourselves with a faction, against the constituted authorities of the States. We have yet to learn that the dismemberment of the empire would be advantageous to the slaves, or that unconditional emancipation would be attended with the benefits that might be anticipated. One thing is certain; nothing can be lost by prudence and moderation, nothing gained by recklessness and precipitation. We have yet to learn that it is our privilege to sit in judgment upon the laws, and make our private opinions the test whether we will obey them or not. We fear the result of such a course. Actions are to be judged by all their bearings and tendencies, collateral and remote. This would virtually tend to make every man his own lawgiver, which would strike at the very root of civil government, and introduee a scene of the greatest anarchy. Perhaps there is not in the statute book a law of which every one could perceive the righteousness or the utility. If one law is to be disobeyed, because a man, or a body of men, interpret it to be contrary to their notions of right or expediency, why not another, and another? To us it appears necessary that private judgments should be suspended before the decisions of the majority. To us it appears necessary to hesitate before giving the countenance of our influence and example to a precedent that might, in the end, overthrow all rights of propetry and inheritance. In our opinion, the obligation to obey the laws rests with double force upon the people in this country, since here they participate in the enactment of them. Every man who exercises the elective franchise, tacitly binds himself thereby to abide the actions of his representative, and to repose confidence in that representative's judgment and superior knowledge. So, indeed, it appears to us. If we err, it is on the side of law and order, and it is in good company. The Congress, the Senators, the President, the wisest and most distinguished men of the nation are on our side.

We are not prejudiced against the Negroes; but if there is a prejudice of which our nature is susceptible, it is in favor of our government and its officials. From our hearts do we respect and venerate the Congress. We respect them for the position they fill. We respect them for the sake of the glorious dead whose places they now occupy. We respect them for the place they will hold in the annals of posterity. Is it becoming to rebuke them in harsh and exaggerated language? Should we not rather "entreat them as fathers," or keep silence before their superior dignity and wisdom.

We are not oppressors of the Negroes; neither are we apologists for oppression of any kind; but we must concede our private opinions to the judgment of a body men like this. Till man is restored to the pristine image of his Maker; till his mind can reflect again the image of the Divine Mind; till passion ceases to inflame his imagination, and prejudice to warp his judgment; conscience cannot be considered as a certain arbiter of right and wrong. Neither can Scripture, in all cases, furnish an appeal, since to every text there is one, and but one, just interpretation; yet an endless diversity of opinion will be entertained by different men concerning its signification. There can be no universally admitted standard of truth, while the Divine Oracles have to be submitted to the judgment of fallible men. An anecdote tending to illustrate this point has been re[illegible] A bigot was once expressing an opinion with great warmth, to a philosopher. He was stopped by the sage with the inquiry, how many opinions he rupposed might be entertained upon that one point. Probably one hundred, was the answer. Ninety-nine to one, then, you are wrong, was the retort. In such a case as this, it might have been a thousand to one; for what private man can be so inflated with vanity as to suppose himself better qualified to judge of public measures than are the Congress, whose facilities for a right understanding of the subject are so much superior to his own.

Finally, whatever may be the future destiny of our country; whether "Mene, Mene, has been written upon its walls;" whether or not "a blast of destruction" is about to be sounded; is, I believe, only known to Him who doeth his will in the armies of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth. To those apprehensive of so dire a catastrophe, the language of the prophet, as addressed to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, might be applicable, when he bids them to fly, lest they participate in her plagues. FAITH.

FROM POEMS BY FRITZ AND LEOLET.

Ye who think the truth ye sow
Lost beneath the winter snow,
Doubt not, Time's unerring law
Yet shall bring the genial thaw.
  God in nature ye can trust;
  Is the God of mind less just?

Read we not the mighty thought
Once by ancient sages taught?
Though it wither'd in the blight
Of the medieval night,
  Now the harvest we behold;
  See, it bears a thousand fold.

Workers on the barren soil,
Yours may seem a thankless toil;
Sick at heart with hope deferr'd,
Listen to the cheering word;
  Now the faithful sower grieves;
  Soon he'll bind his golden sheaves.

If Great Wisdom hath decreed
Man may labor, yet the seed
Never in this life shall grow,
Shall the sower cease to sow?
  The fairest fruit may yet be born
  On the resurrection morn!

PAY YOUR MINISTER.

BY MRS. H. C. KNIGHT.

"Has Mr. Scott's bill been sent over lately?" asked a grocer, gruffly.

"Yes, sir; I take it every time I go a dunning," answered the boy.

"Well, what does he say?"

"He has n't got the money; that's what he always says."

"Well, go again; these ministers are salaried men, and they ought to pay—wonder what they do with their money—practice before precept, I say; I want no better religion than to pay my debts"—a smirk of satisfaction played over his hard features. "Here, take this bill; I'll drive him till I get it—give him a touch of the law—yes—no—go, Bill."

"He won't pay, I know," muttered Bill, walking off.

A knock at Scott's door—Mary answered the summons.

"I want to see Mr. Scott," demanded the boy. Up flew Mary to the study door; gently opening it, and on tip-toe peeping in—"Papa, please come down, a boy wants you;" and as he put aside his pen and slowly arose, Mary jumped in and nestled her litte hand lovingly in his. "I'll lead you, father—it's that Mr. Cook's boy." Ah! Mary little dreamed how drearily the information fell upon her father's ear.

"Is it?"—he stops—"perhaps, then, you had better go down and ask him to send up his message, for I am busy"—he hesitates—"no, Mary, stop, I will go myself. These are exigencies I must meet," he added, to himself, pressing his lips firmly together, lest an impatient or repining thought might seek an utterance.

"Here's Mr. Cook's bill, and he says he wants the pay now," was the familiar greeting that Mr. Scott met at the door—altogether too familiar had the poor man become with messages of a similar character.

"Yes, yes, Mr. Cook's bill"—taking the bill in one hand, and thrusting the other into his pocket, more from habit than expectation that it would come in contact with any thing else than the two keys which he sometimes jingled together, in the pleasing illusion that they sounded like change. "I believe I am quite out of money now, but tell Mr. Cook I will try and send it over soon."

"How soon?" asked the boy, impatiently; "that's what you said before."

A deep flush passed over the minister's face, as he mildly answered, "Just as soon as I can;" and experience told him but too painfully that his "soon" had no very definite boundaries. The boy departed.

"Come, my little girl, I want you to go on an errand; ask your mother to put on your things," said Mr. Scott, trying to be cheerful.

"Mother has laid down for a little while; I can dress me;" and away she skipped.

Mr. Scott returned to his study, and wrote an urgent request to the treasurer of his society, soliciting some payment of the long and unpaid arrears of his last year's salary.

"I'm ready, father," said Mary, at his elbow, just as he had finished.

"My dear, you will be cold; have you nothing to wear on your neck but this?" said the father, taking a corner of a thin 'kerchief in his hand; "why, it's November, and 't is very cold out!"

"Mother's got the shawl; I've been down in the kitchen, and am warm. It is very cold up here, father—why do n't you have a fire in your study, where you sit and study so much? Do n't your fingers freeze, father?"

"I should be very glad to have one," said the minister, with a slight despondence in his tone, "but we cannot have every thing we want in this world, Mary."

"We shan't want fire in heaven, shall we, father?"

"Thank God, no, Mary," and he hastily brushed away the starting tear. "Carry this note over to Mr. Goodwin, and wait for an answer. Run, and then you will be warmer."

Away the child sped. The minister took a few turns in the narrow precincts of his study, rubbed his hands, buttoned up his threadbare coat, and then resumed his chair and pen; but with every gust that whirled the dead leaves against the window, a chill and a shiver swept through his frame.

Half an hour, and back came the little messenger. At the patting of her little feet on the stairs, hope and fear, and fear and hope, rose and fell in his bosom, and as he turned round and beheld her happy, rosy face, a bright vision of bank bills flitted before him.

"So you have got it," he said, cheerily and thankfully.

"No, father; he says he's very sorry, but he has not got a dollar for you yet; he says he hopes he shall soon—he's very sorry."

Who that has not been similarly situated can describe the heart-sickening which follows such an announcement?

"He says he's very sorry," added Mary again, as if fearing her father needed consolation.

"Oh, very well, thank you, my dear; now run down and help mother."

"I'm going to get dinner if mother is n't well enough to get up—she will let me."

"See what a fine dinner you can get;" and the minister could not have restrained a sigh, had he suffered himself to count the probabilities of future dinners; but then he remembered the lilies of the field and the fowls of the air, and a trusting love stole over his bosom, and he felt he was in a Father's house, and under a Father's care.

In due time came the dinner hour. "Mother do n't feel well enough to get up, but she wants you to sit down with us children," said Mary, again presenting herself at the study door.

Mr. Scott proceeded to the bedroom. "Are you no better, Sarah?" he asked, tenderly taking the thin hand of his wife, upon whose arm lay a sickly, purple infant of five weeks. "You ought not so soon to have tried to do the work; the weather is cold, and you have exposed yourself too much, I fear."

"Ought not, are hard words," answered the wife, faintly smiling. "I hope I shall be better soon, for we cannot afford to hire. If we only had the flannel, dear, I could be sitting up, making that, while I am too feeble to do much about the house. I am afraid you suffer for your waistcoats; I think flannel would strengthen me. If you could let me have a litle money," continued the wife, feebly, "I do n't know but Mary could get it; she went with me to look at it."

"Mother, Polly Marden's at the door," said Mary; "she says she wants to speak to you a minute; can she, mother?"

"I suppose she wants the pay for making your pantaloons, dear," said the wife, addressing her husband; "can you let me have it? Ask her into the kitchen, Mary."

"Sarah, I have not a cent in the world, and I have not had one these five weeks; my salary is not paid, and now winter is coming, with cold, and debts, and perhaps hunger, staring us in the face"—and the poor minister, quite overcome by the accumulation of debts and necessities, felt unnerved in spite of himself. Fearing to distress his wife, he hastily arose and retired to his cold and comfortless study, there to betake himself to the Lord, and cast all the burden of his cares upon Him who careth for him. Through many a season of hardship and sore distress had his strength been renewed and his heart encouraged at the throne of mercy.

Consecrated to God in infancy by pious parents, he early became the subject of renewing grace, and resolved to devote himself to the ministry. To reach this, for ten years he had struggled through amazing difficulties. His collegiate and theological course could have borne witness to watchings and self-denials which nothing could have sustained but deep and intense love for the work. Thoroughly trained for his high and responsible calling, he entered upon his duties with a heart filled with his Master's love for the souls of his fellow-men. Single-hearted, full of hope, ready to make any sacrifice for another's good, he became settled in the ministry, expecting at least to receive a sufficient return for his labors of love to enable him to prosecute the arduous duties of his profession free from immediate want. Like his, the lives of many devoted clergymen are clouded by anxiety about the maintenance of their families. They labor hard, and preach, and study, and watch, and pray; they sacrifice health, bodily ease, and personal comfort, for the good of souls under their charge; and what poor returns do they often receive, how wretchedly and reluctantly paid, for their blessed ministrations! The profession, exalted as it is, commands an average pay no way equal to any other business; and when the clergymen are ready to receive with humble satisfaction a small compensation, how grudgingly it is bestowed! Month after month, quarter after quarter, pass by, and the minister's bill is long in arrears; he cannot get his just dues, while the debts and necessities of his little family are fast accumulating.

Shall not such a laborer be suitably rewarded? Shall he not be kept above a painful sense of want? Shall his mind be turned from his great and solemn duties by the fearful forebodings "How will the two ends of the year meet?" O shame on the Christian church and Christian communities, that this should ever be the fact! Let every individual who enjoys the exalted privileges of an intelligent Christian ministry, look to it that he is not amiss about granting it an adequate support. Let every individual behold the distinguished blessings, temporal, intellectual, and spiritual, of an intelligent gospel ministry, and be in season to pay his minister.

It is a great misfortune not to be able to speak well, but a still greater one not to know when to be silent.

When has a scruple more weight than a dram? When conscience makes a teetotaler refuse a thimblefull of brandy.

WASHINGTON'S FIRST THANKSGIVING PROCLAMATION.

After the adoption of the Constitution and the organization of the Government, Congress passed a resolution requesting the President to appoint a day of Thanksgiving and Prayer. A response was given to the request in the following beautiful and appropriate proclamation, which is worthy of being preserved as a momento of Washington.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas, it is the duty of all nations to acknowledge the providence of Almighty God, to obey His will, to be grateful for His benefits, and humbly implore His protection and favor; and whereas both Houses of Congress have, by their joint committee, requested me to recommend to the people of the United States a day of public thanksgiving and prayer, to be observed by acknowledging with grateful hearts the many and signal favors of Almighty God, especially by affording them an opportunity of peaceably establishing a form of government for their safety and happiness: Now, therefore, I do recommend and assign Thursday, the 26th day of November next, to be devoted by the people of these States to the great and glorious Being, who is the beneficent author of all the good that was, that is, that will be. That we then all unite in rendering unto Him our sincere and humble thanks for his kind care and protection of the people of this country previous to its becoming a nation; for the signal and manifold mercies, and the favorable interposition of his providence, in the course and conclusion of the late war; for the great degree of tranquility, union, and plenty, which we have since enjoyed; for the peaceable and rational manner in which we have been enabled to establish constitutions of government for our safety and happiness, and particularly the national one more lately instituted; for the civil and religious liberty with which we are blessed, and the means we have of acquiring and diffusing useful knowledge, and in general for all the great and various favors which he hath been pleased to confer upon us. And, also, that we may then unite in most humbly offering our prayers and supplications to the great Lord and Ruler of Nations, and beseech him to pardon our national and other transgressions; to enable us all, whether in public or private stations, to perform our several and natural duties properly and prudently; to render our national Government a blessing to all people, constantly being a government of wise, just, and constitutional laws, discreetly and faithfully executed and obeyed; to protect and guide all sovereigns and nations, especially such as have shown kindness unto us, and bless them with good government, peace, and concord; to promote the knowledge of true religion and virtue, and the increase of science amongst us.

CONSCIENCE WAS KILLING HIM.

Some years ago, a large, powerful, rough-looking, and dangerous man, named, we believe, Timothy Tiernan or Tierney, was arrested by the police, on a charge of knocking a man down, in the lower part of the city; the unfortunate man falling with his head upon the curb stone, and splitting his skull, so that he shortly after died at the hospital. An indictment was endeavored to be procured against Tierney, but the Grand Jury ignored the bill, sending the offense to the Special Sessions, as an assault merely. Recorder Tallmage, on the representation of Capt. Leonard, of the Second Ward, gave the prisoner the full extent of the law, however, and sent him to the Island for one year.

At the time of the arrest, Tierney seemed to take pride in the murderous assault, for which he should have had five years in the State Prison, had the grand inquest performed their duty. He was, at the time of his sentence, full-faced, tall, and athletic; but a few months made a remarkable change.

A few nights since, a ghastly, haggard looking object, with attenuated cheeks, sunken eyes, and a general appearance of almost total physical prostration, entered the Second Ward Station-House, and requested to be locked up! A moment's glance, and a question or two, established his identity as Tierney! He had worked out the period of his Island sentence, but a more fearful retribution than can be awarded by any human tribunal was upon him. The victim of his murderous passion was continually by his side! In his waking moments, or amid the visions of the night, the dead man's face was always present; and in the desperation of despair, he had come back to the scene of his first arrest, with the request to be incarcerated once more in his lonely cell!

"He was crazy!" we observed to Capt. Leonard, who related the incident.

"No, he was not crazy!" was the earnest response. "We frequently witness cases nearly similar. Conscience was killing him!"

Man's law had been satisfied, but the judgments of the Almighty were still operating!

What a commentary on crime and its consequences—the terrible truthfulness of that remark, "Conscience was killing him!"

OUR PRAYERS DO NOT DIE.

Though we die, (says Flavel,) our prayers do not die with us; they outlive us, and those we leave behind may reap the benefit of them when we are turned to dust. For my own part, I must profess, before the world, that I have a high value for this mercy, and do, from the bottom of my heart, bless the Lord, who gave me a religious and tender father, who often poured out his soul to God for me; and, being full of love to his children, often carried them before the Lord, prayed and pleaded with God for them. The prayers and blessings left by him before the Lord, I esteem above the fairest inheritance on earth.

Oh! it is no small mercy to have thousands of fervant prayers lying before the Lord in heaven for us. Oh! that we would all be faithful to this duty. Surely our love, especially to the souls of our relatives, should not grow cold.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, March 6, 1851.

THE STATE OF OUR DENOMINATION.

If any people on earth ought to be all "holiness to the Lord," Seventh-day Baptists are that people. Planting themselves upon the divine law as the only standard of holiness, and protesting earnestly against the prevalent systems which expunge from that standard one of its most important precepts, they have declared their determination to "live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world." It is to be hoped that they have not made the declaration confiding in their own strength, but that they have respect to the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, as the only power which can enable them to carry out their determination. At all events, we know that in this respect their creed is not wanting in orthodoxy, to whatever extent they may have been deceived as to the actual exercises of their hearts.

We are constrained to acknowledge, however, that Seventh-day Baptists do not justify their profession. Whether they are any worse than other denominations, we do not know; but we are very certain that there is great room for improvement. Family religion might be more thoroughly cultivated than it is. There is a deplorable neglect of this duty, if we are not greatly mistaken. In fact, we dare not give publicity to the things which we know in regard to this matter, lest our people should stand disgraced before the world. The time may come, however, when we shall have to speak out plainly upon this and other forms of wickedness, which are impeding our progress, and rendering it impossible for us to exert a converting influence upon mankind. To say that our families are as well trained as those of any other persuasion, is to say nothing to the purpose. They ought to be far better trained; and the family should resemble, as nearly as possible, a church of Jesus Christ, of which the father is the pastor and spiritual guide.

The Sabbath might be better observed. It is deeply to be regretted, that there is not an entire agreement among us as to the proper time for commencing the observance of it. There are some—we are happy to say that they are but few in number—who do not begin to keep it till they rise from their beds on the morning of the seventh day. We wish they could see that God, by withholding the manna on Sixth-day night, (Exod. 16,) signified the going down of the sun on the sixth day as the beginning of the sacred rest. The great mass of our people, however, are orthodox on this point. Their creed is right enough; only of their practice do we complain. They allow the spirit of the world to lead them so much, that they are seldom ready to enter into rest, when sacred time commences. The same spirit induces them to start upon a journey, or to make ready for some secular business, before the sun has fairly sunk behind the hills. The Sabbath is clipped at both ends, and it would seem as if there was that same kind of impatience under its restraints, which induced the hypocrites of old time to ask, "When will the Sabbath be gone, that we may sell corn?" In addition to this, worldly conversation, idle visiting from house to house, the reading of common newspapers and light literature, together with the neglect of closet exercises, serve to deprive the soul of that benefit which the Sabbath would otherwise bring, and give our opponents an advantage which ought never to be allowed them. In vain do we assume the character of reformers, while such looseness prevails.

There might be more done to sustain the institutions of religion. The ministry might be better supported, and the temptation to seek other employments removed. We doubt whether there is a minister in our denomination who receives a living salary. He obtains his bread, in part, by his own exertions in those directions which call him off from his main and great work; or, perhaps, by draining the slender patrimony bequeathed to his wife for her support, and that of her children, in case she should be left a widow. In the mean time, the people are living in abundance, and laying up money.

Missionary operations might be more vigorously sustained. Tracts might be more extensively circulated. The cause of education might be gone into more thoroughly. Instead of having only one mission in foreign lands, we might sustain half a dozen. Instead of a very few tracts, and those all of a strictly denominational character, we ought to put them in circulation by thousands and tens of thousands. We ought to be seeking out young men of promise, and educating them for the ministry. We want a "school of the prophets," and ought to have one. If we were a people of half the devotion that the cause demands, these things would be attended to, and we might confidently expect God to "establish the work of our hands upon us." But alas! the love of this world curses us, and renders us a feeble band.

To tell the truth, we regard our denomination as by no means in a prosperous condition. Our principles are agitating the public mind, and were we prepared to avail ourselves of the agitation, and of the spirit of inquiry that is abroad, there is no telling what might be the result. But, as a denomination, we are not ready. But few of our churches can be said to be in a flourishing condition. Something like a dozen of them are now destitute of pastors, and we see not how they are to be supplied. Of those that are supplied with regular preaching, but few enjoy faithful pastoral care, the ministers being compelled to give their time, in part, to other business. Many of our ministers, too, are in the decline of life. They will soon be gathered to their fathers, and what is to be lamented is, that there are so few of our young brethren preparing to stand in their places. How much of this state of things is to be traced to the criminal worldliness and prayerless lives of the members of our churches, it would be well to ponder with solemn searchings of heart. May the Lord speedily revive us.

TEMPERANCE AND THE SABBATH.

Our signature was recently solicited to a Petition asking the Mayor of New York to enforce the city ordinance against selling liquor on Sunday—or on the Sabbath as the petition expresses it. Friendly as were our feelings towards the Temperance Cause, and anxious as we were to promote a better observance of the Sabbath, still we did not feel at liberty to lend our aid to the movement. We found, on examination, that this petition, in common with nearly all others on the subject, so mixes up the sin of Sabbath-breaking with that of liquor-selling, that it is very difficult to say which is the most prominent, or at which the document is chiefly aimed—a circumstance which is likely to be, and certainly ought to be, fatal to its success. Supposing, however, that the petition were so framed as to make it clear that temperance was the object aimed at, then we should have to express our fear that the temperance cause can receive no permanent benefit from petitions which, by asking that the sale of liquor may be restrained by law on one day of the week, imply that its sale on the other six days is right and satisfactory. Or, supposing that the better observance of the Sabbath is what the petitioners desire, then we say, that the only hope of permanently promoting that object rests upon the coincidence of the law which it is proposed to enforce, with the law which God has given upon the subject; and as we are unable to see the coincidence of the city ordinance forbidding labor on the first day of the week, or Sunday, with God's ordinance forbidding labor on the seventh day of the week, or Saturday, we have no hope that the Sabbath cause would be permanently promoted by the action on the part of the Mayor which the petition asks. We are ready to go as far as any body reasonably can to promote a better observance of the Sabbath, and to oppose the sale of intoxicating liquor on all days of the week. But we can not, even by implication, sanction a breach of God's Sabbath Law, or a persistence for six days of the week in the iniquitous and destructive traffic in intoxicating drinks.

SPIRIT RAPPINGS.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

In the last number of the Recorder, I suggested some thoughts on the subject of psychology, and its different developments. I did not adventure an opinion respecting its pretensions to a sure-sightedness, or supernatural or spiritual communications by what is termed the spiritual rappings, &c., or whether they were the production of a scientific course of experiments, resulting in the art of an optical illusion, or any other deception practiced on the senses. The investigation of these points I had not ventured; nor are they important to my purpose. I had even granted the question, and proceeded on the ground claimed by those who are most interested in the matter. I however placed the science, if such it be, in a category in which some will not willingly submit to have it placed. But, as I before stated, so now I reiterate, that it is the thing, and not the name, that is of consequence to us in this matter. If it was once denounced as an abomination with the Lord, which provoked his wrath against the heathen which inhabited the land of Canaan, and adjoining nations, it has doubtless in itself, or connected with it, some dangerous principles, which, however we may speculate upon, we are not bound to search out. In order to settle the question of its nature, God has positively denounced it, and that should be the end of controversy.

But though the question may be thus settled, it may be proper to suggest, that counterfeiting is always wrong, and in no particular more dangerous than in matters of religion. God knew as well, in the time of Moses, what could be produced by electricity, on animal magnetism, or, in other words, psychology, as at the present time; and if it was then dangerous to the salvation of the world, it must be at the present time. What appeared God-provoking then was, that when God made a communication by the mouth of his prophets, and sanctioned it by wonders, wicked men would immediately resort to the sorcerers, or soothsayers [truth-tellers,] or those who consult familiar spirits, to produce the like or similar results, or to counteract its force. So in Egypt, when Moses made a demonstration, Pharaoh immediately had recourse to the sorcerers and magicians. When God had refused to answer Saul by his prophets, or in the usual way, he had recourse to familiar spirits, to ascertain, if possible, what God had refused to communicate. The difficulty of establishing revealed religion where the enemies of God had a counterfeit so well calculated to bewilder the minds of the inquirers as the present system of psychology, would be apparent to every mind. God gives a doctrine or duty by the mouth of his prophets, but necromancy is immediately resorted to, and though it will not [illegible] inspired word, will assume to give a [illegible] ous and contrary sense from what it [illegible] naturally import, and the object is in a [illegible] ure defeated. This is practiced at the present time, and expositions of the Scriptures are given, which no one would feel justified in understanding from the Bible itself. Suppose, however, that these are not the abominable features of this profession, we are nevertheless, as Christians, bound to consider it as wrong to encourage it, and insulting to our Maker, who has vouchsafed his will to us concerning it.

I readily admit, that we may be deceived in this matter, and perhaps become somewhat involved in it without understanding its character, its "bewitching," "charming," "enchanting" tendency. Good men may as easily become duped as any others, unless they adhere to God's word. Paul says to his Galatian brethren, "Who hath bewitched you, that ye should not obey the truth, before whose eyes Jesus Christ has been evidently set forth crucified among you?" Paul had experience in this evil when he was withstood by Elymas the sorcerer, "seeking to turn away the deputy from the faith." Philip also had experience in this profession—(Acts, chap. 8: 6, 7, 9,)—"But there was a certain man called Simon, which beforetime in the city had used sorceries, and had bewitched the people, . . . giving out that himself was some great one, to whom they gave heed, from the greatest to the least, saying, This man is the great power of God." This man became proselyted to the gospel, and was baptized, and continued with Philip, wondering and beholding the miracles which he did. He evidently had deceived himself, and also Philip. So subtil and harmless were the arts he had used, that he must have supposed the miracles of the apostles only a sphere in the science which he had not attained. His deception was only revealed to Peter in his offering money to be put in possession of the higher knowledge of the profession. The danger of deception may therefore be greater than we have supposed.

The question will then arise, in case that psychology or mesmerism is correctly placed in the same family with those ancient professions, if it is possible that these communications are from spirits, as they represent themselves to the inquirer to be, as St. Peter, St. Paul, or St. Luke, or Samuel the prophet, whether they do not lie? This must be decided by the conclusions which follow. God had prohibited all these ancient arts as abominations. Did St. Paul, St. Peter, or the other saints, know what God had done? Did Samuel know that God had prohibited it to Israel, and required them to put out of the land all who practiced it, as abominable to him? And did Samuel, with this knowledge, consent to appear, and assist this vagrant woman in disobeying the command of God? Common sense would say that nothing could be more unlikely to transpire. Dwelling in paradise, in the presence of God and holy beings, that he could be seduced to join in rebellion, so evident and unnecessary, is indeed impossible. In his life he had, from a sense of propriety, declined being consulted by the fallen monarch; could he be prevailed on, from his glorified state, to aid in consummating an act forbidden of God, and rebellion to the laws of his country, in which he had acted as a prophet and magistrate? I believe the answer which must necessarily follow this inquiry will settle the point, that neither does Paul or Peter, or any primitive or more recently departed saint, ever be truly represented in these communications; and though truthful they may be, and by no other means can we detect the fraud, this must most conclusively settle the point that they are lying spirits, though they may be in the mouth of God's prophets. TEACHERS FOR THE WEST.

Ex-Governor Wm. Slade, on behalf of the Board of National Popular Eduaation, has issued a circular, inviting teachers who are disposed to place themselves under the patronage of that Society, to meet at Cleveland, Ohio, on the 28th of March. The eight classes already sent out numbered 199 female teachers. Applicants should communicate at once, by letter, to Miss Linda T. Guilford, of Hudson, Ohio, who will superintend the month's course of preparation, aided by the principal literary gentlemen of Cleveland.

"Each application should state the age, residence, and religious denomination of the applicant; the branches in which she is able to instruct, and the extent of her experience as a teacher; and should be accompanied by testimonials from some reliable source, in regard to her education, capacity to teach, natural peculiarities, and moral and religious character. Among the desired qualifications, sound discretion and decided piety are deemed indispensable.

The course of instruction will be gratuitous, and the Board will pay the expenses of the teachers from Cleveland to the places of their destination. This expense will be refunded should they become able. They are expected to continue teaching two years, should health permit.

It is expected that gratuitous boarding can be obtained for the teachers in Cleveland; but if not, they will not have to pay over $2 per week.

Certificates will be furnished those teachers who come from the East, by which they may pass over the Railroad from Albany to Buffalo, and on the Lake from Buffalo to Cleveland, at half the usual rates of fare. They will stop at Bennett's Temperance House, in Buffalo, and at the Dunham House, in Cleveland, where they will find some one to take charge of them. WM. SLADE,

Cor. Sec. and Gen. Agt. Board of N. P. E.

Cleveland, Ohio, Feb. 7, 1851.

[illegible] pointed [illegible] giving and [illegible] subject. [illegible] asks replies to the questions [illegible] Parliament from Prison keepers, Judges, Statesmen, Clergymen [illegible] others, without reference to sect or p[illegible] to be addressed to him at Boston before the 1st of April, 1851. The following are the questions:—

I. In how many States does Capital Punishment exist by law, and to what crimes is it attached?

II. Has Capital Punishment always formed a part of the Criminal Code of such States; if not, when was it introduced?

III. The number of persons in each of such States who have been executed during each of the THREE last years, and for what crimes?

IV. The NUMBER of capital sentences which have been commuted during the same period, and the nature and duration of the commuted sentence?

V. The MANNER in which capital sentences are carried into effect; the TIME allowed between sentence and execution; the TREATMENT of the criminal during this interval as to intercourse with friends, &c. Whether the execution is public, or in whose presence is it carried into effect, and under what regulations?

VI. In which of the States does Capital Punishment NOT exist by law? Has it ever existed in such States, and if so, when was it abolished?

VII. What in such States are the punishments for those crimes for which Capital Punishment is elsewhere inflicted, especially murder?

VIII. What is the comparative effect, so far as it can be ascertained, of these respective punishments on the highest class of offences?

IX. In the States in which there is NO Capital Punishment, are the punishments for the highest class of crimes elsewhere capitally punished, fully carried out, or are commutations frequent?

Dedication.—The Meeting-House recently built by the Second Seventh-day Baptist Church and Society in Verona, N. Y., was dedicated to the worship of Almighty God on the fifth day of the week, February 6th. The services were attended by a large assembly. The 6th chapter of 2d Chronicles was read by Eld. C. Chester, of Verona. The opening prayer was offered by Eld. J. R. Irish, of DeRuyter. An appropriate discourse was delivered by Eld. Irish, from Malachi 3: 10—"Bring all the tithes into the storehouse," &c. The closing prayer was offered by Eld. Chester. Benediction by Eld. Irish. Meetings were continued several evenings, and a number of the members of the Church were revived, backsliders confessed their wanderings, and some sinners were awakened. Pray for us, that the work of the Lord may increase. A. G. Burdick.

Free Schools in New York.—The Assembly of New York had the several School Bills under discussion most of last week. The proposition for an unconditional repeal of the existing school law was negatived by a strong vote. It is the opinion of those on the ground, and well qualified to judge of the matter, that a clear and decided majority of the country members are in favor of a State tax of at least $800,000, for the support of the schools, which, in conjunction with the public money, will render them virtually free for an average period of seven or eight months during each year. There is now reason to believe that the present Legislature will not adjourn without definitely establishing the noble principle of Universal Education through schools Free to All.

New York State Temperance Convention.—A State Temperance Convention was held at Albany, N. Y., last week. Owing to the very short and imperfect notice, but a small number of delegates attended. An excellent spirit prevailed, however, many interesting speeches were made, and a series of good resolutions adopted. Wednesday evening a public meeting was held in the Assembly Chamber; addresses by Rev. Dr. Wisner of Ithaca, Rev. H. W. Smuller of Kingston, Mr. John Sheny of Sag Harbor, Gen. Riley of Rochester, Dr. Collet of Yorktown, and some others. The following day the Convention continued the discussion of resolutions, and the form of a bill to be urged upon the Legislature through their Committee. The form of law adopted is essentially the same as reported by the Legislative Committee last winter. The principal alteration is, that they ask the Legislature to enact the law themselves, without submitting it to the people for their approval.

Temperance in Connecticut.—The Connecticut State Temperance Convention, recently held, adopted a strong series of resolutions against liquor dealing, and for rigid license laws. A Committee of Nine was chosen from the three different parties to nominate a State ticket for the support of temperance men, who are to assemble at Hartford in March.

The Hudson River is again open, and night steamers are plying regularly between New York and Albany. The Hudson River Railroad Company has also a steamer running from Poughkeepsie to Albany, in connection with the trains from New York. By this arrangement, passengers can leave New York daily at 4 P. M., and arrive at Albany at 12 at night; and, leaving Albany at 10 A. M., can arrive in New York at 6 P. M.

[illegible] New [illegible] An Act [illegible] passed [illegible] and [illegible]

1. Be it enacted by the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey, That no person or persons shall serve or execute, or cause to be served or executed, any writ, [illegible] judgment, or decree (except in criminal cases or for breach of the peace) upon the seventh day of the week, upon any persons who do statedly observe the seventh day of the week as a day of religious devotion or rest; but that the services of every such writ, process, warrant, order, judgment, or decree, shall be null and void, to all intents and purposes whatsoever; and the person or persons so serving or executing the same shall be as liable to the suit of the party grieved, and to answer damages to him for doing thereof, as if he or they had done the same without any writ, process, warrant, order, judgment, or decree.

2. And be it enacted, That the first, second, fourth, fifth, and sixth sections of the Act to which this is a Supplement, shall not extend to and be applied to such person or persons as statedly observe the seventh day of the week as a day of religious devotion or rest; and that so much of the Act to which this is a Supplement as is inconsistent with this Act, be and the same is hereby repealed.

Installing an Archbishop.—The installation of Bishop Blanc as Archbishop of New Orleans, took place in St. Patrick's Cathedral, in that city, on the 16th Feb. About 4,000 persons attended. The New Orleans Crescent says:—

"Bishop Chaunce of Natchez, Bishop Portier of Mobile, Bishop Odin of Galveston, Father Mathew, Father Mullen, and forty priests, were present. After the celebration of High Mass, Bishop Portier, who officiated in full pontificals, invested Bishop Blanc with the "Pallium." Bishop Chaunce then delivered a highly interesting discourse, in which he gave a history of the "Pallium." He stated that it was a sign of communion between the Archbishop and the Holy See of Rome. He then briefly reviewed the state of the Catholic religion throughout the world, and stated that in all countries it was in a flourishing condition. In France, the Catholics enjoy more liberty than under the monarch, being allowed every privilege in regard to schools, &c. In Spain, the difficulties which existed some time since, had all been amicably adjusted. In England, the very throne of Protestantism, there was not a village in which a spire bearing the emblem of Catholicism could not be seen; and in the United States, where twenty-five years ago there were only two bishops, there were now nearly thirty."

Revivals in New Jersey.—A correspondent of the Independent furnishes the following welcome and gratifying intelligence:—

"The Lord is graciously reviving his work in some parts of New Jersey, particularly the eastern and southern. I communicate a few instances among the churches of that branch of Zion to which I belong (Baptist.) At Mount Bethel, Somerset county, early in the winter, the evidences of God's special presence began to be manifested. Evening meetings were largely attended, and soon the sighs of the troubled sinner, and the songs of the newly ransomed, were heard on every hand. The work extended among those of all ages and conditions. More than a hundred have been baptized, and still the interest seems scarcely abated. The church at Middletown, Monmouth county, has not less signally been blessed with the Divine presence. The power of the Spirit has been such as to sweep all before it; and in a village near the sanctuary, I am told that there is but one solitary person left without hope. One hundred and thirty five have been baptized, and the number of inquirers is not less. It is believed that over two hundred have been converted since the commencement of the revival. At Freehold seventeen have just been received by baptism, and at Middletown Point, twenty during the winter. In both churches at Trenton considerable excitement prevails, as also at Salem and Keyport, and many other places in the lower counties. Of late the importance of increased activity among Christians appears to be increasingly realized in all the region round about; and it is earnestly hoped that a general refreshing among the people of God, of every name, is about to be enjoyed in our little, but important State."

Kidnapping and Fugitive Slave Catching in Pennsylvania.—In the Legislature of Pennsylvania, an attempt has been made to repeal certain parts of the anti-kidnapping law of 1847, and a bill for that purpose passed through the Senate in Committee. Meanwhile, the people are speaking out in a different language, and in favor of protecting the fugitive. The citizens of Indiana Co. held a meeting in Greene township lately, Daniel Williams in the chair, and resolved not to obey the Fugitive Slave Law, but rather to suffer its penalties than to assist in delivering up fugitives; also, that the law is unconstitutional and tramples upon human rights; that no man should be supported for Congress who would not pledge himself to go for its repeal; that it is our duty to peril life, liberty, and property in behalf of the fugitive slave to as great an extent as we would peril them in behalf of ourselves; that no slave can possibly be indebted to any human being for anything unless he first receive an equivalent; that every enactment made by the General Government respecting property in man should be repealed; that the American Colonization Society was designed and has been used to promote the interests of slavery; and that the efforts made in Congress to construct a line of steamers to carry out the Colonization scheme are wicked and deceptive.

THE CLAIRVOYANTS AND THE ATLANTIC.

The paragraph we copied last week from [illegible] paper did not give the only account which clairvoyance has furnished of the wreck of the Atlantic. The following, which we copy from the Cleveland Plaindealer, was furnished by a clairvoyant, and may be interesting to those who had friends on board:—

"Four days out from Liverpool the Atlantic encountered a storm which drove her away to the north; on the fifth day she lost her foremast, the gale at the same time shivering all her upper rigging, causing great consternation and confusion on board; on the night of the fifth day she struck upon rocks, and sprang a leak; the hands were soon employed in stuffing the holes with tarred rope and making other repairs. She lay upon the rocks 12 hours, surrounded by ice. By this time many on board had perished with cold and fatigue, and some were carried overboard by the sea. The land was faintly visible from the ship by the aid of the telescope. In the mean time an effort was made to launch two of the small boats, both of which immediately swamped and were lost. Finally, on the 12th, finding the boat about to break and go down, a last effort was made to launch two more small boats, which was successful, and all who remained alive got into them; the mate and eight other persons in the first, and the captain and eleven other persons in the last, the captain being the last one to leave the vessel. Shortly after this she broke and went down, all but her bow, which is still visible. The captain and all in the boat containing the 12 persons perished, their limbs freezing fast in the ice—water having got into the boat. All in the other boat perished but two, the mate and one other man. They reached the land safe, except one being badly frozen. The mate escaped tolerably safe, but the other is not likely to survive. There are a few small huts near where they landed. They are inhabited by Spaniards, and there is a small Spanish town a few miles distant, which has a few small sailing craft in its harbor!"

THE BOSTON FUGITIVE CASE.

A dispatch to the N. Y. Tribune, dated Boston, Feb. 27, says that on the previous day Geo. Lunt, U. S. District Attorney, was arrested by Deputy Sheriff Coburn, upon a writ brought by Alex. P. Burton, of Salem, the colored man arrested in that city a few days since and brought to Boston upon the charge of being an aider and abettor in the rescue of Shadrach, charging that Lunt maliciously, and without any just and probable cause, under oath, made a complaint in writing before Benj. F. Hallett, Esq., one of the Commissioners of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts, against the said plaintiff. Damages are set at $10,000, and Mr. Lunt was required to give bail in that sum, which he did. The case will come before the Court Common Pleas in Salem on the third Monday of March inst. A writ of attachment has also been served by Deputy Sheriff Coburn upon the goods and estate of Geo. F. Curtiss, U. S. Commissioner, and Patrick Riley, Deputy U. S. Marshal, for $10,000 damage. This suit was brought on behalf of Shadrach, the alledged fugitive, alias Frederick Minkins, laborer. The writ charges that defendants did arrest and cause to be arrested, and did then beat and ill treat the said plaintiff. The defendants are held for trial in $10,000 each, to appear at the April term of the Court of Common Pleas. Several other Government and State officers will be arrested shortly. The grounds upon which these suits are brought are, that the Fugitive Slave Law is unconstitutional, and that the officer prosecuted acted without authority.

A writ was issued for the arrest of Capehart, Attorney of Debree, the alledged owner of Shadrach, but he has thus far escaped the officers. Men are employed to find him, and are to be rewarded if they succeed.

An Aged Couple.—Mrs. Nancy Gordon died at Rockaway, N.J., on the 19th of February, aged 90. Had she lived till March 17, she would have seen the seventy-first anniversary of her marraige. During the whole time she and her husband, who still survives her at the age of 92, have lived within sight of Rockaway Church. This aged pair have had nine children, of whom five survive; forty-nine grand children, of whom thirty-three survive; one hundred and three great-grand-children, of whom seventy-four survive; and two great-great-grand-children, both still living, making in number their descendants, living and dead, one hundred and sixty three, of whom one hundred and fourteen still survive.

Harper's Magazine for March is a very good number of that always readable and instructive monthly, as will be seen from the following

General Intelligence.

Proceedings in Congress Last Week.

SECOND-DAY, Feb. 24.

In the SENATE, a large number of petitions for the repeal of the Fugitive Slave Law were presented. A bill was reported allowing a change in the value of the silver dollar and its fractional coins. The Indian Appropriation Bill was passed. The Cheap Postage Bill was taken up, and Mr. Rusk's amendment was adopted in Committee, and ordered to be engrossed. The most material differences between Rusk's Bill and the House Bill are: Rusk's Bill provides three cents when pre-paid, five cents when not pre-paid, on letters less than half an ounce; and for any distance exceeding three thousand miles, double these rates. Instead of a uniform rate of one cent on newspapers, it provides a tariff postage from five cents to twenty-five cents per quarter for weekly papers, according to distances; semi-weeklies to pay double, tri-weeklies triple, and dailies five times these rates. The remainder of the day was spent in talking about the President's Fugitive Slave Message.

The HOUSE spent the whole day on the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill, about two thirds of which was disposed of. When the clause making appropriations for the Philadelphia Mint came up, an amendment was proposed, but pronounced out of order, that if the Corporation of New York shall, on or before the 1st of June, '52, provide buildings suitable for a Mint, and give the same to the United States free of charge, so long as it shall be used for a Mint, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, under the direction of the President, to cause to be removed to said building the office and machinery, and other appurtenances of the Mint at Philadelphia, and all laws for the Government of the Mint at Philadelphia shall be applicable to the Mint at New York.

THIRD-DAY, Feb. 25.

The SENATE, after the reading of petitions, passed four private bills. The Bill to found a Military Asylum for the wounded and disabled soldiers of the United States, was taken up, and after being read and slightly amended, was ordered to be engrossed. The House River and Harbor Bill was reported without amendment. The California Duties Bill was passed, giving the new State $300,000 out of the duties collected while she was a Territory.

In the HOUSE, there was a long talk about Dry Docks, ending in nothing. The Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill was then taken up, and several attempts at tariff amendment made and defeated as out of order. A good deal of unnecessary and personal talk was expended on the bill appropriating three millions one hundred and eighty thousand dollars for the payment of the last installment to Mexico, under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo.

FOURTH-DAY, Feb. 26.

In the SENATE, Mr. Seward presented petitions from citizens of New York, who, considering the Fugitive Slave Law unconstitutional, ask its repeal, or that they be relieved from all obligation to comply with its provisions; tabled. The House Joint Resolution extending pensions to all widows of Revolutionary Soldiers, whether widows at the time the pension laws were passed or not, was debated and passed. The Cheap Postage bill, as amended, passed by a vote of 39 to 15. The bill to found a Military Asylum for disabled soldiers, was passed. That granting the right of way for a telegraph to the Pacific was engrossed. The bill limiting the liabilities of ship owners was passed, as was the Joint Resolution to send a national vessel to bring Kossuth to this country.

In the HOUSE, a debate took place between Messrs. Allen and Ashmun, the former repeating his assertion, that the present Secretary of State, before taking office, asked and received a donation of fifty thousand dollars from certain bankers and commercial gentlemen in New York and Boston. To this Mr. Ashmun opposed a sharp and positive rejoinder, denying and denouncing the charge as shameful, and Mr. Allen as utterly outrageous and inconsistent in bringing it forward. Mr. Allen, however, persisted in the accusation. After this was over, the Mexican Indemnity Bill was passed, and the Army Appropriation bill taken up, but no vote was had on the bill.

FIFTH-DAY, Feb. 27.

In the SENATE, the bill making Bounty Land Warrants assignable, was ordered to be engrossed. Then the bill cutting off Constructive Mileage was refused a hearing. After this the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation bill was discussed, but no vote taken.

The HOUSE, after three hours discussion, passed the bill for the relief of Thomas Ritchie, who claims to have lost money by printing for Congress. The Army Appropriation Bill was passed. The Senate bill, appropriating ten millions of acres of public lands for the relief and support of the Indigent Insane, was discussed a couple of hours, but no vote taken. The Navy Appropriation Bill was taken up, but the House adjourned after a few remarks by Messrs. Meade and Stanton in favor of increasing the mail steamers.

SIXTH-DAY, Feb. 28.

In the SENATE, several petitions for the repeal of the Fugitive Slave Law and the Abolition of Slavery in the District of Columbia, were presented and laid on the table. The bill for the protection of patentees against importations from Canada was ordered to be engrossed. The Naval Pension Bill, with amendments, and the bill limiting liabilities of ship owners, were passed. A joint resolution from the Committee on Military Affairs, directing a sword to be presented to the nearest male relative of Maj. Ringgold, was ordered to be engrossed. The Post Route Bill and the Bill on the Mexican Indemnity, from the House, were referred. The bill for the aid of Louisiana in reclaiming her overflowed lands, gave rise to a debate on the Public Lands, in which Mr. Seward defended the principle of Land Limitation, and that every man who had no land should receive it from the Government. A long discussion ensued on the bill for making grants of Public Lands in California to actual settlers.

In the HOUSE, the Army Appropriation Bill was discussed at length in Committee of the Whole. A motion to su[illegible] rules in order to introduce the [illegible] the Senate in regard to employ[illegible] al vessel for Kossuth, was lo[illegible]

SABBATH-DAY, [illegible]

In the SENATE, a message was received from the President, communicating all the information he possessed concerning the difficulties between the British and Nicaraguan authorities. The bill amending the existing laws regulating the compensation of Congress, by declaring that hereafter no Senator shall receive what is called constructive mileage, was passed. The remainder of the day, and till 10 minutes past 12 o'clock of the night, was spent in talking about the Army Bill, the assignment of Land Warrants, and the River and Harbor Bill. Several amendments to the latter bill were agreed to, but no vote taken on the main question.

In the HOUSE, the Patent Office Report was received, and ordered printed. The Navy Bill was passed after considerable amendments. The numerous steamship projects were killed, except the one for a semi-monthly mail, instead of a monthly, between Panama and San Francisco. The Postage Bill was received from the Senate, with amendments. The Committee on Post Offices proposed modifications to them not affecting the rates, making some additions to the printed matter clause, and providing for the coinage of three cent pieces. The amendments were concurred in. The House adjourned at a quarter past 12 o'clock A.M., Sunday

European News.

One week later news from Europe has been received by the steamship Europa.

The attention of the English public is chiefly occupied in the exciting debate going on in Parliament relative to the Papal aggression question. Four nights continuous debate resulted in gaining for Lord John Russell permission to introduce his bill of pains and penalties, by a majority of 332.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was expected to deliver his budget on the 17th. The trade and revenue, it is said, are even more satisfactory than heretofore reported, and it is expected that many obnoxious taxes will be repealed.

Attention is being daily more and more attracted to the Western Coast of Ireland as a place for a trans-atlantic packet station. The Government are strongly solicited upon the point. Other Irish news is not worth reporting.

A maniac, named Gaul, was brought up at the London Police Office on Friday, charged with threatening to assassinate Lord John Russell.

It is confidently stated, that the Dutchess of Kent, the Queen mother, and the Dutchess of Sutherland, the Queen's lady in waiting, the richest heiress in England, are on the eve of becoming members of the Catholic Church.

The dotation has been lost in the French Assembly by a majority of 102. The breach between Louis Napoleon and the Assembly appears to be every day becoming wider. It is now proposed to organize a national subscription to relieve the President from his embarrassments.

Distressing Accident and Exposure.

From the Miner's (Dubuque) Express.

On Thursday, December 17, 1850, Samuel Brown, a young man, aged 22, left the village of Quasqueton, Buchanan County, Iowa, on horseback, to transact some business at a grove some twelve miles distant—between the Wapsipicon and Cedar rivers. On his return, when about four miles from Quasqueton, while riding over a strip of ice, the horse fell, precipitating Brown on his right side, his foot remaining tight in the stirrup, which was a small one. The horse regained his feet before Mr. Brown recovered himself, and ran off at full speed. To preserve his head from injury, he clapped both his hands about his right thigh, thus in part sustaining his body, whilst his left leg swung immediately behind the horse's heels. Incredible as it may seem, in this horrible position he was dragged three miles. The horse, in the mean time, by repeated kicks, had fractured both bones of his leg, about four inches above the ankle, and bruised the leg, from the knee down, into a perfect jelly. At the end of three miles, the horse becoming fatigued, abated his speed, and by severe efforts, the young man succeeded in extricating his foot from the boot, the latter remaining in the stirrup. He was dropped upon the open prairie, three miles from any house, and a mile and a half from a road, and in such a fractured, bruised and sprained state, that he was entirely unable either to walk or crawl.

In this situation, lying flat upon his back, he remained from Tuesday afternoon, December 17, till Saturday afternoon, December 21, the ground being hard and frozen, and the weather the coldest we have had this Winter, with snow upon the ground, which was increased to five or six inches in depth by the storm on Wednesday, December 18. He took off his overcoat and wrapped it round his broken leg to prevent its freezing, but without success, his left leg being frozen above the knee when he was found, as also his right foot, hands and ears. During the four days and nights, he neither ate nor drank anything except snow, nor closed his eyes in sleep. The small prairie wolves hovered around him at night, but without molesting him, though they approached within a few yards. During the day, he could see teams and men passing on the public road, a mile and a half distant. He exerted himself to the utmost of his strength, to make himself heard by these teamsters, but without bringing any of them to his assistance. It was in this way he was heard on Saturday, by those who were hunting for him, at the distance of two miles, and by this means he was found. His efforts at hallooing had set his lungs to bleeding, and when found he had crimsoned the snow for several feet around him with blood. He was brought back to Quasqueton, and two weeks after the accident, (but not until mortification had taken place,) his friends succeeded, after unsuccessful efforts, in getting a surgeon to amputate the limb. He was still living, at last accounts, but with little hope of recovery.

[illegible] KILL. [illegible] Poughkeep- [illegible] Taylor was [illegible] bodies of [illegible] McDonald, [illegible] Irishmen, who were killed [illegible] of the [illegible] Hyde Park. The particulars of this melancholy accident are as follows: It appears that Mrs. McDonald, who occupied the shanty where they were killed, was taken ill this morning, and the two other females named above had called in and were near her bed ministering to her wants. At half past 8 o'clock a blast was discharged on the line of the railroad, a short distance from the shanty, and a huge mass of rock, weighing about 1,000 pounds, was thrown into the air, which descended directly upon the roof of the building, and was seen by the men at work to penetrate it. They immediately repaired to the shanty, and upon entering it beheld the mangled and lifeless bodies of two of the females, and the third prostrated and bleeding, but not quite dead, although she lived but a few unconscious moments afterward. The women were all of them married. One was 40 years of age, and leaves five children. Mrs. McDonald was 26 years old, and leaves two children, one of them a mere infant. The third victim was 24 years old, and had been married about a year.

DEATH BY HYDROPHOBIA.—Mr. Austin Hutchinson, of Lebanon, died of hydrophobia last Wednesday morning, says the Wilmantic (Conn.) Medium. A dog, afterwards killed for madness, came up to him one day last September, when Mr. H. was some two miles away from home, at work. The dog appearing to be lost, Mr. H. took compassion on him, and caressed and encouraged him. The animal in return licked the man's hand, which, happening to have an open sore at the time, it is supposed imbibed the virus of the dog's malignant distemper, and produced his death. He put a cord round the dog's neck, and took him home with him and tied him up; but the animal bit the cord in two and ran away. He was killed a day or two after. Mr. Hutchinson never would believe that the dog was mad until he experienced the symptoms of the disease himself. He was taken on the Saturday night previous with the first symptoms of his dreadful malady; a physician, we understood, first called on him on Monday, and in two days he was dead. The regular spasms were of about 20 minutes' duration, and the intervals were of about equal length.

ANCIENT RELICS.—The Pittsburgh Dispatch, of Feb. 24th, gives the following account of an interesting discovery near the Allegheny River:—

For some days workmen have been busily engaged in digging a saw-pit for a new saw-mill about to be erected by Samuel M. Wickersham, Esq., near the site of one burned a year ago near the Allegheny River, between Marbury and Stanwix. In excavating, the laborers struck upon what was supposed to have been an ancient grave, enclosed within a very irregular wall of stone and brick, which contained a number of bones, three large clasp knives, (only one of which was closed,) a very handsomely finished ivory-handled table-knife, with a curved blade and handle, two spades of ancient fashion in a good state of preservation—one still fit for use, a bayonet, a boat-hook, an old-fashioned bill-hook, two wagon-boxes, a mule shoe, a portion of a musket barrel, three English pennies and a half-penny, (on heating one of the pennies the date of 1731 was visible, the others were entirely disfigured,) with the remains of a camp kettle, and fragments of sundry other articles.

LEGISLATION IN IOWA.—The Legislature of Iowa adjourned on the 5th Feb. Among the acts passed are two important ones—the first relates to interest on money, parties being left free to contract for such rates as they may see proper, the law interfering only so far as to compel the fulfillment of the contract, whatever it may be; and the second, the abolition of capital punishment. Another act was passed prohibiting the immigration of negroes into that State. Upon entering the State, they are required to leave after receiving three days' notice of the law, and are subjected to certain penalties if they remain.

HOME FOR THE ADULT BLIND IN PENNSYLVANIA.—A movement has been made by the Managers of the Pennsylvania Institution for the Blind, for the establishment of a Home, to be connected with the Institution, as a retreat for the adult Blind. The subject was referred to a Committee, who, after frequent consultations, made a highly favorable report. It is estimated that $100,000 will erect the buildings, and, including the work of the inmates, together with bequests from the benevolent, will provide for the support of the establishment forever; fifty thousand dollars will be sufficient to commence operations at the present time.

SUMMARY.

Messrs. Stanley and Inge, members of Congress, fought a duel on the 24th of February, somewhere beyond the District line. After an exchange of shots, through the interference of seconds, mutual explanations were entered into, and the parties became reconciled and returned to the city. Stanley was attended by his colleague William S. Ashe, and William Cost Johnson, Maryland; Inge by Cov. Brown and Jefferson Davis, of Miss.

The Angelica Era, of the 10th, says that "the first locomotive passed over the Erie Railroad, between Hornellsville and Cuba, on Wednesday last. The occasion was one of general rejoicing along the entire line. Our Friendship neighbors manifested their joy by burning a little gunpowder, and the thunders of their cannon were distinctly heard here."

News has arrived from the Cape of Good Hope, that another Caffir war has broken out. The Governor, Sir Harry Smith, had gone into the interior, and was with 1,000 men hemmed in at Fort Cox. He was obliged to fight his way out, disguised as a soldier, with 250 mounted Cape Riflemen, without any loss on his side. The Caffirs suffered severely. They were coming down upon him in thousands. Sir Harry Smith has issued a Proclamation, declaring a War of Extermination.

In relation to the low fares which have been adopted by the Railroads between Albany and Buffalo, the Albany Argus says:—"We are credibly informed that the directors do not intend to stop here, but if it is found that under the present rates there should be a sufficient increase of travel to warrant it, a still farther reduction will be made."

At St. Paul, Minnesota, but a few days ago a wilderness, it is in contemplation to erect during the coming season a large hotel, in the style of the best eastern hotels—120 feet by 90, and four stories high; a Catholic Cathedral, and an Episcopal Seminary building; and a large brick storehouse by Mr. Fuller, near the upper landing; a Court-House, and numerous private dwellings and business houses.

The Albany and Northern Railroad Company has been organized. The object of the corporation is to construct a railroad from Albany through West Troy, Cohoes, Waterford, Schaghticoke, to Eagle Bridge in Washington County, there to connect with the Washington and Rutland Railroad, thus forming a continuous line of railway from Albany to Montreal and Ogdensburgh.

Mr. P T. Barnum has presented Father Matthew with $500, accompanied by an eloquent letter, in which the services of the worthy Apostle of Temperance are warmly appreciated. This generous gift will relieve Father Mathew from the immediate pressure of embarrassing circumstances. Both the donor and Father Mathew are now at New Orleans.

On Sunday, Feb. 23d, a ferry-boat, at St. Louis, burst her larboard boiler, wrecking the fore part of her cabin. Mangled bodies and dead horses were strewn around. Fifteen persons were killed, and as many have been severely scalded or are missing.

The following advertisement lately appeared in a Montreal paper: The person who, by a pardonable absence of mind, took a new light-colored silk velvet trimmed Macintosh from the second flat of the Ottawa Hotel, is informed that by calling at the same place he can have a very good cape, which belongs to the coat, and is now of no use to the owner.

Five banks were incorporated in Rhode Island at the late session of the Legislature—the Bank of South County, capital, $100,000; Bank of Commerce in Providence, $200,000; Bank of America, $100,000; Railroad Bank, $50,000, and Citizen's Bank of Woonsocket, $100,000.

The Cincinnati Enquirer says that the lioness of Raymond & Co.'s menagerie on the 16th of January gave birth to three whelps. This royal progeny has been taken from her majesty and given in charge to a bull dog slut, who acts as wet nurse, and is to have charge of their education.

A boy three years of age, a son of Mr. Inman, of Uxbridge, Mass., shot himself recently with a pistol. His mother let him have it to play with, and raised the hammer for him, when he pulled the trigger, the charge entering his stomach, causing almost instant death while in his mother's lap. She did not know it was loaded.

We learn from the Coudersport (Potter Co., Pa.) Union, that John Jordon, Esq., "one of the first settlers on the far-famed Sinnemahong," killed an elk a week or two ago, "weighing some six hundred pounds, and about seven years old; his horns were four feet two inches long, and five prongs on each horn."

Mr. S. A. Clemens, the inventor of the new cotton-press which received the award of the gold medal, at the late Mechanic's Fair, in Boston, has invented a machine for dressing flax, which will dress, from the rude material, one ton of flax per day, leaving it clean and ready for market.

The Postmaster General has addressed a letter to the British Government, expressing appreciation for their liberality in sending over the Atlantic's mails. He politely adds, that in the event of a similar accident happening to an English ship he should deem it a duty to pursue a like liberal course.

Among the persons arrested and held to bail in Boston, on the charge of aiding in the fugitive slave rescue, is a colored man named Lewis Hayden, who escaped from Kentucky by the aid of Fairbank and Delia Webster. His friends afterward raised $700, the price asked for him, and he is now free. He presided at one of the first colored meetings after the passage of the Fugitive Slave Law. It is said that he is the colored man who tapped Shadrach on the shoulder in the court room, and said, "We will stand by you to the death." Also, that he harbored him in his house, and procured the cab in which he was finally driven away.

During the last week, three vessels arrived at New York from China, making remarkably short passages. The Natchez, Capt. Duryee, from Hong-Kong, in 102 days; the Zone, Capt. Baxter, from Shanghai, in 105 days, and the Nestorian, Capt. Bliss, from Shanghai, in 104 days. The latter vessel brought 1,400 tons of teas, besides other valuables. She made the run from the line inside of eighteen days. The average length of a voyage from China but a few years since, was from five to six months.

A letter from the Chief of Police at Bahia, Brazil, to the U. S. Consul at that place, says that "all commanders, masters, and mates, who may bring to this port liberated slaves, not Brazilian born, subject themselves to a penalty of 100 milrees for every person so brought, and also to the expenses of their reëxportation, as directed by the 8th article of said law, and which I intend for the future to have rigorously enforced."

The Utica Daily Gazette says: The tools by which the Otsego County Bank was entered have been found about two miles from Cooperstown, on the turnpike. They were thrown into the lots on both sides of the road. They consisted of three jimmies, a set of bits varying from three inches down, pick-lock, a claw crowbar, a powder flask, with powder, and a dark lantern.

In Alfred, N. Y., Feb. 25, by Eld. N. V. Hull, Mr. DAVID ROSE to Miss ROXANA COON, all of Alfred.

DIED,

In Petersburg, Rensselaer Co., N. Y., Oct. 24th, 1850, LOUISA, daughter of William and Lucy Hall, and a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Petersburg, in the 23d year of her age. This sister, like her father, fell asleep in full Christian confidence. Hers was a death-bed earnestly to be desired by all the living. The monster Death, so dreadful to others, was to her a welcome messenger of relief from the sorrows and ills of this pilgrimage state. When it became certain that her end was approaching, she first made her arrangements for departure as though about to take a long and pleasant journey; then, observing her mother and sisters in tears, with a smile resting upon her face, she said, "O weep not for me; all is well." Jesus seemed to say to her, "I am he that liveth and was dead, and behold I am alive for ever more, and have the keys of hell and death; because I live, ye shall live also."

In Verona, N. Y., February 18th, of consumption, MELVINA, wife of Joseph L. Perry, aged 41 years. Sister Perry embraced religion in early life, and united with the first Seventh-day Baptist Church in Verona, of which she remained a worthy member until her death. In her sickness, which was protracted, and very distressing, she gave evidence of the power of grace in the soul; and when informed that she was dying, she blessed God that her departure was so near at hand. She manifested a deep anxiety for her unconverted friends, and warned them of their danger, and invited them to come to Christ, and finally yielded her spirit to God in the triumphs of faith. C. C.

In New York City, Feb. 21st, of hooping cough and lung fever, JANE E., daughter of John H. and Sarah E. Chester, aged 5 years, 9 months, and 18 days. Although young, she was supported by that religion which she had been taught. Her sickness, which was protracted and painful, she bore with patience and submission. She seemed impressed with a sense of the solemnity of death, and conversed freely on the subject; and when asked if she was willing to die, her reply was, Yes—

I am going to the happy land,
Far, far away,
Where saints in glory shine
Bright, bright as day.

She cheerfully resigned her spirit to her Saviour, who hath said, "Suffer little children to come unto me." J. H. C.

Agents Wanted,

FOR THE "BEST JUVENILE MAGAZINE IN AMERICA."

WOODWORTH'S YOUTH'S CABINET, elegantly illustrated, and filled with the choicest gems for the young, has recently entered upon a new volume. It is more attractive and popular than ever. "It is a little world within itself," to use the language of a metropolitan newspaper; and the price is only $1 a year.

Now is the time for Agents. The publisher wishes to employ fifty or more gentlemen, in different parts of the Union—North, South, East, and West—to act as Agents for the work. Their business will be to travel and to obtain subscribers. There is no periodical, of whatever character, which commands so ready and so general favor as Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet. It is a universal favorite. Those who devote their time wholly or mainly to the interests of this publication, will receive a compensation which cannot fail to be satisfactory.

Persons desiring an agency will please address the publisher (post-paid) with responsible testimonials as to character and ability. No time should be lost, as now is the best time to subscribe. Every particular respecting the agency will be immediately forwarded on application. Specimens of the work sent gratis.

D. A. WOODWORTH, 118 Nassau-st., N. Y.

In Preparation—Valuable New Works.

NATIONAL SERIES OF AMERICAN HISTORIES.—GOULD & LINCOLN have in course of preparation a series of Histories of the most interesting and important events which have occurred in the United States since the first settlement of the country. They will embrace the trials and adventures of the early colonists, both at the North and the South, their peculiarities of character and manners, their intercourse and conflicts with the natives, the gradual development of their institutions, sketches of their prominent men in both the Church and the State, incidents in the Revolution, with various other subjects of interest of more recent date. It is intended to be a NATIONAL SERIES OF AMERICAN HISTORY, adapted to the popular mind, and especially to the youth of our country, illustrated with numerous fine engravings; each volume to be complete in itself; yet, when all are published, to form a regular consecutive series, consisting of twelve or more volumes, 18mo, of about 300 pages each.

Cyclopedia of Anecdotes of Literature and the Fine Arts. ALSO,

CYCLOPEDIA OF SCIENTIFIC ANECDOTES.

The First, containing a copious and choice selection of Anecdotes on the various forms of Literature, of the Arts, of Architecture, Engravings, Music, Poetry, Painting, and Sculpture, and of the most celebrated Literary Characters and Artists of different countries and ages.

The Second, containing a similar selection respecting the various Sciences and Mechanical Arts, of their most distinguished votaries. The two together, embracing the larger portion of the best Anecdotes in Ancient and Modern collections, as well as in various Histories, Biographies, and Files of Periodical Literature.

The whole classified under appropriate subjects, alphabetically arranged, and each supplied with a very full and particular index of topics and names, by author of "Cyclopedia of Moral and Religious Anecdotes;" the whole to be comprised in Sixteen Numbers, at 25 cents per Number, making two large 8vo volumes of about 700 pages each, illustrated with numerous fine engravings. The first number will be issued about the first of April, to be continued semi-monthly until completed.

KAZLITT ARVINE, A. M.,

Daguerrean Gallery.

GURNEY'S Daguerrean Gallery, No. 189 Broadway, has been known for years as one of the first establishments of the kind in the United States, and the oldest in the city of New York. He has recently greatly enlarged his Gallery by the addition of more rooms and large skylights, and other improvements, rendering it one of the most extensive establishments in this country. Mr. G. attends personally to his sitters, and from his great experience in the art he is enabled, at all times, to give perfect satisfaction. The large-sized pictures recently taken by his new process are universally acknowledged superior to any heretofore taken in this country. A large collection can be seen at all hours of the day. Ladies and gentlemen are respectfully invited to examine them.

New York and Boston Steamboats.

REGULAR MAIL LINE BETWEEN NEW YORK AND BOSTON, via Stonington and Providence. Inland route, without ferry, change of cars or baggage! The steamers C. VANDERBILT, Capt. Joel Stone, and COMMODORE, Capt. William H. Frazee, in connection with the Stonington and Providence, and Boston and Providence Railroads, leaving New York daily, (Sundays excepted,) from pier 2 North River, first wharf above Battery Place, at 5 o'clock P. M., and Stonington at 8 o'clock P. M., or upon the arrival of the mail train from Boston. The C. Vanderbilt will leave New York Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday. Leave Stonington Monday, Wednesday, and Friday. The Commodore will leave New York Monday, Wednesday, and Friday. Leave Stonington Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday.

Christian Psalmody—Pocket Edition.

IN compliance with requests from various quarters, the publisher of the New Hymn Book—Christian Psalmody—has issued a second edition, on lighter paper and with smaller margins, by which the bulk and weight of the books are reduced about one-third, rendering them much more convenient for carrying in the pocket. The price is also reduced 12½ cents per copy. Those wishing books, of either edition, can now be supplied. Price of the larger edition from 75 cents to $1 50, according to the style of binding. Price of the smaller edition from 62½ cents to $1 00. Orders should be addressed to Geo. B. Utter, No. 9 Spruce-st., New York.

Methodist Quarterly Review.

THIS Review contains 160 pages Octavo, printed on fine paper. At the subscription price of TWO DOLLARS a year, in advance, it is the cheapest Quarterly Journal now issued. The publishers issue it at this low price, in expectation of greatly enlarging its list of subscribers, which, though by no means what it ought to be, is yet, as it is believed, twice as large as that of any similar Journal.

While the theology of the Methodist Episcopal Church is the standard for the Review, its tone is large and liberal, and its range of topics, not only in Biblical but General Literature, is extensive, as its Table of Contents will show. Its contributors are among the ablest writers in this country, of various religious denominations.

From its wide circulation, the Quarterly affords a most desirable medium of Literary Advertising. All advertisements, and books for notice, should be sent to the Editor, Rev. J. M'Clintock, D. D., 200 Mulberry-st.

Miscellaneous.

Affecting Story of a Shipwreck.

Early on Saturday morning, Jan. 11, the brig New Commercial, of Whitby, 250 tuns burden, Sanderson, master, bound from Livespool to the Spanish main, in a thick fog and strong gale from SSW., struck upon a ledge of rocks between the Great and Little Brisson—two high rocks rising between sixty and seventy feet above high water mark, about one mile off the bluff headland of Cape Cornwall, and four miles northwards from the Land's End. The sea running very high, the vessel immediately went to pieces, and the crew, nine men, with one woman, the wife of the master, got on the ledge. They were discovered from the shore as soon as day broke, but no assistance could then be possibly rendered them.

In this perilous condition the poor creatures remained until about 9 o'clock, when they were all washed off together by one tremendous wave, and hurled into the boiling deep. Seven out of the ten sank at once into a watery grave.

Of the remaining three—one, a mulatto, contrived to get on a portion of the floating wreck, and after having been beaten about for some hours in imminent peril of being every instant swallowed up by the breakers, managed, with remarkable coolness, and presence of mind, by means of a plank which he used as a paddle, and a piece of canvas which served him for a sail, with the assistance of the strong tides, to keep clear of the broken waters.

While this poor fellow was thus struggling for life, amid the anxious expectations of the people who witnessed his attempt from the shore, whose lofty cliffs were now crowded by 2,000 spectators, five fishermen, belonging to Sennen, a small fishing cove close to the Land's End, determined, with that bold and resolute spirit for which these men are distinguished, to launch their boat through the breakers, in which they happily succeeded, and eventually, after encountering great risk, they rescued the poor mulatto from his perilous situation.

The other two, the master and his wife, when they were carried off the ledge, were washed upon the Little Brisson Rock, which rises in a peaked head, and is the resort of numerous sea-fowl. The master first gained a footing upon the rock, and upon looking around him, saw his wife struggling in the waves, but sufficiently near to enable him to stretch out his hand and pull her in. While the Sennen fishermen were occupied in rescuing the mulatto, Her Majesty's revenue cutter Sylvia, commanded by Mr. Forward, was seen gallantly working round the Land's End, having been ordered to the spot by Captain Davies, R. N., the late, and still acting inspecting commander of the coast guard of this district. Capt. Davies himself, and several of the officers, took up their stations upon the lofty promontory of Cape Cornwall, overlooking the Brissons. On reaching the point, Mr. Forward launched his boat, and attempted, with a crew of four men, to get near the rock, but the attempt was fruitless, and it was only with great difficulty that he regained the cutter, to the great relief of Capt. Davies, and the numerous spectators on the cliffs, who rejoiced to perceive that, though success did not attend his daring exploit, still he himself and his gallant crew, at least, were safe. It was now growing late, and nothing more could be attempted in the way of rescue for the day, so Mr. Forward hoisted his colors and hove to his craft, to encourage the poor sufferers, who were now to be left to spend the wretched night without food or shelter, exposed to the wind and rain, upon this desolate rock, amid the wide waste of waters, and to assure them that they had still a friend who would stand by and not forsake them.

On Sunday morning the wind happily drove a little to the south-east, which caused the sea to abate; all hands were immediately on the alert. At 1 o'clock four boats were seen approaching from the Sennen Cove—three manned by fishermen, and one by the coast guard; at the same time Capt. Davies arrived, having embarked in a preventive boat at a small cove named Pendeen, about three miles north-east of the spot, with four preventive men and one miner, taking rockets with him. The cutter's boat also was manned by Mr. Forward—so that six boats were quickly on the spot. By this time the scene had become one of the most exciting description, and the crowds of people on the cliffs could not have numbered less than 5,000 or 6,000; and as each boat arrived at the spot, the cheers of this vast multitude, awakening all the echoes of this cavernous coast, added not a little to the excitement.

The sea ran so high that no boat could venture within 100 yards of the rock. The rockets which Captain Davies had taken with him in the preventive boat had never been tried here before, even from the shore, and we believe never elsewhere from a boat.

After making his arrangements, he with his own hand discharged the rocket. He was enveloped for an instant in a sheet of flame, from the back fire. Happily, however, he sustained no injury, but unfortunately the line which reached the rock fell upon a sharp ledge, which cut the rope so that the end of it slipped off into the sea.

It is impossible to describe the disappointment experienced by the people upon the cliffs and in the boats, at this unfavorable result of such a daring experiment.

After a short delay, however, another rocket was prepared, which Captain Davis again himself discharged, and this time the cord fell on the rock close by the man, to the great joy and delight of the assembled multitude.

At this critical moment the sun shone forth with unusual brilliancy. The man on the rock was seen to fasten the line round the waist of his wife, and to encourage her to take the fearful leap, while she lingered to jump into the foaming waters. After some little time, however, his persuasions prevailed. They took an affecting leave of each other, and, amid the breathless expectation of all, she made the awful plunge for life or death, from a hight of about twelve feet. At this moment three immense waves broke in rapid succession, periling the safety of all. For a time, indeed, the boats were entirely hidden from the view of the spectators, and the loud cry broke forth from thousands of voices, "They are gone!" But soon the boats were seen above the swelling waves, and the lofty cliffs once more rang with approving cheers. The cord was drawn with great judgment, and after about three minutes the poor woman was taken into one of the boats; but the blows from the waves were more than her exhausted frame could bear. No attention that could be shown her was spared. The men took off their own clothes to cover her, and used every effort to restore her. She breathed, but by the time the boat reached the cove life had fled. After the master had persuaded his wife to leave him, he fastened the cord round his own waist, and was drawn, greatly exhausted, into one of the other boats. [European Times.

Visit to Pitcairn's Island.

William B. Drew, of the ship Lebanon, writes from San Francisco to the Boston Journal as follows:—

On my passage from New-York to this place (Nov.18, 1850) when two degrees west of the island of Massafuero, I was boarded by Captain Arthur, of ship Zenas Coffin, of Nantucket, whaler, who, a short time previous, had landed and spent considerable time with the interesting people of Pitcairn's Island, and who said that he could scarcely find words to express to me the pleasure which he derived from his visit, the islanders were so entirely different from all others which he had visited in this ocean. They were fine looking, with Saxon features, well dressed, all spoke good English, were religious, orderly, virtuous, contented and happy, and kind and hospitable in the highest degree—furnishing him with water, sweet potatoes, vegetables, fruits, and every thing which the island afforded, putting them on board the ship themselves, and hardly permitting Capt. Arthur or his ship's company to do any thing; in short, showing him every attention which was possible, so eager were they to prolong his visit, and to make it pleasant and agreeable. The number of persons on the island was one hundred and sixty, a large proportion of children among them. They were gratified and delighted with his visit, and he left them with regret, and represents the island as almost a Paradise; he stated that vegetables and fruits of almost every description were abundant, but that live stock was scarce, and ships calling there could not procure the latter.

When Capt. Beachy was there, in 1831, there were 65 persons on the island; the last account which I have seen from them gave the number 79; now it appears there are one hundred and sixty.

Capt. Arthur also stated that one of the principal men told him that for many years vermin of any description, as well weeds in the soil, were unknown, but that both had been introduced by ships calling at the island, the seeds of the latter probably being mixed with other seeds which have been given to them. Captain Arthur also states that the islanders had agreed to furnish an American ship which touched there with 1,000 bushels of sweet potatoes for California, in the Spring. So it appears that they must cultivate that article to a considerable extent.

A Genuine Bandit.

In a report lately prepared by the Chief of the Engineering Department in Corsica, some curious facts are detailed relative to the state of society in that part of the French Republic. About three leagues to the north-east of Calvi, and on the sea coast, is the fortified town called Ile-Rousse, with a population of about 1,000 inhabitants. The district for about 30 miles round is marshy, or covered in part with jungle, and difficult of access. For the last 18 months this district has been ruled despotically by a bandit, named Mazoni, and whose sway is submitted to by the natives. The vindictive character of the Corsicans, and their transmitting from father to son, for many generations, the memory of past wrongs and hatreds—the vendette—of families, are well known.

Driven to the career of an outlaw by some act of savage vengeance, Mazoni set up his flag in the center of the district; and even in the town of Ile-Rouse, no one dreams of disobeying or eluding his decrees. He is at the head of a band of 25 devoted followers, all outlaws like himself. He has organized a regular government, and levies a sort of black-mail on the surrounding districts, which no one refuses, and the regular payment of which enables him to live in much state, and gives him the means of protecting the lives and properties of his subjects from the encroachments of rival brigands. So actively has Mazoni exercised his authority that he is now in his 27th murder. None of the inhabitants will dare to accept employment from the Government agents without his written permission, and any one who does so is sure to suffer the penalty of his disobedience.

The last murder was committed with his own hand, though he was alone, and his victim was accompanied by five or six persons. In his communications with the agents of the Government, he affects a style of perfect equality; his dispatches are drawn up in due form, in regular diplomatic style, and he always signs, "Mazoni, Bandit." One of his latest communications to the principal engineer has been transmitted to the Government with his usual signature. This dispatch gives some information concerning a person in the employment of the engineers, who had entered on his engagement without his license. He informs the authorities that the person in question is a man of bad character, who had attempted to dishonor a family under his protection, and he advises his instant dismissal and removal from the district, "to spare him," he adds, "the inconvenience of punishing him with his own hand." As Mazoni appears to be extending the circuit of his domination, a detachment of troops has been ordered from the town to hunt him from his retreat, and so well are the measures taken to destroy the nuisance that we may, probably, soon hear of his capture. The details given in the dispatch just received by the Government, are very curious.

At St. Bartholomew's Hospital, London, nearly 2,000 pounds weight of castor oil, 200 gallons of spirits of wine at 17s. a gallon, 12 tuns of linseed meal, 1,000 pounds weight of senna, and 27 cwt. of salts, are used every year. The grand total spent upon physic in a twelvemonth is £2,600. 5,000 yards of calico are wanted for rollers for bandaging; to say nothing of the stouter and stiffer fabric used for plasters. More than a hundred weight of sarsaparilla is used every week. In a year 29,700 leeches were bought for the use of the establishment.

A Powerful Microscope.

B. Hasert, Optical and Astronomical [illegible] ment maker in Cincinnati, (Ohio,) [illegible] completed a compound microscope, which he designs exhibiting, in person, at the World's Fair. The manufacturer claims that the magnifying power surpasses that of any [illegible] instrument ever made in this or any [illegible] country; its highest capacity being to magnify any object to six thousand diameters, which makes a superficial surface of thirty-six millions. We examined some minute particles of dust, or secondary scales, from the wing of a butterfly. These have been seen with microscopes—the lines running parallel with the sides of the dust particles, both longitudinally, downwards, and transversely. This is all that has hitherto been observed. This microscope, however, shows that on these longitudinal lines of the dust of the butterfly, and between them, there are arranged a number of little scales, similar to the scales of a fish. Between each pair of lines are seen from five or six rows of these little scales. For instance, a dust particle from the back of the body of a sphinx, measuring the one fifth of an inch in length, and two hundredths in breadth, discovers one hundred and four longitudinal lines. The number of scales between each pair of lines in width, is six, making the number of scales six hundred and twenty-four over the whole width, and the number of scales longitudinally and downwards, twenty-two hundred; which makes the entire number of scales on the dust particle equal to fourteen thousand millions to one square inch.

On another very minute particle from the wing of a tenia, measuring only one five hundredths of an inch in length, and one thousandth of an inch in breadth, the number of scales is found to be eighty-four thousand, which will reach the number of forty-two thousand millions to the square inch.

A very interesting examination was also made of a minute particle of human blood, which exhibits the fact that the blood is composed of minute globules, which roll through the veins like shot or quicksilver. An examination of a drop of stagnant water disclosed numberless animalcules, which dart about with wonderful rapidity. An examination of the common flea shows a striking resemblance to the elephant in its conformation. Many other observations of an equally interesting character were made, which we have not the space to record. [Cincinnati Gazette.

Driesbach and his Tiger on a Steamboat.

On Wednesday last, Herr Driesbach, the celebrated tamer of wild beasts, received at Zanesville a telegraphic dispatch to come to Cincinnati and bring with him his pet, the great Brazilian tiger, one of the most ferocious animals ever tamed. Herr accordingly took a double berth on the steamer "Julia Dean," putting down the names on the clerk's book, "Herr Driesbach" first berth, "Col. Alexander" (the name given the tiger) second berth. Herr remarked that the Colonel was a queer old fellow, accustomed to sleeping out, and had withal a peculiar fancy—he would sleep on nothing but straw. The chambermaid took away the bed, and replaced it with a full supply of that article. Business and preparation went on. Just before the last bell, Herr and the tiger made their appearance in the cabin opposite the state room door. The clerk, hearing an unusual stir in the cabin, spied the glaring eyes and savage body of his Royal Majesty. He recognized Herr Driesbach, but did not relish the appearance of Col. Alexander. Still, he did not feel like ordering the party ashore. He felt a repugnance to that undertaking, and concluded to allow things to take their wonted course. Herr unlocked his state-room door, and His Majesty, at a bound, was on his straw bed.

After a little time spent in arranging the state-room, Herr satisfied the clerk and others that his pet was entirely under his command, and intimated to the bar keeper that a bottle of brandy would be relished by His Royal Highness, (or himself,) which was brought into the state-room by the trembling waiter, who had forgotten to bring with the liquor the requisite accompaniment—pure water. As a punishment, Herr told the tiger to take "the corner," which he did, and stepping quickly out, locked the astonished boatman in, while he went for the water. The man was so frightened that he spoke not, neither did he move, till Herr returned, and stated to him that he need have no fears, as the tiger would keep his place till he ordered him to rise. When night came, Driesbach locked his state-room, bid His Majesty good night, and went to bed in the upper berth, and the happy couple had a good and peaceful night's rest. On arriving at our wharf, Col. Alexander showed his approbation of the boat by giving two or three growls, interpreted as approbatory by Herr, and the party sought a hack, which, when found, happened to be driven by a son of the Emerald Isle.

At the first sight, the driver utterly refused to take the baste, but was perfectly willing that Driesbach should be accommodated. His fears were allayed, however, by the tiger jumping inside, and he drove to the Dennisson House; but Dennisson resolutely refused to allow His Royal Majesty to take rooms at his hotel, and Driesbach was obliged to take rooms for his friend at Wood's Museum, while he retured to Dennisson's, the nearest and best place he could find. We presume that such an instance of travel has never before been recorded. [Cin. Com.

An Alarm at Sea.—The captain of one of our down-east schooners found himself one day becalmed in a fog off Isle of Shoals, near Portsmouth, N. H. The vessel lay with a slight motion, when the captain, with a quick ear, discovered by the cracking sound of cordage, that there was another vessel near him, which would probably get afoul in short order. He had neither gun or trumpet, to give his neighbors warning of their close approach; the best thing he could think of was to set his men drumming on some empty casks; but it was to no purpose, as the sound increased, and the vessel was nearing him. As a last effort of ingenuity, he seized a handspike, and applying it to the ear of an old grunter that happened to be on board, gave it several turns, none of the easiest, which called forth a squeal almost as loud as the pig whistle of our locomotive engines. This signal was effectual, and just before coming in sight of his neighbor craft bow on, he heard the captain exclaim to the man at the helm, in a voice of thunder, "Starboard your helm, we are close upon a hog yard!"

Morose and sullen he seated himself without a word; he could not look upon them. The mother said to the angel by her side, 'Come, my child, it is time to go to bed,' and the babe, as was her wont, knelt by her mother's lap, and gazing wistfully into the face of her suffering parent like a piece of chiselled statuary, slowly repeated her nightly orison; and when she had finished, said to her mother:

'Dear ma, may I not offer up one prayer?'

'Yes, yes, my sweet pet, pray!'

And she lifted up her tiny hands, closed her eyes and prayed:

'Oh God, oh spare my dear papa!'

That prayer was wafted up with electric rapidity to the throne of God. It was heard—it was heard on earth. The responsive 'amen' burst from the father's lips, and his heart of stone became a heart of flesh. Wife and child were both clasped to his bosom, and in penitence he said: 'My child, you have saved your father from a drunkard's grave. I will sign the pledge.''

Complaint under the Anti-Flogging Act.—The Boston Traveller contains an account of the examination of Charles Lincoln, master of brig Nautilus, on charge of flogging John Ternan, one of the crew, on the passage from Palmero for Boston. This is the first case that has arisen under the act of Sept. 28, 1850, abolishing flogging in vessels of commerce. The charge against the captain was, that he administered, by the mate, twelve lahses to the complainant, and kept him five days in irons, because he refused to obey an order to go aloft. It was contended that this punishment was excessive and unjustifiable, and came within the statute. For defense, it was argued that the punishment was of the usual kind and not excessive, and further that the captain was ignorant at the time of the passage of the law forbidding flogging. It appeared that the plea of ignorance could not avail the captain, as he sailed from this country in November, two months after the law was passed. The commissioner held that the flogging was clearly illegal, and he must send the case up for tral. Captain Lincoln gave bail in $50 to appear. For the keeping of the man in irons for five days, the Commissioner said the Captain, under the circumstances, was not amenable to the law.

Taken at his Word.—In Oct. 1849, Lord B—, belonging to one of the richest families of England, took a hackney coach at London for a place three miles distant on the Thames, which serves as a steamboat landing. Arrived there, he got out, telling the coachman to wait, and went on board a steamer for Cowes to see if his baggage had been brought on board according to orders. By accident he had mistaken the hour, and was no sooner on board than the boat put off, before he could return to pay the coachman. The latter, knowing his customer, determined to wait, hired the place where he had been left, put up a shelter for his horses and himself, and staid there several months. Lord B— came back last October, having forgotten the whole affair, but has just had to pay £700, at the end of a lawsuit, for the services of the coachman during the period.

Madagascar Birds' Eggs.—Some time since the discovery of gigantic eggs in Madagascar was spoken of. Three of these eggs have arrived at Paris, one broken on the route, the others whole, and M. Geoffrey Saint Hilaire has laid them before the Academy of Sciences. They are of very different shapes, one being elliptical, the other having its two ends unlike each other. They are about thirteen inches in diameter the long way, and nine the short; in circumference about thirty inches one way and twenty-five the other. The shell is one-eighth of an inch thick, and contains about 7½ gallons, or as much as 135 hen's eggs, 15½ conder's eggs, and 5⅛ ostrich's eggs. Mr. St. Hilaire has decided, from the examination of some bones found with one of the eggs, that they were produced by a bird. It now remains to discover this biggest of the feathered race.

Microscopic View of the Exterior of an Oyster Shell.—If examined by the microscope, the exterior of an oyster shell will be found a large continent, as it may be called, to millions of minute insects that wander in the largest liberty over its surface. Each of these insects is the owner of a house or cavern, which it forms by burrowing in the solid shell. Besides these minute members of the animal kingdom, the vegetable tribes are represented by a luxurious growth of plants springing up over the entire shell. These are of every variety of form and color, and consist of trees, shrubs, and flowers of the most beautiful description. In order to examine them properly, the shell should be placed in a glass of clear salt water.

A Turkish Triumph.—A foreign paper says that on the 17th of December, Omar Pasha made his triumphal entry into Bosna Serai. Mahmud, the rebellious Pasha of Tuzla, rode on a miserable saddle affixed to the back of a peasant's sorry jade. After him rode the other prisoners, the Musselims, Cadis, &c., each horse being attached to the saddle of its predecessor. Four Nizams (Christians) dressed as jesters, with caps and bells, and performing all kinds of antics, led on the procession. After the first act was over, Mastapha Pasha Babic was led on foot through the streets, and it is said that the sad spectacle drew tears from the eyes of many of the Turks who stood around.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year of this Seminary, for 1850 and '51, will commence the third Wednesday in August, and continue forty-four weeks, including a short recess between the terms, and one of ten days for the winter holidays.

The year is divided into three terms:—

The first, of 14 weeks, begins Wednesday, August 21st, and ends Wednesday, November 27th.

The second, of 15 weeks, begins Monday, December 2d, and ends Friday, March 14th.

The third, of 14 weeks, begins Tuesday, March 18th, and ends Tuesday, June 24th.

Board of Instruction.

GURDON EVANS, A. M., President,
And Professor of Mathematics and Natural Science.
Rev. JOSEPH W. MORTON,
Professor of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, Spanish, and Moral and Intellectual Science.
Mrs. SUSANNA M. SPICER, Preceptress.
ADOLPH ROSENHAYN,
(Late of Friedrick Wilhelm College, Berlin,)
Teacher of German, Piano Forte, and Assistant in Greek and Latin.

Other competent Teachers will be employed as occasion may demand.

TEACHERS' CLASSES will be formed, as usual, at the beginning of the Fall and middle of the Winter Terms, and continue seven weeks.

In the Common Branches, classes will be formed at the commencement of each term; but in the higher, the interest of the student, as well as the welfare of the Institution, demand that a more systematic course of study be pursued.

In the Natural Sciences, Elementary Chemistry and Philosophy will be pursued during the Fall Term Agricultural Chemistry, Astronomy, and Physiology during the Winter Term; Botany and Geology during the Summer Term.

Classes will be formed in Latin, French, and German, at the commencement of the Fall Term; in Hebrew, Greek, and Spanish, at the commencement of the Winter Term, and continue through the course of study.

In Mathematics, Geometry is studied in the Fall, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, and Astronomy, Surveying, Navigation, &c., in the Summer Term.

The course of instruction in Agriculture is thorougly scientific, embracing study and recitation in the best authors. Instruction is given in a well-furnished laboratory, in the analysis of soils, ashes of plants, manures, &c. and the modes of testing for their constituent elements. The attention of farmers who wish to give their sons a practical education is especially called to this department.

Board in private families, from $1 25 to $1 50. Many students board in clubs for 60 to 75 cents.

Tuition—to be settled upon entering school—from $3 00 to $5 00. Extras—For Drawing, $1 00; Oil Painting, $5 00; Chemical Experiments, $1 00; Writing, including stationery, 50 cents; Piano Forte, $8 00; Use of Instrument, $2 00; Agricultural Chemistry, including chemicals, apparatus, and fuel, (breakage extra,) $12 00.

It is very desirable that students should enter at the beginning of the term; yet they are received into classes already formed at any time.

For farther information, address Gurdon Evans, J. W. Morton, or Rev. J. R. Irish, President of the Corporation.

OBLIGATION OF THE SBBBATH.

MESSRS. EDITORS:—The four propositions examined, and believed to be established, in my last communication, are—

1. That the Bible knows but one weekly Sabbath; "the seventh day" of the fourth commandment.
2. That the Sabbath was strictly a ceremonial and Jewish institution.
3. That Jesus repeatedly and studiously violated the Sabbath.
4. That the New Testament never encourages Sabbath observance, nor condemns "Sabbath-breaking."

I shall now consider, in continuation, the two remaining—and the two most vital—assumptions of Anti-sabbatarianism; on both of which, I find your correspondent, J. N. B. and myself directly at issue.

5. The fifth proposition, that the Sabbath was formally abrogated by the first council at Jerusalem, receives from J. N. B., a criticism equally concise and emphatic. "This proposition," says he, "is a pure assumption, without a shadow of proof. I meet it with an unequivocal denial." It will be necessary for me, therefore, to refresh my friend's memory concerning some of the circumstances of this important judicial deliberation.

It will be remembered, that when the church threw open its doors to the Gentile world, a warm contention almost immediately arose between the Pharisaic Christians and these new converts, respecting the obligation of the Jewish law; the former, who claimed Jesus as the Jewish Messiah, insisting "that it was needful to circumcise them, and to require them to keep the law of Moses;" and the latter, as naturally rejecting whatever they found burdensome in that code, as forming no necessary part of the evidences, or of the doctrines which had attracted them to the Christian fold. It will also be remembered, that in consequence of this "no small dissension and disputation" in the church at Antioch, it became necessary to invoke the authority of the catholic church; and it was accordingly "determined that Paul and Barnabas, and certain other of them, should go up to Jerusalem unto the apostles and elders, about this question." The great subject thus presented for the consideration and adjudication of this general council was evidently the whole "law of Moses," and the extent of its obligation, (Acts 15: 5;) and the decision arrived at, after "there had been much disputing," excepted from abrogation but three prohibition of the law as "necessary things" to be abstained from; namely, idolatry, fornication, and the eating of things strangled, and blood. As Paley very correctly states, "The observance of the Sabbath was not one of the articles enjoined by the apostles, in the fifteenth chapter of Acts, upon them 'which from among the Gentiles were turned unto God.'"

If my friend J. N. B. will still contend that this "does not affect the original law of the Sabbath," that "the key to the whole fallacy is in the wrong sense given by the writer to the term law," and that "in this case, as the whole context shows, it is to be restricted to the Jewish ceremonial law," I can only express a deep regret that he has read the Scriptures to so little purpose, as thus glaringly to misconstrue their teaching. "The whole context shows," incontrovertibly, that the ecclesiastical decree was not "restricted to the Jewish ceremonial law," by its actually specifying two provisions of the moral law! So "wrong a sense given to the term law," by my friend, is really worse than a fallacy!

The obvious reason why these two points of the moral law were at all referred to, was that they were the only ones likely to be transgressed by those just emancipated from the Roman Paganism. Otherwise they would no more have been noticed than robbery or murder; and J. N. B. would then have had some slight chance of exercising his ingenuity in maintaining his "fallacy." It is very certain that these Gentiles never were bound by the Jewish Sabbath law previous to their conversion; and it will not be doubted that they would have found a strict observance of the Jewish Sabbath not the least burdensome portion of "the law of Moses," which the Pharisees had commanded them to keep. When, therefore, the mother Church at Jerusalem, by official edict, resolved "to lay upon them no greater burden than these necessary things" above mentioned, it is impossible to include the fourth commandment as obligatory upon them, without grossly perverting the language and the purport of Scripture.

But even granting, for the sake of the argument, that the canonical decision was "restricted to the Jewish ceremonial law," the admission would not help my friend a particle. As the Sabbath law has already been fully shown to belong to that law, (vide proposition 2d,) it would still necessarily fall within the recognized province of the ecclesiastical judgment, and its omission would be quite as decisive. On either supposition, therefore, the silent rejection of the fourth commandment at once suspends its authority; unless J. N. B. is prepared to show that the Greeks and Romans themselves had a weekly Sabbath—apart from this repudiated law of Sinai. I hardly suppose that this will be attempted.

When the church at Antioch received the circular epistle announcing the decision, we learn that "they rejoiced for the consolation." Contemplating the relief thus accorded by this gospel sabbatism from Mosaic bondage, how appropriate becomes the prophet's announcement concerning the root of Jesse, "To it shall the Gentiles seek; and his rest shall be glorious!" Isa. 11: 10.

It is true that the church at Jerusalem continued to observe the Sabbath long after this repeal—as it did indeed the whole Mosaic code—the first fifteen bishops of that church being all circumcised Jews; but the repeal appears to have been addressed particularly "unto the brethren which are of the Gentiles," (Acts 15: 23,) and not to the Jews; and accordingly we learn from history that these Gentile Christians kept no Sabbath. They did meet together early on Sunday "to break bread," in commemoration of the "resurrection morn," (apparently occupying the remainder of the day with their usual employments;) but so far was this day from being regarded as a Sabbath, that the Jewish Christians, while adopting the same practice, still rigidly observed the seventh day, in literal obedience to the fourth commandment.

The firm conclusion, then, at which we arrive, is this—that the abrogation of the Sabbath is as certainly and as distinctly announced by this Jerusalem council, as is the abrogation of circumcision. There is no suggestion that can be offered to preserve its vitality, that will not equally apply to the latter. Was the one symbolical? so was the other; was the one ceremonial? so was the other; was the one unknown to the Greeks? so was the other; was the one excluded by silent neglect? so was the other; was the one distinctively referred to in the subsequent epistles? so was the other; is the one abolished? so is the other! "No one ever yet mistook circumcision for a natural duty," remarks Bishop Warburton, "while it has been esteemed a kind of impiety to deny the Sabbath to be of that number!"

"What can be more plain," says John Bunyan, "these things thus standing in the Testament of God, than that the seventh day Sabbaths, as such, were given to Israel only?" "The old seventh day Sabbath is abolished and done away, and has nothing to do with the Gentiles."

6. In regard to the sixth and last proposition, that the epistles uniformly regard the Sabbath as a provisional type, fulfilled and superseded by the gospel dispensation, my friend again laconically says, "This I deny, and challenge him to the proof. It certainly is not found in the epistle to the Hebrews." Let us see how far this interesting treatise confirms, or tends to illustrate, our proposition. The deductions of its author are oftentimes apparently remote, and (as Peter has observed, 2 Epist. 3: 16) even their scope occasionally obscure; still, accepting his doctrines, we must, to the best of our ability, endeavor to discover his design.

What is the rest of God, referred to by the Psalmist, (95: 11,) and by whom should it be enjoyed, appear to have been the questions suggested to the Apostle's mind by the quotation he had introduced to warn the Hebrews against "unbelief." (Chap. 3.) And in this connection, since the ancient Israelites who believed not "could not enter in because of unbelief," he contends that by application to the new dispensation, only those "whieh have believed do enter into rest," (4: 3,) that is, that the promised rest could only be referred to—and enjoyed by—the faithful Christian. And he endeavors to establish this, by the consideration, first, that while the Creator's rest, reaching back even to the "foundation of the world," gave sanction to a Sabbath which had been long and fully enjoyed by the Israelites, the text yet declared, "They shall not enter into my rest," proving that this could not mean the Sabbath rest; (4, 5, 6;) and, secondly, that while "Joshua had given them rest" in Canaan, long before the time of David, the expression, "'To-day,' after so long a time," equally proved, (and for the same reason,) that the Psalmist could not refer to the Canaan rest; "for if Joshua had then given this rest, he would not afterward have spoken of another day" of rest, into which some should "not enter." (7, 8.)

Having thus clearly excluded both the repose of Canaan and that of the Sabbath, from the contemplation of the passage quoted, he establishes his conclusion, "There remaineth therefore a rest to the people of God," (9,) to those who "are made partakers of Christ," as the only hypothesis left, to give significance to the text. "We, which have believed, do enter into rest:" and with regard to its character, "he that is entered into his rest, he also hath ceased from his own works, as God did from his," (10.) This spiritual "sabbatism to the people of God," is thus as complete in its application, and as perfect in its fruition, as was the carnal sabbatism of the Israelites. "The believer," says Dr. Clarke, "no longer depends on the observance of Mosaic rites and ceremonies for his justification and final happiness. He rests from all these works of the law, as fully as God has rested from his works of creation." Dr. Gill very unnecessarily and unsatisfactorily refers this verse (10) to Christ, instead of to his followers; though, on the preceding verse, he very forcibly remarks, "The rest which remains for them is not a new Sabbath day, but a sabbatism; and this does not so much design eternal rest in heaven, . . . but rather the spiritual rest believers have in Christ, under the gospel dispensation, which they now enter into, and of which the Apostle had been treating." The view which would refer this sabbatism to the rest beyond the grave, finds no support from the context. The whole subject of this dissertation is the Levitical symbolism of the gospel, without the slightest reference to a future life. "Unbelief"—the great stumbling block of the Hebrews—is characterized as the chief obstacle to their enjoyment of the promised repose; which, it would appear, is complete in proportion to faith. "Let us therefore fear, lest a promise being left us of entering into his rest, any of you should seem to come short of it." "Let us labor, therefore, to enter into that rest, lest any man fall after the same example of unbelief." (11.) "For we which have believed do enter into rest;" evidently not in a future sense. "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Matt. 11: 28.

The two different rests referred to above, (in verses 4 and 8) appear to have prefigured each its peculiar antitype; and while the spiritualizing Jews regarded Canaan (to possess which they passed the Jordan, Josh. 1: 11,) as emblematic of the heavenly repose after death, (Job 3: 17; Rev. 14: 13,) they looked upon the more transient Sabbath-day as a shadow of the temporal repose of their nation, under their Messiah's empire. Hence the early and wide-spread sentiment of a milennial Sabbath, that should succeed and terminate six thousand years of wordly toil.

The intimations, then, that we receive from this somewhat abstract treatise, are—first, that there is a Sabbatism for Christians—and, secondly, that this Sabbatism is something very widely different from the keeping of a holy day. A strong presumption is thus afforded, that the Jewish Sabbath was itself, in fact, "a provisional type" of this new rest reserved for believers; that as, literally, it commemorated Israel's repose from the bondage of Egypt, (Deut. 5: 15,) so, spiritually, it foreshadowed Israel's repose from the bondage of Sinai, (Gal. 5: 1.) How far this presumption is weakened or illustrated by collaterial Scripture testimonies, will presently appear. "The new law," says Justin Martyr to the Jew Trypho, "will have you keep a perpetual Sabbath."

Calvin, in his celebrated "Institutes," commenting on the fourth commandment, holds the following language: "He (Christ) is the true fulfillment of the Sabbath. . . . . This is kept, not by one day, but by the whole course of our life, till, being wholly dead to ourselves, we be filled with the life of God far away from Christians, therefore, should be the superstitious observance of days. . . . . Let us sum up the whole in the following manner. As the truth was delivered to the Jews under a figure, so it is given to us without any shadow; first, in order that during our whole life we should meditate on a perpetual rest, from our own works," &c. (Instit. B. ii. chap. 8: sec. 31, 32.)

"Numerous early Christian Fathers," says Archbishop Whately, "in their commentaries on the Decalogue, describe the Jewish Sabbath as corresponding in the analgous scheme of Christianity, not so much to the Lord's day as to the whole life of the Christian, to his abstinence from all works that may draw off his affections from God, and to his complete dedication of himself to his service. See Athanasious, Hom. de Sab.; Hieronymus, in Decalog.; Origen, Tract. 19 in Matt.; Chrysostom, Hom. 39 in Matt. 12; Justin Martyr, Dial. c. Tryph.; Clemens Alexandrinus, Strom. lib. 4; and Augustine, passim; ALL of whom hold this language. I refer, however," continues Whately, "to these and other authorities, not as guides to regulate our faith and practice, for I am taught to 'call no man Master upon earth,' but merely to show that the novelty which has been attributed to my views lies, in fact, on the other side."

But we must return to Paul. "Let no man judge you," says he to the Colossians (2: 16,) "in respect of an holy day . . . . or of the Sabbath days; which are a shadow of things to come; but the body is of Christ." At first sight, this really looks as if the Apostle intended to teach us that the Sabbath was a provisional type, fulfilled and superseded by the gospel dispensation! But my friend J. N. B. says he did not "refer to the Sabbath of the Decalogue, but only to the ceremonial fasts and festivals of the Jews." How unfortunate for my hypothesis! It is some encouragement, however, to find that John Calvin expressly quotes this text in his exposition of the fourth commandment, and approves its literal application. "Therefore the Apostle says in another place, that the Sabbath was a shadow of something future, but the body was in Christ—that is, the real substance of the truth, as he has there well unfolded," (Inst. lib. 2: 8.) Archdeacon Paley, an able biblical critic, and certainly a close student of Paul's writings, infers from this passage, that "St. Paul evidently appears to have considered the Sabbath as part of the Jewish ritual, and not obligatory upon Christians."

I can hardly permit J. N. B., therefore, to dislodge me thus summarily; but before surrendering my castle at summons, I require him to show by a single hint "from the context"—by a single syllable from the New Testament—how he can exclude the seventh day Sabbath from "the Sabbath days which are a shadow." But again, as is generally the case with theories founded in error, my friend has wholly unlooked another point. After he has given me, therefore, some ground more substantial than assertion, for believing that this passage does not refer to the Sabbath of the Decalogue, I further require him to show how Christians can possibly retain this Sabbath, and yet not keep "an holy day!" I suppose the next step in the argument (if I may be pardoned the misnomer,) will be the assertion, not only that "Sabbath days" do not mean Sabbath days; but that "an holy day," obviously, "from the context," imports something entirely different from an holy day! and perhaps, ultimately, that "the context" itself falls within the same category. If, in addition to these philological revelations, your correspondent will also make the trifling discovery of a Scriptural text, half as explicit, half as unmistakable, on his side of either of our "six propositions," I promise to abandon to him the whole argument without reserve!

But, fortunately, we have corroborating testimonies to establish the position under review. It is not dependant on a single chain of evidence, however irrefragible that chain may be. "Him that is weak in the faith, receive ye," says Paul to the Romans, "but not to doubtful disputations. . . . . One man esteemeth one day above another; another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind. He that regardeth the day regardeth it unto the Lord; and he that regardeth not the day, to the Lord he doth not regard it." (14: 1, 5, 6.) To this J. N. B. replies: "If Paul's language in that chapter be taken, without any limitation, as affirming that every day is to be esteemed alike by enlightened Christians, it goes beyond the Apostle's aim, and strikes equally against the Christian's 'Lord's day,' as against the Sabbath of the Decalogue!" This is certainly an original mode of argument; and deserves a copy-right! If our recognized authority "be taken without any limitation," it entirely overthrows me, and therefore I must limit it!—to what extent, we are not informed. Humbly supposing that the Apostle really meant pretty much what he said, I am disposed to accept his language as it is. Dr. Gill remarks concerning this passage, that it must be understood as including among the various Jewish festivals, "one day in a week, the seventh-day Sabbath; now there were some who thought that the laws respecting these days were still in force, particularly the latter, and therefore esteemed it above another."

Whatever valid grounds there may be for weekly worship and for Sunday commemoration, I sincerely hope they are perfectly satisfactory to my friend; if not, he deserves commiseration. But at present I am only concerned to show, first, that this observance is not required by the fourth commandment, (vide proposition 1,) and, secondly, that if it were, this commandment has been—in Paul's expressive language (unconsciously used by my friend,)—completely "blotted out." (Col. 2: 14, 16.) If J. N. B. will esteem Sunday as more "holy" than any other day, I leave him to escape Paul's implication of "weakness in the faith," as best he can. To console him, I will remind him of the opinion of Martin Luther, as quoted in Coleridge's Table Talk, (vol. ii. May 19, 1834.) "If anywhere the day is made holy for the mere day's sake, if anywhere any one sets up its observance upon a Jewish foundation, then I order you to work on it, to ride on it, to dance on it, to do any thing that shall reprove this encroachment on the Christian spirit and liberty."

"As for the Sabbath," says Tyndale the translator and martyr, in his answer to Sir Thomas More, "we be lords of the Sabbath, and may yet change it into Monday, or any other day as we see need; or we may make every tenth day holy, if we see cause why. Neither was there any cause to change it from Saturday, save only to put a difference between us and the Jews. Neither need we any holy day at all, if the people might be taught without it."

"O foolish Galatians," says the Apostle once more, (3: 1,) who hath bewitched you, that ye should not obey the truth?" "How turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements, whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage? Ye observe days!" (Gal. 4: 9, 10.) "These," says a note on this passage in Valpy's Gr. Test., "are the Sabbaths." Dr. Clarke paraphrases it, "Ye superstitiously regard the Sabbaths;" and Dr. Gill says, "By 'days' are meant their seventh day Sabbaths; for since they are distinguished from 'months' and 'years,' they must mean such days as returned weekly; and what else can they be but their weekly Sabbaths?"

If my friend J. N. B. thinks these "days" so warmly condemned by the Apostle, do not refer to the Sabbath of the fourth commandment, I shall be very happy to learn the grounds on which such an opinion is based. Meanwhile, I must avow, that I have seen nothing calculated to "abate the tone of confidence" with which I reiterate the unimpeached conclusion, that while the catholic council at Jerusalem clearly rejected the Sabbath from the "things necessary" for Gentile Christian observance, the epistles uniformly regard the institution "as a provisional type, fulfilled and superseded by the gospel dispensation, the 'rest which remaineth to the people of God' being, not that of 'the seventh day,' but that into which they 'who have believed do enter,' when they 'have ceased from their own works.'" If in a solitary instance these epistles regard the Sabbath otherwise than as "a shadow," I have yet to read it, and I shall be under deep obligations to him who shall thus enlighten me.

Two points of my friend's review, that I particularly desired to notice, yet remain; the "obligation" of Mosiac law, and the "Antinomianism" of its rejection; but I have already so encroached upon your courtesy, and I fear, upon the patience of your readers, that I must for the present neglect them.

In conclusion, I would ask your correspondent J. N. B. one serious question: Does it not painfully oppress him as a most suspicious circumstance for the doctrine he advocates—as a circumstance well qualified, not to abate, but to destroy his confidence in its truth—that while the Anti-sabbatarian calmly reposes on the perspicuous and repeated declarations of Scripture, he himself is driven to the merest expedients in futile efforts to evade or to extenuate their significance, and finds no single text to counteract their force—no single intimation from the whole New Testament, to sustain his Sabbath obligation?

EXODUS.

JENNY LIND AND THE BLIND BOY.

A poor blind boy, who is highly gifted with musical talent, and who resides in the northern part of the State of Mississippi, had expressed such great anxiety to hear Jenny Lind sing, that his friends raised a subscription to send him to this city, says the New Orleans Picayune, to gratify his wish. On arriving here, he accidentally took lodgings in the same hotel with Mr. Kyle, the celebrated flutist. One evening Mr. Kyle, hearing some very wild and sweet flute tones, listened for some time in surprise, and as the sounds died away, he said to himself, "Well, that fellow thinks he can play; but now I'll just show him what I can do." Taking up his flute, he played the air of the "Last Rose of Summer," with variations. The blind boy listened with breathless delight, and following the sound, he came to the door of Mr. Kyle, and stood there until the last notes ceased. With a feeling of impulse he could not restrain, he knocked at the door. "Come in," said Kyle, and not recognizing the lad, he said, "What do you want, sir?" "I am blind," said the boy, "and have been drawn hither by your sweet music. Do tell me who you are." "I am but a poor musician," said Kyle, "and am traveling with Jenny Lind, as flutist." "You are!" exclaimed the lad; "Oh! sir, do take me to her Jenny Lind; I have come a long way to hear her sing, but the price of tickets is so hight that I am too poor to buy one. Can't you take me to hear her, sir?" he continued, with great feeling; "I have heard she is so good, so generous, so pretty, and sings so sweetly, that I shall never be happy until I hear her." Mr. Kyle felt deeply for the boy, and promised that he would take him to hear the lovely Swede. Accordingly, he took the blind boy that night and seated him in a chair behind the scenes. The sweet songs of the Nightingale affected the lad deeply, and produced upon him varied sensations. But when Jenny sang "Home, Sweet Home," he melted into tears. On her retiring, she was attracted by the sound of the boy's sobbings, and inquired who he was. Mr. Kyle then told her the history of the lad in a few words, which much interested her; and sending for him the next day, the poor boy left the generous songstress one hundred dollars richer than when he reached the city.

From the Nashville Gazette.

A TENNESSEE STATESMAN.

HON. ANDREW JOHNSON.

About thirty years ago, a son of one of the most wealthy men of North Carolina was bathing in a river in that State. He ventured too far into the deep water, and being unable to swim, he was about to be drowned. An elderly man was on the bank, and seeing the imminent peril of the little boy's situation, he leaped into the water, and by severe exertion, succeeded in reaching the spot where he saw him sink for the third time. By diving to the bottom, he found the body of the boy, and succeeded in swimming with it to the shore. The energies of the old man were exhausted, and so soon as he had placed the body on the bank, in a lifeless condition, he sunk under the over exertion, and soon after died, leaving a motherless son of about ten years of age. The timely exertions of a skillful physician rescued the little boy who was thus saved by the old man from the grave, but his skill could not save the life of the old man.

The old man was poor, and upon his death his son was bound out to the tailor's trade under the laws of North Carolina. He served his apprenticeship in the city of Raleigh, and at the age of twenty-one, he went forth into the world with a decent suit of clothes, but without having been taught even so much as to read or write. After tramping a short time through South Carolina, he determined to wend his way to the Western District of Tennessee, where he understood the wealthy gentleman then resided, whose son his father had rescued from a watery grave at the expense of his own life. He set out out on his tramp westward with the bundle on his back, intending to work his way by halting a short time and doing journey work in the several towns on his route. He reached Greenville, in East Tennessee, and determined to make a short halt. He soon discovered that there was a good opening for another shop, and he concluded to hang out on his own hook. He had succeded in winning custom, and he had also won the heart of an intelligent and highly accomplished young lady. They were married, and that was an end of his tramping.

The responsibilities of a family induced him to double his exertion, and his attention to business secured him abundance of patrons. He plied his needle diligently during the day and at night he went to school to his wife, who undertook to teach him to read and write. He was an apt scholar, and had an excellent teacher. He became enamored of books, and to them he devoted all the time he could spare from his shop board. He prospered in business and grew in knowledge. In a few years he was considered a man of fine intelligence and untiring perseverance, whilst his character for sterling integrity was fully established. In looking around for a suitable representative to the Legislature, the people fixed their eyes upon the energetic and intelligent tailor. He was elected to the house of representatives of the Tennessee Legislature, in 1837. He attracted no particular attention for some weeks after the commencement of the session, except for the regularity of his attendance. He had but little to say on the floor, although he was at his post and ready to vote. It become necessary on one occasion for him to say a few words in opposition to some measure, when to his surprise he was assailed with something like rudeness by one of the leading lawyers and speakers of the Assembly. By way of making the attack entirely overwhelming the lawyer alluded to the occupation of the tailor. This kindled the indignation of the young mechanic into a blaze. He took the floor in reply and poured forth a torrent of bold, biting, crushing phillippic and denunciation, mingled with eloquent vindication of the mechanics of the State, which completely overwhelmed his assailant, and developed the powers of his own capacious intellect. He took the house and gallery completely by surprise. He had their sympathies on account of the assault, and the odds in favor of his assailant. But no one looked for such a burst of indignant eloquence as followed. His character for high talents and for bold, unshrinking courage was re-established, and during the remainder of the session he ranked amongst the ablest members of the body.

At the close of the session, he returned to the shop, and there remained pursuing his trade and gathering fresh knowledge from books for several years, when the people again required his services in the upper branch of the Legislature. By this time he had made himself one of the best informed men in the Senate, and during the session he stood in the front rank of that body. This is a brief history of one of the most remarkable men in the State, and his example deserves to be held up as a beautiful commentary upon our free institutions, and as an encouragement to all other young men in destitute circumstances.

THE SIXPENCE.

Some time in the latter part of the last century, a missionary from one of the New England societies was laboring in the interior of the State of New York, where the settlements were very few and far between. The missionary was much devoted to his work, meek and affable, and possessed of a remarkable faculty for introducing the subject of religion to every individual with whom he came in contact. On a hot summer's day, while his horse was drinking from a small brook through which he rode, there came along a poorly-dressed, bare-headed, barefooted boy, about seven years old, and stood looking at the missionary from the bridge just above him.

"My son," said the missionary, "have you any parents?"

"Yes, sir; they live in that house," pointing to a cabin near by.

"Do your parents pray?"

"No, sir."

"Why do they not pray?"

"I don't know, sir."

"Do you pray?"

"No, sir."

"Why do you not pray?"

"I do not know how to pray."

"Can you read?"

"Yes, sir; my mother taught me to read the New Testament."

"If I will give you this sixpence, will you go home and read the third chapter of John, and read the third verse over three times?" The little boy said he would; and the missionary gave him the sixpence and rode on.

Some twenty years had elapsed, and the missionary, advanced in years, was laboring in a sparsely peopled region, in another part of the same State. While on his way to a little village one day, late in the afternoon, he called at a small house, and inquired the distance. "Six miles," was the reply. He then stated that himself and horse were very weary, and inquired if he could not stay all night. The woman of the house objected on account of their poverty, but the husband said, "Sir, you shall be welcome to such as we have."

The missionary dismounted and went in. The wife began to prepare his supper, while her husband proceeded to take care of the horse. As he came in, the missionary addressed him:

"Do you love the Lord Jesus Christ?"

"That," said the man, "is a great question."

"True," said the missionary, "but I cannot eat till you tell me."

"Sir," said the man, "about twenty years ago, I lived in the interior of this State, and was then about seven years old. While playing in the road one day, a gentleman in black rode into the brook near by me, to water his horse. As I stood on the bridge above looking at him, he began to converse with me about praying, and reading the Bible; and told me he would give me a sixpence if I would read the third chapter of John, and the third verse three times—'And Jesus answered and said unto him, Verily I say unto thee, except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.' I gave him my promiso, took the money, and felt wealthy indeed. I went home, and read as I had promised. That verse produced an uneasiness in my mind, which followed me for days and years, and finally I was led by its influence, as I trust, to love Jesus as my Saviour!"

"Glory to God!" said the missionary, rising from his seat; "here is one of my spiritual children; the bread cast on the waters is found after many days."

They took their supper, and talked, and sang, and prayed, and rejoiced all night long, neither of them having any disposition to sleep. The missionary found him to be poor in this world's goods, but rich in faith, and an heir of the kingdom. Early in the morning they parted, and the missionary went his way inspired with fresh zeal for the prosecution of his pious labors.

THE SAILOR BOY AND HIS BIBLE.

In 1816, a vessel from Stockholm was driven upon the coast of Scotland in a tremendous gale. In a short time after the vessel struck, she went to pieces. The spectators on shore saw with grief the situation of those on board, but could render them no help. All on board perished except one person, who, driven by the waves upon a piece of the wreck, entangled among the ropes fastened to the mast, half naked and half drowned, reached the shore, and was disengaged from his heart-rending situation by those who were on the beach. As soon as they had rescued him, they observed a small parcel tied round his waist with a handkerchief. Some thought it was his money, others thought it was the ship's papers, and others thought it was his watch, &c. The handkerchief was unloosed, and, to their surprise and astonishment, it was his Bible! a Bible given to the lad's father by the "British and Foreign Bible Society." Upon the blank leaf was a prayer written, that the Lord might make the present gift the means of saving his son's soul. Upon the other blank leaf was an account how the Bible came into the old man's hands, and an expression of that gratitude to the "British and Foreign Bible Society," which inspires the heart of every Christian, was written by the old man. The request was, that his son should make it "the man of his counsel," and that he could not allow his son to depart from home without giving him the best pledge of his love, his Bible! although that gift deprived the other parts of the family. The Bible bore evident marks of having been often read with tears.

Teach your children the elements of Christian philosophy, the Bible, lessons of love, and temperance, and knowledge, and virtue, and faith, and hope, and charity, and you may turn them out into the world without a doubt of distrust or fear; they will never hurt each other, and never injure the State.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, March 13, 1851.

"OBLIGATION OF THE SABBATH."

We resume, this week, the publication of the Sabbath Discussion, which the press of other matter compelled us to suspend for the last two numbers. We offer no strictures upon the sophistry by which "Exodus" attempts to make it appear that "the Sabbath was formally abrogated by the first council at Jerusalem." His antagonist, as our readers will discover hereafter, ably meets him upon this point. But his attempt to show "that the epistles uniformly regard the Sabbath as a provisional type, fulfilled and superseded by the gospel dispensation," by appealing to the letter to the Hebrews, is not to be passed without notice.

"There remaineth, therefore, a rest (sabbatism) to the people of God." Heb. 4: 9. "The view which would refer this sabbatism to the rest beyond the grave," says 'Exodus,' "finds no support from the context. The whole subject of this dissertation is the Levitical symbolism of the Gospel, without the slightest reference to a future life." It is most astonishing how any man can carefully read this epistle, and make such an assertion. If there is no reference to a future life, then farewell to all attempts at sustaining from the Bible the doctrine that this life is probationary with reference to another. The fact is assumed by the writer of the epistle, that the Israelites in the wilderness were in a state of probation with reference to their rest in the land of Canaan. He shows that through unbelief some of them fell short of that rest. Their "carcases fell in the wilderness." He improves this solemn fact as a motive to perseverance, urging that we under the gospel should also "fear lest a promise being left us of entering into his rest, any of us should come short of it." He thus clearly teaches, that as the Israelites were probationers with reference to the rest promised them in the land of Canaan, so we are probationers with reference to some other rest of which that in Canaan was a type. But what is the other rest, with reference to which we stand on probation? "Exodus" will have it, that it is the repose which Christians enjoy under the gospel dispensation. But how, in the name of reason, can Christians be probationers with reference to what they have already received? The Hebrews, whom the Apostle was addressing, had actually received the gospel. They were in possession of the rest enjoyed by faith, and if the Apostle had not "the slightest reference to a future life," there was nothing else to be bestowed upon them as the reward of their steadfastness. But the Apostle evidently proceeds on the supposition that the reward—the promised rest—is yet future. "There REMAINETH a rest." The term is [illegible] in the present sense, it is true, but it implies that the rest is reserved—laid up in store, to be bestowed afterwards—such being the true signification of the Greek apoleipetai. It is not used in the sense of abideth, otherwise the Greek term menei would have been employed, as in 1 Cor. 13: 13. The argument of the Apostle is substantially this:—"There is a rest in reserve for the people of God. Therefore do you Hebrews, who have received the promise of it, hold fast your begun confidence steadfast unto the end. If, like the Israelites, you indulge in unbelief, and depart from the living God, you will most certainly be shut out from it."

But we need not resort to criticism upon Greek terms. The use which the Apostle makes of David's language in the 95th Psalm, shows that he was speaking of a rest yet future. "To-day, if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts." "I sware in my wrath, they shall not enter into my rest." From the fact that this language was addressed by the Holy Ghost to the Israelites as late as the time of King David, the Apostle argues that the reference could not have been to the sabbatic rest; for that they had already received. It had been enjoyed by the people of God "from the foundation of the world." Verses 3, 4. For the same reason, the reference could not have been to the earthly rest in the land of Canaan. For that they had also received long before David's time. The reference was certainly to some rest which they had not yet received; else there was no pertinency in the threat, that if they hardened their hearts, and refused to hear his voice, they should not enter into it. Now it is true, that with reference to the Israelites in David's time the gospel dispensation was yet future. They had not yet received it. But it is equally true, that they never did receive it. All that generation was dead long before the gospel dispensation was introduced to the world. To threaten them that they should not enjoy the repose of it, if they hardened their hearts, thus implying, that if they were steadfast they should enjoy it, was not, therefore, the design of the Holy Ghost. The design was to admonish them of rest in heaven. In the promise of a rest in the land of Canaan there had been wrapped up the promise of rest in the heavenly Canaan, as the fruit is wrapped up in the shell. It was with reference to this heavenly rest that the Israelites were probationers in David's time. Hence the pertinency of the language of the Psalm quoted.

Now it is clear that the Apostle considers the language of this Psalm as pertinent to the exhortation he was addressing to his Hebrew brethren, as it had before been to the exhortation which the Holy Ghost by David addressed to the Israelites. Had he not so considered it, he would not have employed it. If it is pertinent to threaten the unfaithful that "they shall not enter into his rest," although they have actually received it in the gospel dispensation, then where was the impertinency of using the same language to the Israelites in reference to any rest which they had received, whether the sabbatic, or the earthly rest in Canaan? Does Paul, after laboring to justify the Holy Spirit from all incongruity in the use of language, heedlessly pitch into the same blunder himself? How he is to be vindicated from doing so, according to the construction of "Exodus," we see not.

The Apostle's exhortation is substantially this: 'God has left us a promise of entering into his rest. Nevertheless, we are put upon probation in reference to it, and a life of unbelief and disobedience will surely exclude us from it. I warn you, therefore, to take heed; and in giving this warning, I would use the language which the Holy Ghost long ago spake by the mouth of David, "To-day, if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts, as your fathers did, to whom I sware in my wrath that they should not enter into my rest." By this I do not mean the Sabbath, for that is a rest which you have already received. The institution dates its existence from the foundation of the world. Nor do I mean the rest in the land of Canaan, for that is a rest which your fathers received long ago, under the guidance of Joshua. Nor do I mean the gospel dispensation, for that is a rest which you have also received. But I mean something which is yet future; something which you have not received. I mean that rest, of which the Sabbath was an emblem, of which Canaan was but a type, and of which the gospel dispensation, when received by faith, is a pledge and a foretaste. I mean heaven itself, into which Jesus has gone before us. Let us labor, therefore, to enter into that rest.' Viewed in this light, the Apostle's reasoning is clear and consistent throughout. Viewed as "Exodus" views it, it is disjointed, confused, and contradictory.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 29.

GLASGOW, February 21st, 1851.

In the House of Commons, Mr. W. Williams has this session introduced another Bill for the Prevention of Sunday Trading. Its provisions, as stated, seem much the same as those formerly thrown out by the House. The Scottish Free Church Magazine for this month avows a fear that the Sunday cause is apt, at this time, to be overlooked, or too little attended to, in the excitement occasioned by other questions. In former discussions of the subject, the churches have often been reminded, to little purpose, of the extent to which Sunday is desecrated by the unnecessary use of carriages to and from church; but this aspect of the question has been glanced at, in a passing way, in presbyteries lately held of the Established, the Free, and the United Presbyterian Churches. At the Annual Meeting of the Edinburgh Young Men's Sunday Observance Society, at the end of January last, it was stated that 60,000 tracts have been distributed by its agencies during the past year. The meeting pledged itself to continued exertion. The zeal without knowledge, if not in known disregard of the divine command, is indeed great. The Free Church newspaper of this city, spoke two weeks ago of the French organ of the priesthood, the Univers, having published "a long address sent by the Association of the working classes of Glasgow for the protection of repose upon the Sabbath, to Count de Montalembert, in Paris, congratulating him on his Report of the better observance of the Sabbath," without, so far as appears, these working classes of Glasgow having said one word in the way of correction or reproof on account of his having conjoined in that Report the sanctity of saints' days with that of Sunday. As the Scottish Guardian offers no remark on the statement by the Univers, we must suppose that some Association in Glasgow has sent the Count such an address; but though here upon the spot, and alive to such matters, we had never heard of it before. The Prussian Minister of Commerce has just issued an order designed to afford opportunity for the post office officials of that country attending divine service on Sunday. While he declares the total discontinuance of labor in the post office on that day to be impossible, he directs that the posting and delivery of letters be suspended during the hours of worship.

Lord John Russell's Bill for defeating the Papal Aggression, is now before the public. It fully corresponds with his own account in Parliament of its provisions, and there is reason to fear that it will prove inadequate to the occasion. Parties less cunning than Papal Cardinals, Archbishops and Bishops have usually been, would find little difficulty in evading its penalties. Lord John does, indeed, seem afraid of encroaching upon the principles of religious liberty if he adopted more stringent measures; and, in dealing with so complicated a system of civil and religious tyranny as the Papacy, it may not be easy fully to maintain right without danger of inflicting wrong. The slightest relaxation beyond what is indispensably necessary for the protection of others, has always been made available against liberty by the agents of this unscrupulous power. It is, therefore, to be feared that a prohibition of territorial titles, and the confiscation of money left to prelates bearing such titles of any place in the United Kingdom, (the features of his Lordship's Bill,) will be found ineffectual for the purpose designed. In the discussion elicited, Lord Minto has absolutely denied that there was any foundation for Wiseman's assertion that the scheme of the intended hierarchy had been submitted to him by the Pope at Rome. Can his self-styled "Holiness" have imposed upon his Cardinal? Or, can the Cardinal have fabricated for himself the story?

A controversy is being conducted in the Morning Herald, between Mr. Brown, Popish Bishop of Chepstow, and the Rev. Joseph Baylee, Principal of St. Aidan's College, Birkenhead, on the tenets of the Church of Rome; but as Mr. Baylee regards the traditions of the fathers, and the decisions of their councils, as authoritative, little value can attach to such a controversy. It is betraying the Protestant citadel into the hands of the adversary. Yet the Principal is not, I believe, of the acknowledged Tractarian party; but whether he himself is or is not disposed to attach the highest value to patristic principles, he doubtless knew that his Popish opponent would remind him of the place which these held in the formulas of the ill-reformed Episcopal Church. The movement in opposition to the Pope's nominees has aided the opposition to Tractarianism. Under the pressure of public opinion, the Bishop of London was compelled to insist on the Rev. Mr. Bennett of St. Barnabas' resignation, and the deed legally completing that step is promised to be subscribed on the 25th of next month. But, as if to be avenged of that public who compelled the measure, the Bishop has nominated the Honorable and Rev. Robert Liddell as successor to the charge, he being, it is said, nearly as much of a Romanist as Mr. Bennett himself. The latter has addressed a letter to his parishioners, giving a detailed statement of the circumstances connected with his ministry, and charging the Bishop with having led him on in those very practices for which he now casts him off. Three of the curates who were under Mr. Bennett, and who were suspected at the same time, are intending, it is stated, to set out on a journey to the East. There was a similar report as to the purpose of Mr. Dodsworth and Archdeacon Manning making a similar tour, landing at Jerusalem; but the former has stopped short, by casting himself into Rome's arms. A circular has been privately proposing questions to the Greek Church, as to the reception which clergymen seceding from the Episcopal Church would meet with at her hands; many Tractarians, it is said, aggrieved by the decision in the Gorham case, and yet not quite disposed to join Rome, having resolved to do so should favorable terms be obtained. Eighteen hundred of the clergy of the Church of England, from the same cause, have subscribed a declaration modifying their acknowledgment of the supremacy of the Crown in spiritual things—desiring that the power should be committed into their own hands. At a meeting of the County of Oxford, last month, Alderman Sadler stated that ninety members of the University of Oxford had gone over to the Church of Rome; while in the city of Oxford itself twelve prochial clergymen had done the same. But, notwithstanding of these secessions, there seems little disposition to put the church on any better footing. Mr. Bagshaw, a wealthy gentleman, son of a Member of Parliament, was erecting a chapel on his property in Paddington, to be connected with the Episcopal Church. The Bishop of London intimated that he would not consecrate the building unless it was endowed. Mr. B. replied, that he did not wish it consecrated; but that, on its completion, he would solicit his Lordship "to license to the ministry of the chapel a clergyman of long standing in the church." The Bishop replied, that he could not license it while unconsecrated, although this has been often done before. J. A. BEGG.

AN AFRICAN MISSION.

Rev. Mr. Thompson, who has recently returned from the Mendi Mission, presented the claims of that field at a meeting held in New York on Sunday evening, March 2d. The mission is located midway between Sierra Leone and Liberia, about fifty miles from the coast. Mr. Thompson has been laboring there for two and a half years past, in the midst of great privations and much suffering, but gives a cheerful account of the awakened state of the native mind, and the growing desire throughout that interesting region for the benefits and opportunities of civilization. The field for the spread of Christian influences is represented as already extensive and still widening. The mission embraces a number of the Amistad captives, who have been thoroughly civilized and are now engaged in teaching. Established in times of war, in the midst of the slave trade—its land rented from a chief engaged in that infamous traffic—the Mendi Mission has met with a degree of success beyond any thing that could have been anticipated. The trade in human flesh has been abolished, and a peaceful and profitable commerce established in its place; a strong slave-trading port at Gallinas has been broken up, and its conductors have departed to other quarters. The natives have always entertained a feeling of reverence for this Mission, and it has been the neutral ground where peace has more than once been made between conflicting tribes. Until recently, access to the interior was impossible, but Mr. Thompson succeeded in penetrating to a considerable distance, and was every where received with open arms. There is, however, a great demand for laborers, and it is hoped that many will be found who will avail themselves of the opportunities now offering to explore a country which has hitherto been hidden from the view of Christian nations, and seemed almost forbidden ground to scientific research.

NOTES OF A VOYAGE FROM CALIFORNIA—No. 1.

The following extracts from a journal kept during a voyage from San Francisco through Central America, and a cruise of nearly a month in the Caribbean Sea, make no farther pretensions than truthfulness. Although I have omitted to mention what I thought would be disagreeable to the reader, except where justice demands it, at the same time I deem it not improper to say, lest some young person who may follow my narrative may also be induced to follow my example, that he who travels for the sake of adventure will pretty surely suffer more, and realize less enjoyment, than he anticipated, and will often find it easier to wish himself home than to get there.

J. D. B. S.

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 10, 1850.

During the last two weeks of my stay in California, I suffered from an attack of jaundice, consequent upon the change from the climate of the Valley of the Sacramento to the cold air of the coast. While convalescing, I rode out on horseback to the Presidio. It was a bright October morning, the high winds that prevail on the coast during the summer months were gone, but not a cloud had yet appeared on the face of the sky. I rode to the top of one of the high sterile hills north of the town, and overlooking the shipping, the entrance to the bay, and its wide expanse of water. The scenery on the bay is rather too heavy to be beautiful, and at this season of the year too devoid of the garniture of nature. Autumn, in California, is a very melancholy season; it is the season of death, and not of fruition; there are but few fruits, and no changing hues, which autumn brings at home. It is man here that passes into the sere and yellow leaf, as you will notice in the icteric hue of a large proportion of the inhabitants, and as is decidedly the case with myself. The sky is uniformly cold and dull. The gentle spirit of my steed was moved, too, by the sterile prospect before him, and with head low bent he seemed for a long time dreaming of the flowery savannas, where a few months before he rolled in luxury. Our reveries were simultaneously arrested by an intruder, and we continued our stroll down the opposite side of the hill. There was a fresh water pond, nearly as low as tide water; its banks were lined with linen bleaching in the sun, and Chinese and Mexicans were arranged in the water up to their knees, with a rude table before them, upon which they were alternately rubbing, beating, threshing, squeezing, and variously otherwise maltreating other people's clothes. A rivulet, small at this season of the year, comes down between the hills, irrigating in its course various beds of lettuce and other vegetables common with us in the spring; some were just sown. And here I heard a sound to which my ear had long been unaccustomed—the noise of a tiny waterfall—which roused so many sad thoughts of scenes once so familiar, now so far away, that I fancied my malady grew worse; and with the unqualified approbation of my traveling companion, I turned his head homeward.

Oct. 19th.—I was so far recovered as to visit the ship on which I engaged passage to Rialejo. While on board of her, I heard heavy guns down the bay, and a few minutes after the steamer Oregon, with her rigging crowded with her gala dress of flags and signals, rode by the town, bellowing forth to right and left the joyous intelligence that "California is admitted." The news was shouted from vessel to vessel of that vast fleet anchored in the bay, and the stars and stripes ran up till the sky was blazing with bunting, and every reluctant rusty gun was made to proclaim far over the waters, and away into the rocky fastnesses of the mountains, that another star had been added to our glorious constellation; and it is worthy of mention, that the first response to the intelligence was from a ship carrying the flag of St. George.

Oct. 24th.—The ship was ready for sea yesterday—had cleared from the custom-house and dropped down to an anchorage below the shipping—but was unable to proceed to sea for want of sufficient seamen to navigate her. Only six men had been shipped, and half of this number were ordinary seamen; but to-day the captain succeeded in getting two more able seamen, and at one o'clock we weighed anchor and beat out, with a strong wind and ebb tide. We passed the ill-fated schooner Montague, lying at quarantine. Of the original company who came out in that vessel, more than one half died in a few months. She had now started from Sacramento for Panama, and the captain, second mate, and six passengers, have died of cholera. Yesterday the health officer's boat passed to visit her, with a crew of four Kanakas; to-day it had but two, and the morning paper announced that two had died from cholera! Our ship passed rapidly through the "Golden Gate," and before night we had lost sight of the land that had proved the El Dorado and the grave to many who but a year before had landed there with me, full of hope and daring.

The ship Plymouth, Capt. Pousland, was bound for Panama, but had engaged to put into Rialejo, at which place I had determined to land, and take the route through the State of Nicaragua. There were in all one hundred and sixteen passengers; the most of them are broken and disappointed miners; many of them have just come in over the Plains, and are disgusted with the prospect of gold digging; many are sick with fever and diarrhea, with barely sufficient means to carry them home. I had secured a room in the lower or captain's cabin.

Oct. 28th.—Off Santa Barbara, Cape Conception in sight.—Thus far we have had no appearance of unusual sickness, and think ourselves very fortunate in the choice of the Plymouth. Capt. P. is about forty, has been contending with storms until his voice and hearing are both cracked, but his heart is big and his head clear; his ship is well provided, and our voyage promises to be a pleasant one. There are but four or five in the cabin with me—Capt. Titcomb of Boston, a venerable old shipmaster, whose head has been whitening in the frosts and suns of every clime for half a century; he came out as master of a vessel, and is returning an invalid—Capt. Tatim (since dead) of New York, an intelligent, exemplary man, who also commanded a vessel out, and is on his way to visit home and return in the spring—a "Parle vous" in search of health, who had been recommended by Cazenave of Paris to visit Antigua, W. I.; but getting no better, his physician advised him to return to France. He was next sent to Havana, but a physician there told him it was no place for him, and advised him to go to New Orleans. From there he was recommended to try the climate of St. Louis. He got as far as Lexington, Ky., where he spent some time at the Mammoth Cave, but was disappointed in the result, and his medical adviser thought the climate of Mexico preferable to any other; he accordingly went to Mexico, but was no better of his bronchitis, and finally came to California. Here he grew worse rapidly, and is now going to seek the elixir of life in some new region, he knows not where. Another white-haired sea-king, and his brother, comprise the whole of our company in the captain's cabin.

Oct. 31st.—Early this morning it was announced that land would be visible on our weather-bow in a short time, and about 9 A. M. we descried the island of Guadaloup, in latitude 29°, long. 118° 20′, and about 140 miles from the coast of Lower California. It is over 1,200 feet high, about 15 miles long, ten broad, and uninhabited. It was about three o'clock P. M. when we were off the north-east point; a fresh wind was blowing from the north, and the sky was overcast with clouds that had not permitted an observation since we left San Francisco. Against the north end of the island, which is widest and highest, the clouds had been rolled up into a a gloomy mass, making it so dark on that side that we could scarcely discern objects on shore, and were rolling away on either side heavily, like the sea before the bluff bows of our ship, leaving a broad wake of bright blue sky to leeward. As we passed the eastern promontory, a scene of great beauty burst upon our view. Over the high crest of hills bounding the north end, the vapor was rolling like a vast cataract, and descending in a soft diffused mist into the calm sunny valley and bay below. It hugged so close to the mountain as to reveal its form, and the sun shining upon it gave it the appearance of snow. It was a rare sight to see the two sides in such strong contrast—the first was dark and wrathful, while this was like a place of enchantment, so calm and bright. Here sea birds and turtles resort in great numbers, undisturbed by the intrusions of man, and here they have been sole tenants since the Spirit of God first moved upon the face of the waters. There is something which excites the most intense interest in passing one of these lonely, uninhabited islands—a curiosity that fairly racks imagination. The water continues blue close up to the island, but in the deep bay on the east side there is said to be good anchorage, and we had intended, in case the weather was calm, to go on shore and procure some turtles, but we passed it at the rate of nine knots, and stood across the strip of blue sky to the leeward, and the loom of the receding land was lost soon after in the gloom of night. We directed our course to the Abijos Rocks, a singular collection of sharp rocks rising from the sea, 290 miles S. E. from Guadaloup. They rise abruptly 112 feet from the water.

Nov. 1st.—A young man from Illinois, who had been complaining for some days with fever, died last night. When I first saw him, his case appeared badly, but the day before yesterday he felt himself quite "smart," and gave no indications of so sudden a departure. The following night I was called up to see him with a violent congestion of the brain; coma followed, and at 11 o'clock last evening he expired. To-day his body was committed to the deep. Sewed up in a blanket, with a bag of sand fastened to its feet, it was placed upon a board over the bulwarks amidships; all hands were called around, when my venerable friend Capt. T., after some appropriate remarks, made a short prayer; the inner end of the plank was then raised, and our late fellow voyager slid into his unfathomable grave. We heard the splash, we caught a glimpse of something white in the ship's wake, and we turned to look upon the living, and lay the lesson to heart. We were carried along with a fine breeze, and passed the Abijos Rocks in the night. In lat. 22° N. long. 111° 30′, is a small island laid down in the chart as doubtful, for which we directed our course next, but passed over the spot without finding it.

Nov. 13th.—To-day we are one hundred miles south of Acapulco. Since passing Cape Corientes, we have seen at intervals the clouds that hang over lofty mountains on the eastern horizon, and at night flashes of lightning; various land birds have visited us from time to time, such as hawks, owls and sparrows; a beautiful species of wren made himself very familiar by picking flies from our clothes, but would not allow any such familiarity on our part; at length a hawk made a meal of him, and the Captain, as a matter of justice, ordered him shot, which was accordingly carried into execution.

We are witnesses of a very remarkable exhibition of the social disposition of the whale. It is rarely that a whale is seen alone. A week ago to-day we passed several, and during the afternoon it was discovered that one of them continued to follow us, and was becoming more familiar, keeping under the ship, and only coming out to breathe. A great deal of uneasiness was felt, lest in his careless gambols he might unship our rudder, or do us some other damage. It was said that bilge water would drive him off, and the pumps were started, but to no purpose. At length more violent means were resorted to; volley after volley of rifle shots were fired into him; billets of wood, bottles, &c., were thrown upon his head with such force as to separate the integument; to all of which he paid not the slightest attention, and he still continues to swim under us, keeping our exact rate of speed, whether in calm or storm, and rising to blow almost into the cabin windows. He seems determined to stay with us until he can find better company. His length is about eighty feet; his tail measures about twelve feet across; and in the calm, as we look down into the transparent water, we see him in all his huge proportions.

ITEMS FROM A LONDON LETTER.

In connection with that sketch of "the only Sabbath-School in England," which most of our readers have probably seen in the Sabbath-School Visitor for March, we received an interesting friendly epistle, from which we copy a few sentences of general interest to Sabbath-keepers:—

"We remain much the same at Mill-Yard; occasionally strangers come to meeting, but after two or three times we see no more of them."

"The Eldon-street Congregation meet in Shoreditch; Dr. Murch preaches to them, and since they have removed two or three of the first-day congregation have regularly attended."

"They go on the same as usual at Natton; we hear from them occasionally, and Mr. Eaton generally comes to London every summer."

"At Mill-Yard we use those copies of Christian Psalmody instead of the Baptist Collection, and of course much prefer them for the large collection of Sabbath hymns which they contain."

"Mr. Black's Calendar, after many delays, has this week come from the binder, of which he will send you copies soon, with his new Tract No. 9, and also the numbers of 'The Church' containing the discussion on the Sabbath, which will close next month with the remarks of the editors."

"The letters from the missionaries in China we are always glad to see; the last, particularly, was very interesting, and we have sent some extracts from it to 'The Church,' and shall try to get them often inserted with other missionary intelligence."

"Could you not take another trip, and see the celebrated Crystal Palace? It is a most magnificent building, of glass and iron, 1851 feet long—just the date of the year in feet. It looks like a vast conservatory, with a row of large trees up the middle—a wonder to every body how such a building could be erected in so short a time. The first wagon-load of goods passed on Wednesday from the Custom-House to the new building. Among the thousands coming to London we shall hope to see some Sabbath-keepers."

THE SABBATH-SCHOOL VISITOR.—From nearly every section of the denomination to which parcels of the Sabbath-School Visitor have been sent, we receive letters expressive of satisfaction with the paper, and indicative of a growing interest in the cause it is designed to promote. We are more than ever desirous that it should be circulated in all the churches, and in every neighborhood where Sabbath-keepers reside. Copies of the first three numbers were last week sent to many persons from whose vicinity no orders have been received. They will please consider themselves specially invited to make an effort to get it into circulation. Numbers from the beginning of the volume can be supplied.

WHICH ACTED THE CHRISTIAN?—It is said that at Rome, recently, a Mr. Tagliacozzo, an honorable Jew, was thrown into prison, for the crime of having employed under his roof a poor Christian woman, from charity, as a seamstress, there being an old law at Rome forbidding Jews to receive into their houses Christian servants. The son of Mr. Tagliacozzo, wishing to shield his aged father from prison, offered himself as prisoner, and the priestly court were not ashamed to condemn him in place of his father.

MISSIONARIES SAILED.—The barque Osmanli, Capt. Kendrick, sailed recently from Boston for Smyrna, with the following passengers: Rev. D. T. Stoddard; of the Nestorian mission, and Mrs. Stoddard, Rev. Mr. Rhea, of Blountville, Tenn., and Miss Whittlesey. Miss Whittlesey expects to join the Syria mission; the others are destined to the Nestorians.

REVIVAL IN BALTIMORE.—The New York Recorder learns, that as a result of revivals in the Baptist churches in Baltimore, 69 persons have been baptized by Dr. Fuller, 23 by Rev. Mr. Williams recently settled as pastor of the First Church, 9 by Rev. F. Wilson at the High-street Church, and 2 by Rev. Mr. Davis of the Colored Church. The work of grace still continues with unabated interest.

BAPTIST MISSIONS.—It is said that in order to meet the expenses of the Baptist Missionary Union for the financial year ending March 31st, $38,000 must be received during the present month—more than one-third of the annual expenses in one-twelfth of the year. Bad calculation some where—in the churches, probably.

ORDINATION OF DEACONS.—Jonathan V. Greenman and William A. Babcock were ordained to the office of deacon in the First Seventh-day Baptist Church in Brookfield, N. Y., on the 2d inst. The sermon was preached by Eld. E. S. Bailey, from 1 Tim. 3: 13—"For they that have used the office of a deacon well," &c.

Among recent deaths in England, we notice that of Rev. Dr. Pye Smith, of Homerton College, in his 77th year. He was an influential minister of the Independent denomination, and was well known in this country by his Theological and Scientific Works.

THE NEW POSTAGE LAW.—The postage law passed by Congress on the eve of adjournment, will be found on our fourth page to-day. Though complicated in regulating the price by the distance, and unjust in carrying a part of the matter for nothing, still it is a great improvement on the old law, and a pledge that the principle of cheap postage will eventually triumph. The following table, prepared for the Journal of Commerce, shows how newspaper postage under this law compares with it under the law at present in force. If the Journal's statement be true, that papers weighing less than an ounce and a half go for half price, the law will operate very favorably for the Recorder, since we, by using a superior quality of paper, are able to have it so light as to come within an ounce and a half. Here is the table:—

NEWSPAPERS PER QUARTER.

Miles.	Weekly.	Semi-W'kly.	Daily.
Under 50 (new bill)	5	10	25
Present rate	13	24	48
Over 50—under 300	10	20	50
Present rate	19½	39	117
Over 300—under 1,000	15	30	75
Present rate	19½	39	117
Over 1,000—under 2,000	20	40	100
Present rate	19½	39	117
Over 2,000—under 4,000	25	50	125
Present rate	19½	39	117
Over 4,000	30	60	150
Present rate	19½	39	117

All weekly papers free within the county where they are published. Papers of less than an ounce and a half, half these rates; and papers not over 300 square inches, one-fourth these rates. The rates on monthly and semi-monthly newspapers the same, in proportion to the number of sheets issued, as on weekly papers.

REVIVALS IN OHIO.—Interesting revivals are in progress in various parts of Ohio. At Oxford, at Greenland, at Twinsburg, and at Monroe, the power and grace of God have been signally displayed. A letter from the latter place, after speaking of the inroads which infidelity has of late made in that region, says that "against all the Lord hath raised up a standard. Through the simple gospel truth and the accompanying influence of the Holy Spirit, the mists of error disappeared, and scores are now rejoicing in the 'liberty wherewith Christ hath made them free,' who but a few days since were the willing slaves of sin. Twelve or fifteen family altars have been erected, from which prayer and praise now daily ascend."

REVIVALS IN VERMONT.—A letter from Peacham, Vt., to the editor of the Congregationalist, says that most of the towns in that vicinity have shared in a work of grace which has been progressing for several weeks. "The subjects of this work are of all ages—the hoary head, parents surrounded by rising families of children, and youth in great numbers of both sexes. An aged minister, who has spent most of his days in this region, remarked that he had witnessed no such manifestations since 1831. In Waterford, (hitherto a barren field,) 49 have united with the Congregational church by profession of faith, 39 in Cabot, 34 in Peacham, besides numbers in St. Johnsbury, Lyndon, Hardwick, and many in other places."

GOING TO ROME.—The English correspondent of the Independent says that secessions to Rome, chiefly of the upper ranks, continue. "The English Catholic Directory, just published, gives a list of names of twenty-five ministers of the Established Church, three American Episcopalian ministers, one Scotch Presbyterian minister, one Genevese Protestant minister, and one French Protestant minister, who have joined the Church of Rome during the year 1850. They also rejoice in two lords, three countesses, one honorable, two country gentlemen of wealth and standing, two captains in the army, one member of Parliament, and one Doctor of Laws—in all forty-two."

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY IN GERMANY.—Mr. Oncken, the self-denying and very successful Baptist Missionary in Germany, writes under a recent date in the following strain;—

"Our work here, and in Germany generally, is still greatly progressing; but as I dare not write long at present, I will merely add, that the day of our glorious liberty is at an end, the spirit of persecution is even now revived, and one of our brethren has been already banished from Mecklenburg. No one at a distance can form any just idea how rapid has been the return to despotism. But the Lord reigneth in the midst of all these convulsions, and the purpose of his heart will ultimately be accomplished."

A REVIVAL IN JAIL.—The Newark Daily Advertiser says:—"A religious excitement, we learn, has commenced among the prisoners in our county jail, of whom there are about forty. A temperance society has also been formed among them, and last evening a meeting was held, at which an address was made by one of their number, and suitable odes sung by the whole. The latter movement is particularly appropriate at this time, as we understand that two persons have died from the effects of liquor, either within the prison, or within a few hours after leaving it."

ACCIDENT FROM GUNPOWDER.—On the 6th of March, a store at Baker's Bridge, in the town of Alfred, N. Y., was utterly demolished by an expolsion of gunpowder, and six persons were fearfully burned, one of whom, a lad, it is feared cannot survive. It seems that the lad, acting as clerk, was weighing some powder, when a person dropped fire from his pipe, which caused the explosion. The individuals hurt were Irishmen employed as day laborers on the New York and Erie Railroad. The building was owned by Dr. J. B. Collins, and occupied by a Mr. Hennessy. N. V. H.

The large auction house of Austens & Spicer, in New York, failed last week, in consequence of the failure of the Messrs. Hollister, of the Empire Mills, near Utica, N. Y.

Adjournment of Congress.

The Thirty-First Congress of the United States adjourned at 12 o'clock on Third-day, March 4th. Its last sitting continued twenty-five hours, having commenced at 11 A. M. on Second-day. The River and Harbor Bill, which was defeated on party grounds, occupied the attention of the Senate from 11 o'clock A. M. until four o'clock the next morning. Then came up the Appropriation Bills, and the Light-House and Post-Route Bills, which went through with a rush. Of the Post-Route Bill, the editor of the Tribune, by way of illustrating how things were done, says:—

"The Post-Route Bill probably provides for the creation of two or three hundred new Post-Routes in various parts of the country, and involves an annual expenditure henceforth of a good many thousands of dollars. It was never read at all—in the Senate certainly, and we presume not in the House. When it came up, a Senator observed that it ought to be read through, but there was a general expression of 'No time for that now—we must trust our Committees—it is only an aggregation of all the Post-Routes we have severally applied for throughout the session,' &c., &c. So the Bill went through like Eclipse or Boston. After Congress had adjourned, we met Mr. Josiah Snow on Pennsylvania Avenue, and he informed us that he had obtained in that Post-Route Bill a grant of the Right of Way and an Appropriation of $350,000 from the Treasury to aid him in constructing a line of Telegraph from Missouri to California!"

The Postage Reduction Bill was passed, and is now a law, although it does not go into operation until the first of July. The Joint Resolution authorizing the President to send a Government ship to the Mediterranean to bring Kossuth and his companions to the United States, was also passed. The Bill making Land Warrants assignable, was lost; and so was the French Spoliation Bill. The resolution giving $250 extra pay to the door-keepers, pages, &c., of the Senate, was passed, of course. The Bill to ascertain and settle private land claims in California was passed; also the Resolution extending to the widows of Revolutionary Soldiers the benefit of the Acts of 1841, '43, and '44.

One Week Later from Europe.

The U. S. Mail Steamer Pacific, with one week later news from Europe, arrived at New York on Fifth-day last.

From England, we have a rumor that Lord John Russell has tendered his resignation to Her Majesty, and only holds office until another Government can be formed. The extensive loss of Parliamentary confidence, or rather Parliamentary sympathy, which his Lordship and his colleagues have evidently suffered of late, has probably led to this result.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has brought his "budget" before the House of Commons, from which it appeared that the surplus revenue for the year was £2,500,000, nearly a half of which he proposes to apply to the liquidation of the National Debt. With the remaining portion of the surplus he proposed to reduce the taxes in certain respects.

The returns of the Board of Trade show that the exports from England amounted in 1850 to more than £70,000,000; in 1849 to £63,000,000, and in 1848 to £53,000,000, a rate of increase without a parallel in the history of the country. In these returns, cotton goods stand foremost among the articles of export; the exported value amounted in 1849 to £26,775,000; in 1850 to £28,250,000.

The report from Canton is that Commissioner Lin, who seized the English opium in 1839, is dead. Murders and piracy are as rife as ever in the Indian seas, notwithstanding all the alledged severity of the authorities in that quarter.

An American, named Booth, was found murdered in his bed at the Calcutta Ice-house, on the 3d of January. The crime was committed by four American seamen, who have been since apprehended.

Dreadful Massacres in Damaraland.

A letter has been received from the Rev. Mr. Hahn, Missionary of the Rhenish Society, stationed at New Barmen in Damaraland, giving an account of the horrible atrocities which have been committed in that quarter by the notorious Namaque plunderer, Jonker Afrikander, and his people. The date is the 6th of September.

"The whole country is in a ferment, and the excitement has risen to a higher pitch than ever. Our mission among the Ovarherero is on the brink of destruction. The 23d of last month Jonker Africander fell upon the Kabitjane (Weerligt,) who lived on Mr. Koine's station, Schuslen's Ewartung. Numbers were killed, and cold-hearted cruelties committed, to which you will find scarcely any parallels in the history of the most barbarous nations. Feet of defenseless women were cut off, as well as the hands of helpless children; of other children they struck out the eyes; and some babies were ripped up. For many hours, Mr. and Mrs. Kolbe were kept in dreadful suspense, not knowing whether the next moment would not bring their turn to fall into the hands of these monsters. The Namaquas shot indiscriminately upon the rich and poor Ovarherero. Jan Jonker's son dragged a poor sick man out of Mr. Kolbe's premises, and flogged him with his sambuck. All the houses of the poor were destroyed, and the few things they possessed were either taken or spoiled. At last the horde left the station, taking up their quarters in the neighborhood. There remained no alternative for Mr. and Mrs. Kolbe but to flee, which they happily accomplished, with our assistance. Kahitjene made his escape. Jonker, after his return to Concordiaville, killed nearly every individual of Katjinenga's tribe, and took everything away. From thence he went to his residence in the mountains, and murdered all the Ovarherero, their wives and children, who lived with them. Only a few made their escape, and came to this station. Before Jonker committed these atrocities, he had already fallen upon Kamarherero, Katjamaka's (Koovervoet's) son, who on his flight from there murdered three Berg Damara women, belonging to this place. Previous to this deed, Jan Jonker robbed and murdered a captain, living with Katjinenga, whose name I do not remember. I do not suppose you will ask for the cause of all these dreadful acts. You know, sir, as well as I do, that Jonker and Cornelis do not want pretexts to shield their expeditions. The crime of the Ovarherero, in general, is that they are rich; and of Kahitjene in particular, that he once dared to oppose Jonker."

California News.

California News to Feb. 1 was received in New York on Sixth-day last. The winter had been, up to that period, unusually mild and clear, owing to which cause the mining communities in the dry diggings were without sufficient water to wash out the piles of earth they accumulated in anticipation of the rains. The Northern Gold Region, lying on the Trinity, Shaste, and Klamath rivers, promises a rich harvest for the coming season. There is nothing later from the semi-fabulus Gold Bluff.

The most exciting part of the news relates to recent Indian depredations. The Government seems to be awake to the importance of interposing an effectual check to them. The following letter to the editor of Alta California, was dated at San Juan, Jan. 18, 1851, and shows the urgency of the case:—

"An express rider from Mariposa county arrived in this city this evening. He has brought intelligence of a battle between four hundred Indians and a party of fifty or sixty Americans, under the command of Captain James Burney. The dispatches containing this intelligence are dated at 'Agua Frio,' and they state that the Indians were strongly entrenched in one of their villages. Their position was attacked at the dawn of day, on or about the morning of the 9th instant, by the Americans, led on by Captain Burney. The battle was a hard one, and lasted three hours. The result was that the Indians were driven from the village with a loss of sixty killed, and from ten to twenty wounded. Eight Americans were wounded, two of them mortally. One of the latter was Lieut. S. Keane, and the other a Mr. Little. The deceased are particularly noticed in the dispatches as having behaved with courage and intrepidity. After the battle, the Americans burned the village and retreated. They were pursued, and constantly fired upon by the Indians, during a retreat of ten miles. But the most horrible intelligence contained in the dispatches is that of the massacre of seventy-two men by the ruthless savages. The men were working in a gulch or chasm, and had stacked their arms, not apprehending any danger. The Indians came upon them by stealth, and having secured their arms, they massacred them one by one in detail! The Indians appear to have commenced a war of extermination."

Explosion and Burning of the Steamer Oregon.

CINCINNATI, Friday, March 7.

The steamer Oregon, bound down from Louisville, while passing through shute of Island No. 82, at 1 P. M. on the 2d inst., burst her boiler with a tremendous report, carrying away the forward cabin and upper deck, killing and wounding 60 persons. She was heavily laden, and had from 80 to 100 passengers, who had just finished dinner, and were generally collected in the hall and forward guards at the time. She took fire after the explosion and burnt to the water's edge, and being in the channel of the river under way at the time, would have consumed all on board but for the assistance of the Iroquois, which was wodding within a mile of the Oregon. Upon seeing the explosion, Capt. Lee, of the Iroquois, gave orders to go to her relief, and it was but a few minutes before she was alongside the Oregon. The flames had just burnt through the hurricane roof—men, women, and children, were collected together on the after part of the boat, without the means of getting away, but by jumping into the river. The shrieks of the women, the phrenzy of the men, ready to leap overboard to avoid the more horrible death by fire, and the groans of the scalded and dying, and the piteous lowing of the cattle, baffles description. Capt. Lee ran the bow of the Iroquois aft of the Oregon, and ladders being placed from the upper deck of the Oregon to the lower deck of the Iroquois; all on board the burning vessel able to walk got off, the Iroquois being all the time in great danger of taking fire. Capt. Montgomery was the last man to leave the wreck, which he did just as the Iroquois was backing away, and the parting of the boats caused the ladders to fail, precipitating Capt. M. into the river, but he was rescued with several bruises. The clerk's office was entirely blown away, together with the books and papers of the boat. George Brown, first clerk, was in the office at the time of the explosion, and was killed. The waiters in the cabin were at dinner, and all killed except the steward. Eight white firemen were killed. FERRY-BOAT EXPLOSION AT ST. LOUIS.—The St. Louis Republican of Friday, Feb. 14th, brings an account of a sad catastrophe in that city. At 12 o'clock the ferry-boat St. Louis, while backing from the Spruce-street landing, burst her larboard boiler, completely shattering the fore part of her cabin and deck, and killing and drowning at least twenty persons. The full extent of the melancholy disaster was apparent just as the explosion occurred. Timbers, large masses of machinery, brickwork, and ashes, were hurried aloft in every direction, with many human beings. The concussion was distinctly felt at a distance of five or six squares, and the spray from the boilers was also dashed very far. The starboard boiler was thrown completely out of its place, and so that it protruded about one-fourth of its length over the boat's side. It was crushed and cut through in many places. The larboard boiler—that which exploded—was first blown up, tearing to atoms the greater portion of the cabin, and afterward falling upon the forward part of the deck, flattened to such a degree that it could scarcely be recognized as having formed a boiler. The engine machinery, a portion of the wheels, the masonry about the boilers, and a portion of the deck flooring, were shivered and scattered about on all sides.

TERRIBLE TORNADO.—Fayetteville, Tenn., was nearly destroyed by a tornado on the 24th of February. Two churches, the market house, and several private houses, were completely prostrated. Over forty houses were greatly damaged. But the saddest of all is, that four persons were killed outright, and nearly twenty others badly wounded. A letter from the scene of destruction says:

"Pen cannot describe the awful scene. The world seemed to be coming to an end. The wind roared and blew with fearful violence, a perfect hurricane, amid which could be heard the shrieks of women and the screams of children, falling houses, crumbling walls, timbers dashing against timbers, mingled with peals of thunder; and the air was alive with electricity, followed by rain in torrents, and an impenetrable darkness, while still from every quarter came agonizing cries for assistance. Truly, it was a terrible scene! The heart sickens at the recollection. The tornado came from the south-west. The streets are almost entirely blocked with a confused mass of timbers, and not unfrequently the whole wreck of large houses was thrown and strewn for hundreds of yards."

AMERICAN PRODUCTS AT THE WORLD'S FAIR.—The whole number of American exhibitors will be 487, and the entire space required for the United States will be 26,000 feet. Of these exhibitors, 189 are from New York, 70 from Massachusetts, 64 Pennsylvania, 39 Ohio, 16 Maryland, 14 Vermont, 14 Virginia, 9 Connecticut, 7 New Hampshire, 7 South Carolina, 6 New Jersey, 6 Tennessee, 5 Rhode Island, 5 Kentucky, 5 Alabama, 4 Louisiana, 3 Indiana, 3 Missouri, 2 Mississippi, 2 California, 2 Michigan, 2 Maine, 2 District of Columbia, 1 Illinois, and 1 North Carolina.

A QUESTION FOR THE LAWYERS.—The Governor of Pennsylvania has sent a requisition to the Governor of Maryland for James S. Mitchell of Cecil County, charged with kidnapping a free negro and carrying him to Maryland. Mitchell's slave woman ran away five years ago, and during her absence had a child. The agent of the owner had secured her and the child and brought them back. The Governor of Pennsylvania considers the child free born. Governor Lowe refuses to deliver Mitchell as a fugitive, and has written a long letter to the Governor of Pennsylvania. He is sustained in his opinion by the Attorney-General.

POOR, YET MAKING MANY RICH.—The American Messenger says that Dr. Judson received between four and five thousand dollars as a present for his services as interpreter during the English and Burman war, the whole of which he placed at the disposal of the Baptist Board for missionary purposes. He also received nearly fourteen hundred dollars for the memoir of his second wife, which, with self-sacrificing devotion, he also laid upon the altar, and died a poor man.

SUMMARY.

The Providence Journal says:—Several of the New York papers state in their financial articles, that five new banks have been chartered by the General Assembly of Rhode Island at its recent session. This is an error. No charters were granted. Five bank charters were applied for, and the applications were postponed to the next session of the General Assembly, with an order of notice, according to the provisions of the Constitution.

During last week, considerable suspicion was expressed in regard to the safety of several banks in New York—the Lewis County, Hamilton Exchange, Hollister's Bank, &c.—in consequence of the reported failure of Hollister at Utica. All of them except the Lewis County Bank are now considered safe, and even that, it is thought, will be sustained.

The ship Memnon, Capt. Joseph R. Gordon, has recently made the run from San Francisco to Hong Kong in thirty-six days, being the shortest passage yet made between the two ports. She carried advices from New York via San Francisco in seventy-eight days, and seventeen days later than had been received by the overland mail.

The Empire City brought to New York on Saturday last a small chest of tea, which was only sixty-nine days on the route from Shanghai, China. It reached San Francisco in 34 days, and this city in 35 more. It was brought from San Francisco by Gregory's Express, and is intended as a present for President Fillmore.

Prof. Salomon, of Harrisburgh, Ky., is said to have discovered another motive power. He has successfully applied the entire power of carbonic acid gas as a substitute for steam in propelling enginery for every purpose. Prof. S. claims to be able to control it with perfect safety, and that it will afford a power equal to steam, in one fiftieth of the space, and one hundredth of the expense, dispensing with both furnaces and boilers.

The first Commencement of the Homeopathic College at Cleveland, O., took place on the 19th ult. The degree of M. D. was conferred upon 17 young men, 3 of whom are New Yorkers. The friends of the school are highly gratified by the success of their first course of homeopathic medical instruction.

Counterfeit twos on the Putnam County Bank, New York, an exact imitation of the genuine—vig. small state arms and figure 2. On the right upper end is the word "Two" in an oval die, and below is a country maid churning. On the left upper end the word "Two," with a blacksmith, anvil, &c., below.

Nathaniel Childs, Jr., the defaulting cashier of the Bank of Missouri, has been suspended from his official relations with the Methodist Episcopal Church South in St. Louis, until after the final decision of the civil suits now pending.

James Roberts, of Webster, Me., has been on trial for causing the death of an idiot pauper woman whom he had contracted to support, by cruel treatment, exposure to the cold, and refusal of sufficient and suitable food.

At Washington, a week ago last Sabbath, Joseph Wilson, of Massachusetts, clerk in the sixth Auditor's office, was wounded, it is feared mortally, by the accidental discharge of a pistol.

The Ohio Convention have adopted an article in their constitution which debars future legislatures from licensing the sale of intoxicating drinks as a beverage, and renders it imperative on them to protect the people from the evils of such sale. A similar provision is contained in the constitution of Michigan.

At Madrid Bend, Ky., a negro who had been placed at a stand in hunting deer, was seized by a panther, which the dogs had started, and was literally torn to pieces. Two white men who went to the rescue were wounded, and the ferocious animal escaped.

There has been much excitement in Tennessee in consequence of the appearance of Cholera at Franklin and Nashville. Late accounts from Franklin represent the disease as rapidly disappearing, and at Nashville there had been no new cases for several days.

A man by the name of Curtis, a resident of Roxford, Mass., in company with 2 Indians, on a recent hunting expedition along the lakes, and about the forests of the State of Maine, in four weeks took 49 deer, 5 moose, 3 bears, and about 200 partridges. The entire weight was 5,200 pounds.

The number of deaths in the City of Mexico, for the year 1850, was 15,336, of which 9,619 were from cholera alone. The number of births during the year was 8,329, showing a diminution in the population of 7,007.

The steamers from New York for Albany are carrying passengers for fifty cents—berths extra. This is less than one-third of a cent per mile; cheap enough, we should think, to satisfy the most economical.

Mr. Boruck, Agent of Gregory & Co.'s Express, states, that the custom-house officers at Mazatlan seized, on the 9th ult., at that port, upwards of $600,000 worth of contraband goods.

The Kingston (Jam.) Morning Journal of the 28th ult. says that the cholera was still prevailing in many parts of the Island, and in some districts had broken out a second time with increased malignity.

The negro Harris charged with assisting Chaplin in the abduction of slaves belonging to Messrs. Toombs and Stevens, was found guilty by the Criminal Court. The penalty is $200 fine and costs.

In the Legislature of Wisconsin, the Usury Bill, fixing the rate at 7 per cent. when no rate is mentioned, but allowing 12 per cent. on contract, has passed.

Nearly two thousand men are now employed on the New Haven and New London Railroad, which number will soon be increased to five thousand.

A dispatch dated New Orleans, Saturday, March 1, says that the steamer Coriana exploded her boilers yesterday, killing and wounding some eight or ten persons.

A company has been organized to connect Oswego by railroad with the Watertown and Rome Road, and a survey of the route ordered.

The Land Warrant Assignment Bill did not pass Congress, and consequently the Mexican land warrants are held at an advance.

Dr. Kraitsir, the distinguished Hungarian scholar, is about to deliver, in Salem, Mass., a course of lectures on philological subjects.

In the town of Franklin, Tenn., cholera has prevailed of late, and fourteen deaths had occurred from it.

The man Carnel, who murdered Rouseau, in New York, last fall, has been convicted of the crime.

Congress failed to make any appropriation for the publication of the census returns.

Senator Benton is sick with small pox at Washington.

MARRIED,

In Leonardsville, N. Y., on the morning of the 1st inst., by Eld. W. B. Maxson, Mr. JOHN K. BABCOCK, of Clarkville, and Miss MARY ANN DOWNING, of Leonardsville, N. Y.

In Clarkville, N. Y., Jan. 31, 1851, by Elias I. Maxson, Esq., Mr. JOHN J. SMITH, of Genesee, to Miss BRITTANIA ROBINSON, of the former place.

In Westerly, R. I., on the 22d of February, by Eld. Jacob Ayres, Mr. WM. C. TANNER, of South Stonington, Ct., to Miss LYDIA A. SAUNDERS, of Westerly, R. I.

DIED,

"Died at sea, on board steamer North America, at half past 10 o'clock A. M., Feb. 27th, ARNOLD BLISS, of Dartmouth, Mass., aged 61 years. Buried him at sea, in lat. 16, lon. 77, with becoming ceremonies, the Rev. John P. Gulliver officiating."

Mr. Bliss was the only son of the late Eld. Arnold Bliss, of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Newport, R. I., though a resident of Dartmouth, near New Bedford. He was a grandson of the celebrated Eld. William Bliss, of Newport, and cousin of Eld. Wm. B. Maxson, of Leonardsville, N. Y. He was a most estimable man and devoted Christian. Though he seldom had the privilege of mingling with his covenant brethren in social worship, yet he maintained the character of a faithful Sabbath-keeper, and a consistent disciple of Jesus Christ. His death will be deplored by a large circle of friends, and will be a severe affliction to his family and immediate relatives. He has left an amiable wife, two daughters, and six sisters, whose loss will be irreparable. T. B. S.

In Friendship, Allegany Co., N. Y., February 19th, 1851, LAFAYETTE J., son of Thomas and Diana M. Clarke, aged 16 years, 1 month, and 11 days. The funeral sermon was preached by Eld. N. V. Hull, from Jer. 19: 16. Thus has been early cut down by death a youth who promised much. As he grew in years, the goodness of his nature, manifested in numberless kindly offices, and the every-day development of his intellect, gave flattering promise of future usefulness. Being an only son, kind and loving parents looked upon Lafayette as their present joy and pride, and fondly imagined that he would in future be a staff on which they might lean for support, when gray hairs and the weakness of old age should come upon them. Though death has thus rudely broken the cords of affection, and veiled in gloom and anguish bright anticipations of the future, yet parents and friends mourn not as those without hope, believing that an adieu to the world, though their loss, is his gain. A. M. F. R.

In Darien, N. Y., Feb. 26, 1850, of consumption, LYDIA ANN SAUNDERS, aged 34 years. Sister S. was a member of the Clarence Church. In health she gained, by her generous, unassuming, and affectionate deportment, the highest esteem of her associates; and through two years of decline, her patience, resignation, and trust in the Lord, gave full proof that her home was in heaven. Before her spirit fled, a heavenly smile lighted her countenance, and she uttered words of consolation, which caused mourning friends to give glory to God. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord." L. M. C.

In Brookfield, N. Y., Feb. 24, Mr. PAUL CRANDALL, aged 83 years. Mr. C. gave satisfactory evidence to his family and friends that he was prepared for his change.

In Jacksonville, (Laurens,) N. Y., Feb. 24th, Mrs. CYNTHIA CLARKE, aged fifty-six years.

In Amity, N. Y., on the 13th ult., of a fever, LOUISA MILLARD, daughter of Clark Millard of Genesee, in the 24th year of her age. H. P. C.

Agents Wanted,

FOR THE "BEST JUVENILE MAGAZINE IN AMERICA."

WOODWORTH'S YOUTH'S CABINET, elegantly illustrated, and filled with the choicest gems for the young, has recently entered upon a new volume. It is more attractive and popular than ever. "It is a little world within itself," to use the language of a metropolitan newspaper; and the price is only $1 a year.

Now is the time for Agents. The publisher wishes to employ fifty or more gentlemen, in different parts of the Union—North, South, East, and West—to act as Agents for the work. Their business will be to travel and to obtain subscribers. There is no periodical, of whatever character, which commands so ready and so general favor as Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet. It is a universal favorite. Those who devote their time wholly or mainly to the interests of this publication, will receive a compensation which cannot fail to be satisfactory.

Persons desiring an agency will please address the publisher (post-paid) with responsible testimonials as to character and ability. No time should be lost, as now is the best time to subscribe. Every particular respecting the agency will be immediately forwarded on application. Specimens of the work sent gratis.

D. A. WOODWORTH, 118 Nassau-st., N. Y.

In Preparation—Valuable New Works.

NATIONAL SERIES OF AMERICAN HISTORIES.—GOULD & LINCOLN have in course of preparation a series of Histories of the most interesting and important events which have occurred in the United States since the first settlement of the country. They will embrace the trials and adventures of the early colonists, both at the North and the South, their peculiarities of character and manners, their intercourse and conflicts with the natives, the gradual development of their institutions, sketches of their prominent men in both the Church and the State, incidents in the Revolution, with various other subjects of interest of more recent date. It is intended to be a NATIONAL SERIES OF AMERICAN HISTORY, adapted to the popular mind, and especially to the youth of our country, illustrated with numerous fine engravings; each volume to be complete in itself; yet, when all are published, to form a regular consecutive series, consisting of twelve or more volumes, 13mo, of about 300 pages each.

Cyclopedia of Anecdotes of Literature and the Fine Arts. ALSO, CYCLOPEDIA OF SCIENTIFIC ANECDOTES.

The First, containing a copious and choice selection of Anecdotes on the various forms of Literature, of the Arts, of Architecture, Engravings, Music, Poetry, Painting, and Sculpture, and of the most celebrated Literary Characters and Artists of different countries and ages.

The Second, containing a similar selection respecting the various Sciences and Mechanical Arts, of their most distinguished votaries. The two together, embracing the larger portion of the best Anecdotes in Ancient and Modern collections, as well as in various Histories, Biographies, and Files of Periodical Literature.

The whole classified under appropriate subjects, alphabetically arranged, and each supplied with a very full and particular index of topics and names, by KAZLITT ARVINE, A. M., author of "Cyclopedia of Moral and Religious Anecdotes;" the whole to be comprised in Sixteen Numbers, at 25 cents per Number, making two large 8vo volumes of about 700 pages each, illustrated with numerous fine engravings. The first number will be issued about the first of April, to be continued semi-monthly until completed.

Daguerrean Gallery.

GURNEY'S Daguerrean Gallery, No. 189 Broadway, has been known for years as one of the first establishments of the kind in the United States, and the oldest in the city of New York. He has recently greatly enlarged his Gallery by the addition of more rooms and large skylights, and other improvements, rendering it one of the most extensive establishments in this country. Mr. G. attends personally to his sitters, and from his great experience in the art he is enabled, at all times, to give perfect satisfaction. The large-sized pictures recently taken by his new process are universally acknowledged superior to any heretofore taken in this country. A large collection can be seen at all hours of the day. Ladies and gentlemen are respectfully invited to examine them.

New York and Boston Steamboats.

REGULAR MAIL LINE BETWEEN NEW YORK AND BOSTON, via Stonington and Providence. Inland route, without ferry, change of cars or baggage! The steamers C. VANDERBILT, Capt. Joel Stone, and COMMODORE, Capt. William H. Frazee, in connection with the Stonington and Providence, and Boston and Providence Railroads, leaving New York daily, (Sundays excepted,) from pier 2 North River, first wharf above Battery Place, at 5 o'clock P. M., and Stonington at 8 o'clock P. M., or upon the arrival of the mail train from Boston. The C. Vanderbilt will leave New York Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday. Leave Stonington Monday, Wednesday, and Friday. The Commodore will leave New York Monday, Wednesday, and Friday. Leave Stonington Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday.

Methodist Quarterly Review.

THIS Review contains 160 pages Octavo, printed on fine paper. At the subscription price of TWO DOLLARS a year, in advance, it is the cheapest Quarterly Journal now issued. The publishers issue it at this low price, in expectation of greatly enlarging its list of subscribers, which, though by no means what it ought to be, is yet, as it is believed, twice as large as that of any similar Journal.

While the theology of the Methodist Episcopal Church is the standard for the Review, its tone is large and liberal, and its range of topics, not only in Biblical but General Literature, is extensive, as its Table of Contents will show. Its contributors are among the ablest writers in this country, of various religious denominations.

From its wide circulation, the Quarterly affords a most desirable medium of Literary Advertising. All advertisements, and books for notice, should be sent to the Editor, Rev. J. M'Clintock, D. D., 200 Mulberry-st.

Miscellaneous.

The Old Farmer's Elegy.

On a green grassy knoll, by the banks of the brook,
That so long and so often has watered his flock,
The old farmer rests in his long and last sleep,
While the waters a low, lisping lullaby keep;
He has ploughed his last furrow, has reaped his last grain;
No morn shall awake him to labor again.

The blue bird sings sweet on the gay maple bough,
Its warbling oft cheered him while holding the plough;
And the robins above him hop light on the mould,
For he fed them with crumbs when the season was cold;
He has ploughed his last furrow, has reaped his last grain;
No morn shall awake him to labor again.

Yon tree that with fragrance is filling the air,
So rich with its blossoms, so thrifty and fair,
By his own hand was planted, and well did he say,
It would live when its planter had mouldered away;
He has ploughed his last furrow, has reaped his last grain;
No morn shall awake him to labor again.

There's the well that he dug, with the water so cold,
With its wet dripping bucket, so mossy and old,
No more from its depths by the patriarch drawn,
"For the pitcher is broken"—the old man is gone!
He has ploughed his last furrow, has reaped his last grain;
No morn shall awake him to labor again.

'T was a gloom-giving day when the old farmer died;
And the stout-hearted mourned, the affectionate cried;
And the prayers of the just for his rest did ascend,
For they all lost a BROTHER, a MAN, and a FRIEND;
He has ploughed his last furrow, has reaped his last grain;
No morn shall awake him to labor again.

For upright and honest the old farmer was;
His God he revered, he respected His laws;
Though fameless he lived, he has gone where his worth
Will outshine, like pure gold, all the dross of this earth;
He has ploughed his last furrow, has reaped his last grain;
No morn shall awake him to labor again!

Cheap Postage Law.

An Act to reduce and modify the rates of Postage in the United States and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, from the thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and fifty-one, in lieu of the rates of postage now established by law, there shall be charged the following rates, to wit: For every single letter in manuscript, or paper of any kind upon which information shall be asked for or communicated in writing, or by marks or signs, conveyed in the mail, for any distance between places within the United States not exceeding three thousand miles, when the postage upon such letter shall have been prepaid, three cents, and five cents when the postage thereon shall not have been prepaid; and for any distance exceeding three thousand miles, double these rates; for every such single letter or paper when conveyed wholly or in part by sea, and to or from a foreign country, for any distance over twenty-five hundred miles, twenty cents, and for any distance under twenty-five hundred miles, ten cents, (excepting, however, all cases where such postages have been or shall be adjusted at different rates by postal treaty or convention, already concluded or hereafter to be made;) and for a double letter there shall be charged double the rates above specified; and for a treble letter, treble those rates; and for a quadruple letter, quadruple those rates; and every letter or parcel not exceeding half an ounce in weight, shall be deemed a single letter; and every additional weight of half an ounce, or additional weight of less than half an ounce, shall be charged with an additional single postage. And all drop letters, or letters placed in any post office, not for transmission, but for delivery only, shall be charged with postage at the rate of one cent each; and all letters hereafter advertised as remaining over or uncalled for in any post office, shall be charged with one cent in addition to the regular postage, both to be accounted for as other postages now are.

SEC. 2 And be it further enacted, That all newspapers not exceeding three ounces in weight, sent from the office of publication to actual and bona fide subscribers, shall be charged with postage as follows, to wit: All newspapers published weekly only, shall circulate in the mail free of postage within the county where published, and the postage on the regular number of a newspaper published weekly, for any distance not exceeding fifty miles out of the county where published, shall be five cents per quarter; for any distance exceeding fifty miles, and not exceeding three hundred miles, ten cents per quarter; for any distance exceeding three hundred miles and not exceeding one thousand, fifteen cents per quarter, for any distance exceeding one thousand miles and not exceeding two thousand miles, twenty cents per quarter; for any distance exceeding two thousand miles and not exceeding four thousand miles, twenty-five cents per quarter; and for any distance exceeding four thousand miles, thirty cents per quarter; and all newspapers published monthly, and sent to actual and bona fide subscribers, shall be charged with one-fourth the foregoing rates; and papers published semi-weekly shall be charged double those rates; tri-weekly, treble those rates; and oftener than tri-weekly, five times those rates. And there shall be charged upon every other newspaper, and each circular not sealed, handbill, engraving, pamphlet, periodical, magazine, book, and every other description of printed matter, which shall be unconnected with any manuscript, or written matter, and which it may be lawful to transmit through the mail, of no greater weight than one ounce, for any distance not exceeding five hundred miles, one cent; and for each additional ounce, or fraction of an ounce, one cent; for any distance exceeding five hundred miles and not exceeding one thousand five hundred miles, double those rates; for any distance exceeding one thousand five hundred miles and not exceeding two thousand five hundred miles, treble those rates; for any distance exceeding two thousand five hundred miles and not exceeding three thousand five hundred miles, four times those rates; for any distance exceeding three thousand five hundred miles, five times those rates. Subscribers to all periodicals shall be required to pay one quarter's postage in advance; in all such cases the postage shall be one half the foregoing rates. Bound books, and parcels of printed matter not weighing over thirty-two ounces, shall be deemed mailable matter, under the provisions of this section. And the postage on all printed matter other than newspapers and periodicals published at intervals, not exceeding three months, and sent from the office of publication to actual and bona fide subscribers, to be prepaid; and in ascertaining the weight of newspapers for the purpose of determining the amount of postage chargeable thereon, they shall be weighed when in a dry state. And whenever any printed matter on which the postage is required by this section to be prepaid shall, through the inattention of postmasters, or otherwise, be sent without prepayment, the same shall be charged with double the amount of postage which would have been chargeable thereon if the postage had been prepaid; but nothing in this act contained shall subject to postage any matter which is exempted from the payment of postage by any existing law. And the Postmaster General, by and with the advice and consent of the President of the United States, shall be and is hereby authorized to reduce or enlarge, from time to time, the rates of postage upon all letters and other mailable matter conveyed between the United States and any foreign country, for the purpose of making better postal arrangements with other governments, or counteracting any adverse measures affecting our postal intercourse with foreign countries; and postmasters at the office of delivery are hereby authorized, and it shall be their duty, to remove wrappers and envelops from all printed matter and pamphlets not charged with letter postage, for the purposes of ascertaining whether there is upon or connected with any such printed matter, or in such package, any matter or thing which would authorize or require the charge of a higher rate of postage thereon. And all publishers of pamphlets, periodicals, magazines, and newspapers which shall not exceed sixteen ounces in weight, shall be allowed to interchange their publications reciprocally free of postage; Provided, That such interchange shall be confined to a single copy of each publication; And provided, also, That said publishers may enclose in their publications the bills for subscriptions thereto without any additional charge for postoge; And provided, further, That in all cases where newspapers shall not contain over three hundred square inches they may be transmitted through the mails by the publishers to bona fide subscribers at one-fourth the rates fixed by this act.

SEC. 3 requires the Postmaster General to provide suitable postage stamps, and makes it a felony, punishable with not over $500 fine or five years imprisonment, to counterfeit such stamps.

SEC. 4 requires postmasters to deface stamps so as to prevent their being used a second time.

SEC. 5 requires postmasters, in villages or cities where there are newspapers, to publish lists of letters not called for.

SEC. 6 authorizes the Postmaster General to increase the commissions of postmasters in certain cases.

SEC. 7 forbids a diminution of post office facilities in consequence of any diminution of revenue which this bill may occasion.

SEC. 8 gives the Department $500,000 for mail service performed for the two Houses of Congress.

SEC. 9 appropriates from the Treasury $500,000 to meet any deficiency of receipts for postage.

SEC. 10 requires the establishment of city postmen to convey letters to and from city offices.

SEC. 11 authorizes the coinage of three-cent pieces, of three-fourths silver and one-fourth copper.

Approved March 3, 1851.

The Great Indian Cave.

From the Franklin (Ia.) Examiner.

I last week visited a newly discovered cave in Crawford County, Indiana. It is on the right bank of Blue river. For magnificence and beauty of scenery, it promises, when fully explored, to rival even the Mammoth Cave of Kentucky. The Epsom Salts Cave, known for nearly half a century, and successfully worked for saltpetre and salts many years since, is about 2 miles long, and in some places 40 or 50 feet wide, and 75 feet high; but has nothing peculiarly interesting in it except a beautiful fluted column, some 25 feet in diameter, and 25 or 30 feet high, all of stalactic matter.

Entering this cave under a jutting rock near the brow of a lofty hill, and descending for about a quarter of a mile, at an angle of 30 or 40 degrees, we entered a small door, and after stooping rather uncomfortably for 60 yards, found ourselves in a large open cave, or bat-room, in which tens of thousands of these little animals hang suspended from the rocks in large clusters, like bees in swarming. Farther on, sticks, the hop-poles, hickory bark, charcoal, and bare footed human tracks were discovered, which must have remained there for a long time, as the door to this part of the cave was so blocked up with rocks when first discovered that a man could not possibly pass. We soon entered an avenue 40 feet wide, and varying in hight from 10 to 60 feet—the ceiling as smooth and beautiful as if finished by the trowel; then suddenly changing, presents the appearance of diversified hanging drapery, and of spotless white. Then again the naked rocks appear. At the end of this avenue we found ourselves at the foot of a rocky pyramid, up which we climbed some 60 feet, and on the top of which stand two beautiful stalagmites, some five feet high, eighteen inches in diameter, and as white as the purest Indian marble; and when viewed by the dim light of our candles, presented a strong contrast with the grey walls of limestone rock. An oblong canopy, some 40 or 50 feet high, is here hung with beautiful stalactites, suspended from the ceiling. We now found it necessary to crawl on our faces, "snake it," for a about 20 feet, when we came into an avenue wide and high. Turning suddenly to the left, we found ourselves in the midst of scenery of surpassing and exquisite beauty. The entire walls are covered with an incrustation of sulphite of lime, crystalized so as to glisten like ten thousand diamonds in the light. Some of these crystals, a foot in length, an inch wide, and as thick as a table-knife blade, grew upon this base in a thousand diversified forms. Upon a projecting rock at one side of the avenue, great numbers had broken by their weight, and were lying in great profusion at the bottom of the cave. These formations, like the base upon which they grew, are sulphate, and as white as the driven snow. Others, resembling glass, form upon the ceiling as well as the floor, from an inch in diameter to the length and size of a common knitting needle, and even smaller. The incrustation is frequently an inch thick, but more generally, from an eighth to a quarter of an inch thick. Much of it has fallen to the floor, and is crushed under the feet of the visitor, and the place it occupied on the ceiling is being replaced by new formations. But I am utterly unable to describe it. It must be seen to be appreciated, or any correct idea formed of its beauty.

We visited many rooms with spacious domes, and stalactics of every imaginable size and form. In one apartment the water finds its way over a large range of projecting rocks, and the stalactite matter is formed in folds and blades like extended honey combs, and hangs like drapery around the sides of the room. Upon the bottom is formed a great number of little pools of every form, elevated upon the floor like basins or troughs—the rim of each being perfectly level and inclined inward, the stone which forms the basin being not thicker than a paste-board.

I spent three days in this wonderful hole in the ground—say seven hours each day. The first two days were spent in examining and exploring, and I think we must have traveled at least one mile per hour, or fourteen miles in two days. The third day, I re-visited the most interesting parts to procure specimens for geological investigation. I had forgotten to say that saltpetre and epsom salts are found in various parts, in large quantities, and I procured a lump of salts of half a pound weight, quite pure. We ventured a mile at least further than any other had ever gone before, and left it for others still to prosecute. A quite transparent eyeless crawfish which we found, was not the least interesting thing we saw.

The entrance to the cave belongs to Henry P. Rathbrack, a wealthy and generous gentleman, who cheerfully rendered us every facility for examining the cave, and attended us as guide. I have no doubt, when it is fully explored and surveyed, it will prove to be one of the wonders of Hoosierdom.

Very respectfully, S. BUTLER.

Prison Statistics.

The following Prison Statistics are mostly gathered from the Annual Reports of the institutions named.

In New Jersey, the number of prisoners received in the State Prison during the year 1850 was 122. These are sentenced for terms varying from nine months to fifteen years. Of the whole number, 66 are entered as persons of "no trade." The Prison is full to overflowing, an unusual increase having occurred during the year; with "every probability (says the Report) that it will continue."

The Warden of the Ohio Penitentiary, Mr. Laurin Dewey, has made an able and interesting report to the Legislature of the State on the subject of Prisons and Prison Discipline. Mr. Dewey was commissioned by the Legislature to examine and report upon the modes of discipline adopted in the different States of the Union, and gives the results of his mission in a voluminous Report. It appears from these statements that the Western Penitentiary of Pennsylvania was erected in 1817, and that the whole number of prisoners received from that period to the present is 1,370. The Eastern Penitentiary of the same State was erected in 1829; total number of prisoners received not given; number now in confinement, 313. The Virginia Penitentiary was opened in 1800, and is now the oldest in the United States; contains 198 prisoners. The Maryland Penitentiary has been completed forty years; has 24 officers, and 228 prisoners. The Sing Sing Prison was erected in 1825; contains 734 inmates. In Connecticut, the Penitentiary was erected in Wethersfield in 1827; has 161 prisoners. In Massachusetts, there were in October last, 450 State Prison convicts. In Michigan there are 131 convicts; being an increase of 22 during the past year.

California Farming.

The following, from the Journal of Commerce, is a California account of California farming:—

Mr. James Horner hails from Monmouth County, N. J. His farm is now located at the mission of San Jose, (about 40 miles from San Francisco.) He came here four years since, over land, and has his wife with him. Mr. Horner planted about 130 acres of Potatoes, yielding him a crop of 35,000 bushels, averaging 50 lbs. to the bushel, and 270 bushels to the acre. The crop will average ten cents per pound, or the enormous sum of one hundred and seventy five thousand dollars; or, what is the same thing, the whole yield of 130 acres was 35,000 bushels, and sold at $5 per bushel. He also raised from four acres of land forty thousand pounds of Onions, which he sold at an average of 40 cents per pound, (some of them weighing 4 pounds each,) and which crop of Onions produced $16,000, (say four acres of Onions, 40,000 lbs., 40 cents per pound.) As for Cabbages, he planted 70,000, and raised forty thousand head for market, which he sold on the average at 40 cents each, or say $16,000, from 15 acres. He also raised 50,000 pounds of Tomatoes, which he sold at prices varying from 10 to 20 cents per pound—producing the handsome sum of $6,250. And now for the Pumpkins, about 40 tuns, which he sold at 6 cents per pound, some of them weighing 74 pounds each, but averaging 30 pounds each; these equaled the sum of $4,806.

To sum up all, we find the pronuct of this farm of less than 150 acres, was as follows:

Potatoes	$175,000	Tomatoes	$6,250
Onions	16,000	Pumkins	4,800
Cabbages	16,000
Total product,			$217,250

Analysis of the Apple.

An interesting paper on the analysis of the fruit of the apple, by Dr. Salisbury, furnishes some facts worthy of notice. Six sorts were examined, viz; Swaar, Kilham Hill, Rhode Island Greening, English Russet, Roxbury Russet, and Talman Sweeting. From the numerous tables of results, the following facts are drawn:—

The English Russet contains less water and more dry matter than any of the other sorts. This is doubtless the reason why this variety is so hard to freeze. The Talman Sweeting contains more, the Greening still more, and the Kilham Hill most of all; ranging in all these from 79 to 86 per cent. A fresh potato contains about as much water as the Russet. These results show the reason that apples, when manufactured into cider, produce nearly their own bulk of juice, a fact which has often puzzled many who merely regarded the solid nature of the fruit.

A striking difference in the composition of the apple and potato, is the entire absence of starch in the former, while in the latter it constitutes about one half of the solid part. The apple, according to this analysis, is rather superior to the potato in the fat-producing qualities, and which accords with the experience of some accurate farmers. The apple contains about twice as much of the compounds of nitrogen as the potato.

The Russets were found to contain a larger portion of tannic and gallic acids than any other sorts. These acids impart astringency, and are indicated by the black color given to a knife of iron or steel used in cutting this fruit. The apple is rich in phosphoric and sulphuric acids, and potash and soda. Hence we may infer that bonedust, ashes, salt, and plaster would be likely to prove useful as portions of the manure applied to a bearing tree, in addition to what is already contained in yard manure.

TOLERATION.—When Abraham sat at his tent door, according to his custom, waiting to entertain strangers, he espied an old man stooping and leaning on his staff, weary with age and travail, coming towards him, who was a hundred years of age. He received him kindly, washed his feet, provided supper, caused him to sit down; but observing that the old man eat and prayed not, nor begged for a blessing on his meat, he asked him why he did not worship the God of heaven. The old man told him that he worshiped the fire only, and acknowledged no other God. At which answer Abraham grew so zealously angry, that he thrust the old man out of his tent, and exposed him to all the evils of the night, and an unguarded condition. When the old man was gone, God called to Abraham, and asked him where the stranger was? He replied, I thrust him away because he did not worship thee. God answered him, I have suffered him these hundred years, although he dishonored me; and could'st not thou endure him one night? [Bishop Taylor.

THE MANNER OF RETREAT OF ARAB TRIBES.—When an Arab tribe is pursued by an enemy, they sleep, and take their food without halting. That they may not fall from their camels while sleeping, they stretch themselves out at length, placing their feet in a bag on each side of the animal's neck. Their food is prepared by the women. One, mounted on a camel loaded with wheat, continues grinding with a hand-mill, and passes the meal to another, who is provided with leathern water bottles suspended on each side of her camel; she having prepared the paste, passes it to a third, who completes the operation by baking the bread in thin slices on a chafing dish, or portable oven, which is heated with wood or straw. This bread, with a portion of cheese and dates, is then distributed by her to whom it is her province to feed, and the frugal meal is finished with a draught of camel's milk. The camels also are milked as they walk, the men using for this purpose large wooden bowls, which are passed from one to another.

AMERICAN RIVERS AND ROADS.—The Scientific American says that in less than two years travelers can step into a railroad car at New York, and proceed by an uninterrupted railroad to Galena, on the Mississippi, in Illinois, a distance of twelve hundred miles. The links to complete this chain are now being constructed; and in ten years from the present time an interior line of railroad will be opened between New York and San Francisco. In number, length, and greatness of rivers, this country excels all others; and in a few years our artificial lines of communication will far exceed any other country.

SALARIES OF CLERGYMEN.—The following is the average rate of salaries per annum of the clergy in different countries, as collected from an article in the Independent, and from other sources:—Hungary, $250; Sweden, $300; United States, $375; English Dissenting Churches, $325; English Established Church, $700; Holland, $500; Norway, $1,200; Austria, $1,200.

The Duke of Wellington once left his umbrella by accident on the stall of a lady of rank, at a fair. On returning to look for it, he was told that the umbrella had just been sold for twenty-five guineas by the lady, who could not resist the temptation of disposing of so valuable a relic, for charitable purposes.

UNITED STATES ARMS.—A few days since, the President of the Senate laid before that body a communication from the Secretary of War, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 19th ult., transmitting a report from the chief of the Ordnance Bureau, exhibiting the number of muskets, rifles, and pistols belonging to the United States armories, arsenals, and ordnance depots, together with an estimate of the number which the materials now on hand would complete. The statement shows the whole number as follows:—

Whole number of muskets fit for service, of every description	511,259
Number unserviceable	8,818
Whole number of rifles, of every kind	61,891
Number unserviceable	8,166
Whole number of pistols, of every description	25,374
Number unserviceable	1,915

The estimate is, that the materials on hand will serve to complete 26,300 muskets and 4,200 rifles.

A NEWSPAPER.—It was Bishop Horner's opinion, that there is no better moralist than a newspaper. He says, "The follies, vices, and consequent miseries, of multitudes displayed in a newspaper, are so many beacons continually burning to turn others from the rock on which they have been shipwrecked. What more powerful dissuasive from suspicion, jealousy and anger than the story of one friend murdered by another in a duel? What caution likely to be more effectual against gambling and profligacy, than the mournful relation of an execution or the fate of a despairing suicide? What finer lecture on the necessity of economy, than the auctions of estates, houses and furniture? Only take a newspaper, and consider it well—pay for it—read it—and it will instruct thee."

AUSTRALIAN TREES.—In Australia there are the highest trees in the world. One, of an unknown kind, has been found there measuring 220 feet from the ground to the lowest branch. At the base this tree is 30 feet in diameter and at the height of the first branch 12 feet; at the ground its circumference is 130 feet; at three feet high, 102 feet. This tree is perfectly sound; it stands in a forest of sassafras. Another sort of great tree there is called Eucalyptis gigantea. It rises to the height of 300 feet, and often has 40 feet circumference. Its bark is excellent for tanning, being twice as strong as oak bark.

Variety.

A college student gave his fellow student the lie, and a challenge followed. The mathematical tutor heard of the difficulty, and sent for the young man who gave the challenge, who insisted that he must fight to shield his honor.

"Why?" asked the tutor.

"Because he gave me the lie."

"Very well; let him prove it. If he proves it, you did lie; but if he does not prove it, then he lies. Why should you shoot one another? Will that make a lie any more honorable?"

Gen. H. Tarver, of Twiggs Co., Georgia, is the largest slaveholder, if not the wealthiest man, in the State. He owns a thousand negroes and fifty thousand acres of land, divided into ten plantations, in Twiggs, Pulaski, Houston, and Baker counties, yielding about two thousand bales of cotton annually. At twelve cents a pound his crop will yield him $208,000.

The King of Dahomey has had some coffins made at Hamburg for the use of himself and the members of his illustrious family when they shall have departed this mortal life. They are in a great style of splendor, the King's own box costing $4,000. At each side of the head are fixed liquor cases, with decanters and glasses, so that the defunct may be able to wet his whistle. The coffin is lined with cushions of red satin, and adorned on the outside with ornaments of bronze and carving. It is supported with a lion of metal at each corner.

An old officer on the retired list, residing at Creteil, near Paris, lately committed suicide from grief at the death of his horse, which, since his retirement from the service, he had nursed with the most assiduous care, and when dead he had buried in his garden. Some neighbors, becoming alarmed at not seeing him appear as usual, entered the house, where they found him hanging in his bed-room. A letter was lying on the table, which contained these words, "My poor horse is dead, and I cannot survive it."

John Adams, in his Diary, states a curious fact, that out of eight prominent members of the Boston bar, in 1753, with whom he happened to be one evening discussing the encroachments of England upon the colonies, only one, Adams himself, lived through the Revolution as an advocate of American independence. Five adhered to Great Britain: Gridley, Auchmuty, Fitch, Kent, and Hutchinson. Thatcher died in 1765, and Otis became incapacitated in 1771.

At one time there were two members of the English House of Commons named Montagu Mathew and Mathew Montagu; the former a tall, handsome man, and the other a little man. During a session of Parliament, the speaker having addressed the latter as the former, Montagu Mathew observed, that it was strange he should make such a mistake, as there was as great a difference between them as between a horse chesnut and a chesnut horse!

Byron had great respect for the opinions of Americans. Alluding to a report he had heard, that Washington Irving admired his poems, he wrote to a friend, "I consider this quite a feather in my cap." He remarked in the same letter, that he had rather have a nod from an American than a gold snuff-box from an Emperor.

One of the conductors on the New Haven Railroad, whose speech, smacking of the French or German accent, subjects him to an occasional quiz from the passengers, was wished "A Happy New Year" by one of them, during the trip on New Year's Day. "Oh! tank you, sar, Merry Christmas, April Fool, Fours July, and all ze rest," was his reply.

The Chinese have an axiom, and a beautiful truism it is, too, that when a person is idle a single day, without just cause or necessity, some one must suffer by it.

The civilized was the natural state, so long as man continued in communion with God. The savage state was the awful consequence of deserting God.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year of this Seminary, for 1850 and '51, will commence the third Wednesday in August, and continue forty-four weeks; including a short recess between the terms, and one of ten days for the winter holidays.

The year is divided into three terms:—

The first, of 14 weeks, begins Wednesday, August 21st, and ends Wednesday, November 27th.

The second, of 15 weeks, begins Monday, December 2d, and ends Friday, March 14th.

The third, of 14 weeks, begins Tuesday, March 18th, and ends Tuesday, June 24th.

Board of Instruction.

GURDON EVANS, A. M., President,
And Professor of Mathematics and Natural Science.
Rev. JOSEPH W. MORTON,
Professor of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, Spanish, and Moral and Intellectual Science.
Mrs. SUSANNA M. SPICER, Preceptress.
ADOLPH ROSENHAYN,
(Late of Friedrick Wilhelm College, Berlin,)
Teacher of German, Piano Forte, and Assistant in Greek and Latin.

Other competent Teachers will be employed as occasion may demand.

TEACHERS' CLASSES will be formed, as usual, at the beginning of the Fall and middle of the Winter Terms, and continue seven weeks.

In the Common Branches, classes will be formed at the commencement of each term; but in the higher, the interest of the student, as well as the welfare of the Institution, demand that a more systematic course of study be pursued.

In the Natural Sciences, Elementary Chemistry and Philosophy will be pursued during the Fall Term Agricultural Chemistry, Astronomy, and Physiology during the Winter Term; Botany and Geology during the Summer Term.

Classes will be formed in Latin, French, and German, at the commencement of the Fall Term; in Hebrew, Greek, and Spanish, at the commencement of the Winter Term, and continue through the course of study.

In Mathematics, Geometry is studied in the Fall, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, and Astronomy, Surveying, Navigation, &c., in the Summer Term.

The course of instruction in Agriculture is thorougly scientific, embracing study and recitation in the best authors. Instruction is given in a well-furnished laboratory, in the analysis of soils, ashes of plants, manures, &c. and the modes of testing for their constituent elements. The attention of farmers who wish to give their sons a practical education is especially called to this department.

Board in private families, from $1 25 to $1 50. Many students board in clubs for 60 to 75 cents.

TUITION—to be settled upon entering school—from $3 00 to $5 00. EXTRAS—For Drawing, $1 00; Oil Painting, $5 00; Chemical Experiments, $1 00; Writing, including stationery, 50 cents; Piano Forte, $8 00; Use of Instrument, $2 00; Agricultural Chemistry, including chemicals, apparatus, and fuel, (breakage extra,) $12 00.

It is very desirable that students should enter at the beginning of the term; yet they are received into classes already formed at any time.

For farther information, address Gurdon Evans, J. W. Morton, or Rev. J. R. Irish, President of the Corporation.

OBLIGATION OF THE SABBATH.

Reply to "Exodus."

"Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven; but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven." MATT. 5: 20.

MESSRS. EDITORS:—I have read with interest, not unmixed with melancholy, the ingenious defense, by "Exodus," of the six Anti-sabbatarian propositions. It is written with vivacity and force, is courteous in tone, and its argument is lawyer-like in subtlety, brilliancy, and strength.

If (as he claims by the text he has prefixed as a motto) he regards himself as defending Christian liberty, I honor his motives; but at the same time must lament that he entertains such views of the Sabbath as to suppose it was ever to pious men a burden and a bondage. The good of old were taught of God to "call the Sabbath a delight." A very different class of men were they who said, "What a weariness is it!" "When will the Sabbath be gone?"

Should not this single Scriptural contrast suggest to his mind that, after all, his views may be wrong? And, if wrong, then dangerous? Is the liberty which Christ has come to give us, a liberty from, or a liberty to, holy delight? Is it not the uniform effect of a spiritual change in true conversion, (I put it to the observation and Christian experience of every one,) to endear to us the day of religious rest? Would my brother wish it otherwise?

A word as to my standpoint and aim in this discussion seems necessary. Let no man think me the advocate of Jewish prejudice or religious intolerance. All my principles forbid it. I honor no class of men more highly than the apostles and champions of religious liberty. In this respect I belong to the school of Roger Williams, or rather, let me say to the glory of our common Master, to the school of Christ. Of him I have learned to "call no man master on earth," and to forbid no man to do good because he follows not with me. I go all lengths with my brother in his abhorrence of bigotry. I say with Paul, that great apostle of Christian liberty, "Let us not, therefore, judge one another any more; but judge this rather, that no man put a stumbling block, or an occasion to fall, in his brother's way." Rom. 14: 13. I trust he will believe me when I say, that while I entirely acquit him of all such intention, I could not suppress the apprehension that such an ill effect as is here deprecated, might follow from the confident tone and natural tendency of the "six propositions" against the divine authority of the Sabbath, as they appeared in the "Public Ledger." In the ingenious and earnest defender of those propositions, I think I recognize their original author. I know they were published in vindication of the course of our City Mayor; it may be presumed, therefore, from humane and honorable motives. Pardon me if I deemed the defense more dangerous than even the example. I thought that might possibly (I neither know nor affirm anything in the case) be justified on the score of necessity; or, if not, might work merely a local and temporary mischief; but this (I mean the mode of defense assumed in the "propositions") might lead to wide and interminable evil, by "making void" a fundamental commandment of "the law of God." For this reason I wrote at first, and for this reason I now resume the pen. Had "Exodus," in his reply, convinced me of any radical error in my position, or fundamental truth in his own, I should have acknowledged it as cheerfully as I shall any incidental defect he has pointed out in my statements or reasoning. I hope, notwithstanding some strong expressions on his part, to find him at least equally open to conviction.

I must repeat my regret, that I have so little leisure to give to a discussion so seasonable, so practical, and, in its relations to the Law and the Gospel, so fundamental and all-pervading. I almost envy my friend, whose opening words on occupying "a small space" by a "few remarks," when compared with the space actually filled by his defense, suggests to me the idea of an unlimited affluence of time. Limited as my own time is, I have felt obliged to enter thus fully into the preliminary explanations required by the motto he has chosen, lest any should misjudge my standpoint. The question is not whether we shall "stand fast in the liberty" of the Gospel; this I mean to do as well as he. The question between us really is, Has Christ, who has made us free from the obligation of the Jewish ritual, made us free from any commandment of the Decalogue? In other words, Has Christ annulled the Sabbath? This "Exodus" affirms, and I deny.

I now come to the first proposition, "That there is but one Bible Sabbath, and that the Saturday Sabbath." "Exodus," in his defense, has ingeniously dropped the last clause of this complex proposition, though it is the only one I have ever denied.* I willingly concede, that the Sabbath, under all dispensations, is substantially one, with only circumstantial differences suiting each dispensation. But this is not the meaning of "Exodus." He contends that there is but one Bible Sabbath, and that one, the Jewish Sabbath, in all its circumstances and details; in a word, that the law of the Sabbath begins and ends with that nation only. This is the real meaning of the original proposition. Here it is that I take issue with it and with him.

"Exodus" says very truly, that no one can assail it by "venturing to affirm." I give him all credit for this logical discovery. But I beg leave to remind him, that neither can it be sustained by "venturing to affirm" the original proposition. I admit the justice of his demand on my part for "chapter and verse" touching what I propose to prove, and shall therefore hold him to the same.

When I said that the Decalogue knows nothing of Saturday, and that from the Decalogue alone no one could determine the day of the week, I did not mean to deny, (as my reference to Exodus 16 shows,) that it could be otherwise ascertained; and I fully concur with my friend, that "if once ascertained, it becomes the exclusive object of the law's consideration, and engrosses its entire authority." But I must at the same time remind him, that this very mode of fixing the particular day of the week by miracle, is a circumstance applicable alike to any change of dispensation. He has spent much labor in defending what I never denied, that for the Jews it was fixed to the last day of our week. Granted. But then it was not fixed by the Decalogue; therefore the whole authority of the Sabbath enjoined in the Decalogue may for sufficient reasons by the "Lord of the Sabbath" be transferred to the first day of our week. This is the very thing for which I have contended. And if by sufficient evidence "this is once ascertained," then the first day (to use his own word,) "becomes the exclusive object of the law's consideration, and engrosses its entire authority."

From this point I might proceed at once to the proof, from the Scriptures, that such a change has actually been made. But it will clear the ground under this first head to notice what "Exodus" has said of the Origin of the Sabbath. He denies its existence in Eden, and regrets that I, in affirming it, have made "so important an addition to the testimony of Scripture!" I had referred to Gen. 2 in proof; on which he remarks, that "to assume that declaration in Gen. 2: 3, 'God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it,' means that man 'sanctified it,' requires rather too great an exercise of 'fancy' for a sober logician." I answer, that the meaning of that verse is not the proper work of the logician, but of the interpreter; determining the true sense, by the usage of words, context, scope, and other circumstances. Truly this is no business for "fancy," but for sober judgment. Does then my friend soberly think these words mean, that God set apart the seventh day and blessed it, for himself to observe, and not man! Of all "fancies," this seems to me the most singular, I had almost said, the most ludicrous. If it were so, why was the fact, in which of course man has no interest, recorded in a revelation for man? But I must remind my friend that his notion is contrary to the established usage of the words "sanctified" and "blessed" in the Scriptures. The word "sanctify" is found for the next time after this text, in Exodus 13: 2; 19: 10, 22, 23. In all these, and in other places, it is used in the sense of setting apart to the special service of God by divine authority. If he can find any other meaning appropriate to Gen. 2: 3, I shall be glad to see it. I know of no interpreter of Scripture who agrees with him. When it is therefore said by the inspired historian, that God "sanctified the seventh day," I must understand him to say, that God set it apart (from the other six days of labor,) to be religiously employed by man. The use of the same words in the fourth commandment, (Exodus 20: 8—11,) confirms this meaning, beyond all the power of scepticism. The word "bless," when used of an act of God, signifies in the Scriptures to confer blessings on men, (Gen. 1: 22; 30: 27; 39: 5;) when spoken of things, it signifies to make them means of happiness to men, (Exodus 23: 25. Deut. 28: 12; 33: 11.) I am really ashamed of all this detail; but my friend has compelled me: and "in the mouth of two or three witnesses shall every word be established."

The only plausible evasion of the force of this passage, is that of Paley and others, who conjecture that it may be a prolepsis, or anticipation, by the sacred historian, of the institution of the Sabbath twenty-five hundred years after. But to this conjecture, I answer—1. It admits my interpretation of the words to be just. 2. It supposes, instead of a recorded fact, a figure of speech, without any necessity contrary to a fundamental law of interpretation; in other words, it is a pure "fancy," without any grammatical, logical, or historical support. 3. It is a supposition employed to set aside a divine testimony, just as if a man, to get rid of the Divine Law of Marriage, were to say that the words in verse 24 of the same chapter, (quoted as divine by Christ, in Mark 10: 5—9,) were a mere anticipation by Moses of a subsequent Jewish law, and therefore that the Law of Marriage was not binding "from the beginning" of the race, and upon the race at large. 4. It is against common sense; for common sense says that any commemorative institution should commence at or near the time of the event commemorated; whereas this supposition of a mere prolepsis, leaves "a great gulf," a vast oblivious chasm of more than two thousand years, between the Creation and the Sabbath by which it was commemorated. And even then, to crown the climax of absurdity, it limits that commemoration of an event, in which the whole created race are equally interested—to the smallest fraction of that race!

From this legitimate mode of interpretation I trust it will now appear that I proceeded upon no mere "fancy" in referring the origin of the Sabbath to the day after man's creation. So much is sure. That it "was made for man," and not for God, to keep, is also certain, if (in any case) language has a determinate meaning. The inference of a "sober logican" may now follow, that the first Sabbath was kept by Adam and Eve, in their state of unsullied innocence; and that it was kept "the first day after their own creation." This is all I affirmed; and this I have proved, I think, beyond the possibility of reasonable doubt.

My friend makes merry with the idea of that day as a day of holy rest for man. "In the name of wonder," he asks, rest "from what?" It had better become him had he risen upward in thought to the sublime repose of the Creator over his finished work, and remembered that man was then in perfect communion of spirit with his God.

It follows irresistibly, from the fact thus demonstrated, that the law of the Sabbath was given to our first parents, that it was given to all their posterity. Even Paley admits this.

But "in vain shall we search for even a hint," says my friend, "that during the twenty-five hundred years previous (to Moses) man ever did keep, or ever was required to keep, a Sabbath." This bold but unfortunate assertion is sufficiently answered already. I only quote it to remark, that the division of time into "weeks," or "seven days," is repeatedly mentioned, (in the history of Noah and Jacob,) and that we know of no other foundation for such a division of time but in the original institution of the Sabbath. It is difficult to account, on any other principle, for the sort of sanctity attached to the seventh day among the ancient heathen nations. The old Greek poets, Hesiod, Homer, and Calumachus, call the seventh day "holy." Philo says, "The seventh day is a festival to every nation." Josephus says most explicitly, "No city of Greeks or barbarians can be found, which does not acknowledge a seventh day's rest from labor." The learned Clement of Alexandria, a witness of the highest competency, says, "The Greeks, as well as the Hebrews, observe the seventh day as holy." And, finally, the learned Eusebius affirms that "almost all the philosophers and poets acknowledge the seventh day as holy."

Now, if we allow the fact, thus testified by so many witnesses, Pagan, Jewish, and Christian, to what cause can this general agreement be ascribed, but to the law of nature or to the remains of an original tradition from Adam and Noah? These Gentiles surely did not conform to an institute of the Jewish law, which they despised and hated.

But whether the Sabbath was kept, or not, during that long period of human apostacy, is nothing to the point. The authority of the institution remained the same, as our Lord says of marriage, "from the beginning." The law bound men, in each case, even though they broke it. And the reckoning of the Universal Judge is sure. See Jude 14, 15.

Having thus shown by, "chapter and verse," briefly, but conclusively, that the Sabbath did not begin with the Jewish people, I shall now show in the same manner that it did not end with them. I have before cited a prediction of the Messiah's resurrection and exaltation, (Ps. 118: 16—26,) in which the day of Christian worship is manifestly made to correspond to and celebrate that glorious event. If so, then a Sabbath is predicted under the gospel dispensation. And whatever belongs to that dispensation, all admit, is of universal and perpetual obligation.

That a change of day would be demanded, seems evident from the nature of the case. The original day was originally and appropriately chosen to commemorate the work of Creation. But the work of Christ in our Redemption, in its eternal results, must in the esteem of all Christians, be of far higher and sweeter import. The day that sealed the certainty of that glorious work, and of the "new heavens and earth" for the redeemed, must therefore of necessity be more sacred and joyful to believers than that which commemorated the creation of this visible globe. This must perish, but that must endure. Isa. 51: 6. And if, according to Isa. 65: 17, 18, the glory of the first creation is so to fade in comparison as to cease from the commemoration of men, then here is a divine prediction of a change of the Sabbath from the seventh in the order to the first day of the week, grounded upon the very nature of things, and the consequent necessity of the case.

That such a change was made in fact—in other words, that the day appropriated to Christian worship, and the commemoration of the work of Redemption, (especially in the Eucharist, or "breaking of bread,") was the first day of the week—that this was sanctioned by Christ himself, after his resurrection, as the "Lord of the Sabbath"—that it has the example of the inspired apostles in its favor—that it was familiarly known and acknowledged among all Christians as "the Lord's day," i. e, the day by His authority consecrated to Him—are four distinct facts, for which we can cite both chapter and verse. See John 20: 16; Matt. 28: 9—11; Luke 24: 30—40; John 20: 19, 20, 26—29; Acts 2: 1—4; Acts 20: 6—7; 21: 4, 5; 1 Cor. 16: 1, 2; Rev. 1: 10.

This scriptural view is confirmed in the clearest manner by Ecclesiastical History. This is good testimony as to the matter of fact. Ignatius of Antioch, Justin Martyr of Rome, Dionysius of Corinth, Tertullian of Carthage, (all writers of the first and second centuries,) agree in their views of the Lord's day, or the day of Christ's resurrection, as the day of Christian worship. It is true they often distinguish it from the "Sabbath," meaning the Jewish Sabbath; but at other times their language is as explicit as we could desire as to the name and authority of the Sabbath being transferred to the first day. Take, for example, these words of Irenæus, a writer of the highest character, A. D. 178—"On the Lord's day we Christians keep the Sabbath." Were the first Christians then Anti-Sabbatarians? So far from it a man who refused to keep the Sabbath on the Lord's day would not have been easily recognized by Irenæus as a Christian. Let "Exodus" think of this.

The conclusion of the whole argument is this: Either, there are now two Sabbaths, (which "Exodus" denies,) or the one Sabbath of the Creation and of the Decalogue is perpetuated—is exalted by a new association with the work of Redemption, and for that reason, by Divine Authority, attached to the first day of the week in preference to the seventh. Still it is a "seventh" day as before, and as such, of course, absorbs into itself all the authority of the original law, and all the blessings of the original promise. What want we more?

That the conscientious observance of the Sabbath is attended with peculiar blessings to individuals, we have testimony from men of the highest intelligence and closest observation, of all countries, ages, sects, and occupations. This is not to be set aside by a sneer at superstition. Superstition will hardly account for such a high testimony, for example, as that of Sir Matthew Hale.

And that nations prosper most where the Sabbath is most observed in a Christian spirit, is, I think, a matter of observation and history. Hear what Montalembert, (himself a French Romanist, and therefore a witness against the credit of his country and his church,) says on this subject, in his recent Report on the Sabbath to the French Assembly: "We still see" (I quote his words) "the two most powerful and flourishing nations in the world, England and North America, witnessing by their prosperity to the price God himself pays, even in temporal things, to those nations that remain faithful to the first of his laws." In other parts of his Report, (which occupies fourteen columns of the Moniteur,) this eminent statesman places the public profanation of the Sabbath in the first rank of popular dangers and faults; declaring that it is like a public profession of Atheism, violating liberty, violating equality before God, and nourishing ignorance, vice, and disorder.

I have dwelt long on this point—perhaps too long. But the settlement of this will greatly aid in determing other points involved in the remaining propositions. Necessity compels me to close this communication here. In a future one, I hope more briefly to dispatch what remains. May "the Lord of the Sabbath" bless my friend. J. N. B.

FORGIVE AND FORGET.

BY THE AUTHOR OF PROVERBIAL PHILOSOPHY.

When streams of unkindness, as bitter as gall,
Bubble up from the heart to the tongue,
And meekness is writhing in torment and thrall,
By the hands of Ingratitude wrung—
In the heat of injustice, unwept and unfair,
While the anguish is festering yet,
None, none but an angel of God can declare,
"I now can forgive and forget."

But if the bad spirit is chased from the heart,
And the lips are in penitence steeped,
With the wrong so repented the wrath will depart,
Though scorn or injustice were heaped!
For the best compensation is paid for all ill,
When the cheek with contrition is wet,
And every one feels it is possible still,
At once to forgive and forget.

To forget? It is hard for a man with a mind,
However his heart may forgive,
To blot out all perils and dangers behind,
And but for the future to live;
Then how shall it be! for at every turn,
Recollection the spirit will fret
And the ashes of injury smoulder and burn,
Though we strive to forgive and forget.

O, hearken! my tongue shall the riddle unseal,
And mind shall be partner with heart,
While thee to thyself I bid conscience reveal,
And show thee how evil thou art;
Remember thy follies, thy sins, and—thy crimes,
How vast is that infinite debt!
Yet mercy hath seven by seventy times,
Been swift to forgive and forget!

Brood not on the insults or injuries old,
For thou art injurious too—
Count not their sum till the total is told,
For thou art unkind and untrue;
And if all thy harms are forgotten, forgiven,
Now mercy with justice is met,
O, who would not gladly take lessons of heaven,
And learn to forgive and forget?

Yes, yes, let a man, when his enemy weeps,
Be quick to receive him a friend!
For thus on his head in kindness he heaps,
Hot coals—to refine and amend;
And hearts that are Christian, more eagerly yearn,
As a nurse on her innocent pet,
Over lips that, once bitter, to penitence turn,
And whisper, "Forgive and forget."

THE MISER OF PARIS.

In the year 1745, Vandille, the miser, was worth nearly eight hundred thousand pounds! He used to boast that this vast accumulation sprang from a single shilling. He had increased it step by step, farthing by farthing, shilling by shilling, pound by pound, from the age of sixteen to the age of seventy-two. For six and fifty years had that covetous old man lived, for no other purpose than to accumulate gold which he had not the courage to enjoy. Not once during those years had he indulged himself in any luxury, or participated in any pleasure; his life was one continuous sacrifice to mammon. The blessings which a kind and benevolent Providence had bestowed in his mercy upon mankind, were never accepted by Vandille; his whole soul was absorbed; his every joy was sought for in the yellow heap which his avarice had accumulated. His death was a singular one; the end of that man was a terrible lesson, and one from which a fearful moral may be drawn. The winter of the year 1794 had been very cold and bitter, and the miser felt inclined to purchase a little extra fuel in the summer time, to provide, to some extent, against the like severity in the ensuing winter. He heard a man pass in the street with wood to sell; he haggled for an unconscionable time about the price, and at length completed his bargain, at the lowest rate. Avarice had made the miser dishonest, and he stole from the poor woodman several logs. In his eagerness to carry them away, and hide his ill-gotten store, he over-heated his blood and produced a fever. For the first time in his life he sent for a surgeon. "I wish to be bled," said he; "what is your charge?" "Half a livre," was the reply. The demand was deemed extortionate, and the surgeon was dismissed. He then sent for an apothecary, but he was also considered too high, and he at last sent for a poor barber, who agreed to open the vein for threepence a time. "But, friend," said the cautious miser, "how often will it be requisite to bleed me?" "Three times, eight ounces each time," replied the barber. "Let me see," said the possessor of three-quarters of a million, "that will be ninepence; too much. I have determined to go a cheaper way to work; take the whole twenty-four ounces at once, and that will save me sixpence." The barber remonstrated, but the miser was firm; he was certain, he said, that the barber was desirous to extort an extra sixpence, and he would not submit to such scandalous imposition. His vein was opened, and four and twenty ounces of blood was taken from him. In a few days, Vandille, the miser, was no more. The savings of his life, the wages of his vice and avarice, he left to the King of France.

DEATH-BED OF DR. JOHNSON.

From Mrs. Knight's New Memoir of Hannah More.

"The approach of death is dreadful," he exclaims. "I am afraid to think on that which I know I cannot avoid. It is in vain to look round and round for that help which cannot be had, yet we hope and hope, and fancy that he who has lived to-day, may live to-morrow. No wise man will be contented to die, if he thinks he is going into a state of punishment. Nay, no wise man will be contented to die, if he thinks he is to fall into annihilation; for, however unhappy any man's existence may be, yet he would rather have it than not exist at all. No; there is no rational principle by which a man can die contented, but a trust in the mercy of God, through the merits of Jesus Christ."

And yet, when one said to him in an hour of gloomy despondency, "You forget the merits of your Redeemer," he replied with deep solemnity, "I do not forget the merits of my Redeemer, but my Redeemer has said, He will set some on his right hand and some on his left."

"What man," he asks, with mournful distrust, "can say that his obedience has been such as he could approve of in another, or that his repentance has not been such as to require being repented of?"

"Remember what you have done by your writings in defense of virtue and truth," urged his friends.

"Admitting all you say to be true," answered the dying hero, "how can I tell when I have done enough?"

An awful question, who can answer it?

At last he described the kind of clergyman he wished to see. Mr. Winstanley was named, and a note was dispatched requesting his attendance to the sick man's chamber. Through ill-health and nervous apprehension, the clergyman could reply only in writing. "Permit me, therefore," ran the note, "to write what I should wish to say, were I present. I can easily conceive what would be the subjects of your inquiry. I can conceive that the views of yourself have changed with your condition, and that on the near approach of death, what you considered mere peccadilloes, have risen into mountains of guilt, while your best actions have dwindled into nothing. On whichsoever side you look, you see only positive transgression, or defective obedience; and hence, in self-despair, are eagerly asking, 'What shall I do to be saved?' I say to you in the language of the Baptist, 'Behold the Lamb of God.'"

"Does he say so?" exclaimed the anxious listener. "Read it again, Sir John." Upon the second reading, Dr. Johnson declared, "I must see that man; write again to him."

A second letter was the reply, enlarging and enforcing upon the subject of the first. "These, together with the conversation of a pious friend, Mr. Eatrobe, appear to have been blessed of God," continues one in a letter to Hannah More, "in bringing this great man to a renunciation of self, and a simple reliance on Jesus as his Saviour; thus also communicating to him that peace which he had found the world could not give, and which, when the world was fading from his view, was to fill the void, and dissipate the gloom even of the shadow of death. The man whose intellectual powers had awed all around him, was in turn made to tremble, when the period arrived, when all knowledge is useless and vanishes away, except the knowledge of the true God and of Jesus Christ whom he has sent. To attain this knowledge, this giant in knowledge must become a little child. The man looked up to as a prodigy of wisdom, must become a fool, that he might be wise."

"For some time before his death, all his fears were calmed and absorbed by the prevalence of his faith and his trust in the merit and propitiation of Jesus Christ," testifies Dr. Brocklesby.

"My dear doctor, believe a dying man," exclaimed Johnson, "there is no salvation but in the Lamb of God."

I CAN.

Of course you can. You show it in your looks, in your motion, in your speech, and everything else. Every attitude shows that your body has a soul, and is inhabited by resolution and moral sense.

I can. A brave, hearty, soulful, manly expression. There is character, force, vigor, determination, and will in it. The words have a spirit, sparkle, and pungency about them, not to be resisted nor forgotten. There is a world of meaning expressed, nailed down, epigrammized, and rammed, so to speak, into those few letters. Whole lectures are there, and sermons of mighty grandeur and eloquence, on the stern and solid virtues. We more than admire to hear the young man speak it out bravely, boldly, determinedly; as though it was an outstretching of his entire nature—a reflection of his inner soul. It tells of something that will race and battle with the world, when the way is open for it.

I can! What a spirit, purpose, intensity, reality in the phrase. It is a strong arm, a stout heart, a bold eye, a firm spirit, an indomitable will. We never knew of a man possessed of its energy, vitality, unsubdued and energetic fire, that did not attain a place of some distinction among his fellows. How should, we may say, how could it have been otherwise? Take Franklin, Washington, Wilberforce, Ferguson, La Place, and all the master spirits that have found a name and a place on the page of history, and where is the nation, where is the people, among whom they would not be distinguished? It could not be otherwise. It is the nature, constitution, order, necessity, the very inevitability of things and events that it should be so. I can, rightly and truly said, and then clenched and riveted by the manly and heroic deed, is the real secret, the true philosophy of all great men's lives. They took I can for a motto, and then went forth and made of themselves and the world exactly what they pleased.

Then, young man, hear us, if it be only this once. If you would be something more than a common, prosy wayfarer in life, just put these magic words on your lips, and their musing, hopeful, expanding philosophy into your heart and arms. Say, I can, and do it, and you are a man whose fortune will soon be made; and you blessed with the recollection of making it yourself. [Ch. Intel.

A FEARFUL VOW.

In a town in Massachusetts, in the month of November, one of the wealthiest men in the place died suddenly in the sanctuary. For years he had lived in the neglect of the means of grace, as it was said, to watch his money, at the hazard of his immortal interests. Some two or three years since, the parish with which he was connected resolved to build a more commodious and elegant place of worship. This measure was opposed by him as a piece of extravagance. But in spite of his opposition, a new house was built, and he solemnly declared that "he would never hear a sermon preached in the new house." God seems to have taken him at his word. The congregation had preaching several months, in their new house, but this man, true to his vow, gathered not with them in the place of prayer. He continued to count his silver and gold and watch his treasures.

At length the providences of God brought him to the sanctuary—not to hear a sermon, but to die! and go to his last account. A few weeks before his death, one of his two children died; and soon after, his wife followed to the eternal world. In his afflictions he seems to have forgotten his vow. The Sabbath after the death of his wife, in accordance with the custom of the place, he sent a note to the pastor, requesting the prayers of God's people that his afflictions might be sanctified to him, for his spiritual good. He, of course, must be present when his request was read. He entered the house, and had scarcely taken his seat, when he was observed to fall partially over, and was carried out dead! His vow was kept. He never heard a sermon in that house.

A CLERICAL ANECDOTE.

A young preacher, in the time of James I., being appointed to hold forth before the Vice Chancellor and heads of colleges of Oxford, chose for his text—"What, can ye not watch for one hour?"—which carried with it a personal allusion, as the Vice Chancellor happened to be one of those heavy-headed persons who cannot attend church without falling to sleep. The preacher repeated his text in an emphatic manner at the end of every division of his discourse—the unfortunate Vice Chancellor was often awoke—and this happened so often, that at last all present could very well see the joke. The Vice Chancellor was so nettled at the disturbance he had met with, that he complained to the Archbishop of Canterbury, who immediately sent for the young clergyman to reprove him for what he had done. In the course of the conference that ensued between the Archbishop and the preacher, the latter gave so many proofs of his wit and good sense, that his grace procured for him the honor of preaching before the King. Here, also, he had a joke. He gave out his text in these words—"James, the First and Sixth, 'Waver not;'" which, of course, every body saw to be a stroke at the indecisive character of that monarch. James, equally quick-sighted, exclaimed, "He is at me already." But he was, upon the whole, so well pleased with this clerical wag, as to make him one of his chaplains in ordinary. He afterwards went to Oxford, and preached a sermon on the text, "Sleep on, now, and take your rest."

"NOT MY WILL BUT THINE."

A fond father was in great distress for a favorite child, whom he apprehended to be dying in its infancy. Several of his friends endeavored to assuage his grief, but he refused to be comforted. At length, the minister on whom he attended offered to pray with him, and desired him to compose his mind, and give up his favorite son to the Divine disposal, since there was no hope of his recovery. He replied, "I cannot give him up, and it is my importunate request that God would spare this child to me, whatever may be the consequence." He had his desire; the child recovered, and grew up, if possible, more and more his darling; but he lived to be a thorn in his side, and to pierce his heart with many sorrows; and, just as he came to maturity, he robbed his excellent master, whom he before had often injured. He was seized by the hand of justice, tried, condemned, and died one of the most hardened wretches that ever went out of life in that ignominious manner. Upon the fatal day of execution, the mournful father was made to remember his former rash petition with grief and tears; and, humbled in the dust, confessed his folly and his sin.

KNOWLEDGE OF JESUS.

When the pious Bishop Beveridge was on his death-bed, he did not know any of his friends or connections. A minister, with whom he had been well acquainted, visited him; and when conducted into his room he said, "Bishop Beveridge, do you know me?" "Who are you?" said the Bishop. Being told who the minister was, he said that he did not know him. Another friend came who had been equally well known, and accosted him in a similar manner—"Do you know me, Bishop Beveridge?" "Who are you?" said he. Being told it was one of his intimate friends, he said he did not know him. His wife then came to the bed-side, and asked him if he knew her. "Who are you?" said he. Being told that it was his wife, he said that he did not know her. "Well," said one, "Bishop Beveridge, do you know the Lord Jesus Christ?" "Jesus Christ!" said he, reviving, as if the name had upon him the influence of a charm. "Oh! yes, I have known him these forty years. Precious Saviour; he is my only hope!"

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, March 20, 1851.

"OBLIGATION OF THE SABBATH."

We have already remarked upon the unwarrantable use made by the opponents of the Sabbath of Col. 2: 16. In the Sabbath discussion which we are now giving to our readers, it appears to be the main reliance of "Exodus." He is well aware, that if this text be taken out of his hands, his efforts to show that the Sabbath of the fourth commandment was a part of the ceremonial law, will have proved abortive. He clings to it, therefore, with the most determined tenacity, and insists that the language of the Apostle is not qualified by a single expression which goes to exclude the weekly rest from his category. "The sabbath days" is an expression which, in his opinion, includes all those seasons of rest which were observed by the people of God under the Old Testament; whether annual, monthly, or weekly. Hence the sweeping inference, that Christianity acknowledges no such institution as the Sabbath. Certain it is, however, that language as unqualified as that of the Apostle sometimes requires a limitation of application. We have already quoted a text of this kind, and as it forms a striking commentary upon the passage under discussion, we beg leave to call attention to it again. "I will also cause all her mirth to cease, her feast days, her new moons, and her SABBATHS, and all her solemn feasts." Hos. 2: 11. This is a prophecy which received its accomplishment when the expulsion of the Jews from Palestine by the Romans, and their dispersion into all the earth, rendered it impossible for them to go up to Jerusalem any more to celebrate the festivals appointed by their law. It is particularly to be noted, that the prophet does not limit, or in any way qualify, the language which foretells the cessation of the sabbaths; and we have as much reason to say that it includes all sabbaths, the weekly as well as the monthly and annual, as anti-sabbatarians have to say so of Col. 2: 16. But did the Almighty, when speaking by the prophet, announce the cessation of all sabbaths? Did He announce the cessation of the weekly rest? If so, the prophecy has never yet been accomplished. For, to this day the Jews continue to observe the seventh day, as of old. From the time of their dispersion, they have clung to it with a zeal proportionate to the afflictions which have indicated how completely the prophecy was receiving its fulfillment. The language must, therefore, have some limitation. If it be replied, that the Jews continue also to observe their annual festivals—the Passover, the Feast of Tabernacles, Pentecost, the Day of Atonement—as well as other ceremonies of the law, we answer, that these observances are not now celebrated by them in the manner required by their ritual. For it was expressly enjoined, that the celebration of them should always take place, "not in every place that thou [illegible] place which the Lord shall choose, to cause his name to dwell there; thither shall ye bring all that I command you." They were of no significance when celebrated any where else. Hence those observances which the Jews now designate as the Passover, the Pentecost, &c., are not those festivals in reality. As they are restrained from celebrating them at Jerusalem, they might as well not celebrate them at all. With respect to them, therefore, the prophecy has been fulfilled to the very letter. Her feast days, her new moons, and her festival sabbaths, have all ceased.

But of the weekly Sabbath it never was required that it should be celebrated at Jerusalem. Place for its observance was not specified. In any place, he who ceased from labor on the seventh day, and counted it "a delight," answered the requirement of the law. The Jew of the dispersion as truly keeps the Sabbath, therefore, as did the Jew who dwelt in the holy land. His weekly Sabbath has not ceased.

It appears that the language in Hosea is as universal and unlimited as the language in Collossians. Nevertheless, we are under the necessity of limiting its application. We infer that we shall do no violence to the Scripture, if we also take the Apostle's language in some restricted sense. We are certainly justified in doing so, if it can be clearly proved that the weekly rest dates its commencement from the foundation of the world. Of this, Heb. 4: 3 is proof positive. For the Apostle there argues, that the rest held in reserve for the people of God (verse 9) was neither the weekly Sabbath, nor the Canaan rest, because those rests had been received already; and in proof that they had been received, he not only asserts the fact, but specifies the date or era from which they began—the one "from the foundation of the world," when the works of creation were finished, (verse 3;) the other, when Joshua (rendered Jesus in our translation) gave them possession of the land, (verse 8.) If the Apostle does not here make the Sabbath to have commenced in Paradise, we are at a loss to affix any meaning to his language.

But let us examine this famous text in Collossians in the light of the context. "Let no man therefore judge you," &c. The illative "therefore" clearly shows, that the festivals spoken of as a "shadow of things to come," were those which were commanded in that "hand-writing of ordinances," spoken of in the 16th verse as having been "blotted out," and "nailed to the cross." It becomes an important matter, therefore, to determine what that "hand-writing" was. According to "Exodus," and those of like views, it was the Decalogue. It is true, "Exodus" has not expressly asserted this; nevertheless it is a necessary inference from his premises. But the Apostle says, that this hand-writing was nailed to the cross. And though this is but a figurative expression, to denote the entire abrogation of that of which he is speaking, yet the figure is founded upon the supposition that the fact might have been literally true. The idea of driving a nail through the hand-writing, to fasten it to the wood of the cross, must at least be admitted as something neither impossible nor absolutely ridiculous. But the idea of driving nails through two tablets of stone, to fasten them to the cross, is, to say the least, ludicrous. We therefore conclude, that such an idea was not the foundation of the Apostle's figure. On the other hand, the idea of driving nails through parchment paper, or any such material, is so perfectly natural, that the probability is little less than certainty, that the Apostle speaks of that part of the divine law which is known to have been written upon parchment.

The Apostle denominates it "the hand-writing of ORDINANCES." In the 20th verse of the same chapter he asks the Collossians, "Why, as though living in the world, are ye subject to ordinances?" It is fair to presume, that the word has the same meaning in both cases. In the latter case, he explains his meaning. The ordinances, of which he speaks, are such as "Touch not; taste not; handle not." Are such ordinances found in the Decalogue? They are found in the ceremonial law, however, in abundance. See Lev. 5: 2, 3; Num. 19: 11—22; and Lev. 11th chapter throughout. In Eph. 2: 15, we have the expression, "The law of commandments contained in ordinances." The allusion is undoubtedly to the ceremonial law. The word rendered "ordinance" is dogma; and as this comes from a word which signifies to seem good, or to be agreeable to one's own inclination, it properly denotes an injunction founded in the mere pleasure of the person who enjoins it. Accordingly, it is used to denote Augustus' decree concerning taxing. Luke 2: 1. (Macknight.) The institutions of the ceremonial law, being founded in the pleasure of God, are therefore fitly called ordinances. On this account the Sabbath might be called an ordinance, being a positive institution. But, by placing it in the Decalogue, God has shown that he meant to distinguish it from all other positive institutions, and separate it in the most marked manner from the "hand-writing of ordinances," as belonging to a different system.

By the chirograph, or hand-writing, was denoted, either the ceremonial law alone, or the Decalogue alone, or the ceremonial law and the Decalogue together, taken as one complete system. That it was the ceremonial law alone, anti-sabbatarians deny. That it was the Decalogue alone, they will not pretend. Th[illegible], therefore, suppose that the chirograph denoted both the Decalogue and the ceremonial law as one complete whole. Certain it is, however, that the most striking distinction was drawn between them. The one was spoken by God himself in the ears of all the people; the other by Moses. The one was written on stone; the other on parchment. The one was placed in the ark; the other not so distinguished. There were also other striking marks of distinction. We shall not here inquire why this distinction was made. Suffice it to say, that it was made. Propriety would require, therefore, that in speaking of their abrogation, even as one complex whole, some term in the plural number be employed. We find, however, that the singular is used; and this is no little evidence, to our mind, that the Apostle had in view only one of those writings, either the ceremonial law, or the Decalogue alone.

But, whatever was denoted, the unequivocal declaration of the Apostle is, that it was blotted out—entirely abrogated. And let it be distinctly observed, that this is affirmed, not of the Fourth Commandment in particular, to the exception of all the rest, but of the whole chirograph; so that, if the chirograph denotes the Decalogue, the doctrine of the Apostle is, that that code was utterly blotted out by the death of Christ. No exception is made in favor of the first, third, fifth, sixth, or any of the other commandments. The code, as a whole, is nailed (!) to the cross, and the abrogation of the Sabbath is argued merely on the principle, that the whole includes all its parts. But how is it that we find most of the other commandments directly enjoined in the New Testament? How is it that they are spoken of as "the commandments," par excellence? Matt. 19: 27, Rom. 13: 9. How is it that the fifth is called "the first commandment with promise?" Eph. 6: 2. How is it that, in his sermon on the mount, our Savior enforces them, letter and spirit? All this looks very strange, if they were blotted out by his death.

It follows from all this, that if the chirograph which was blotted out was the Decalogue, then the Decalogue as a whole was "a shadow of things to come." But however easy it may be to fancy that the Sabbath was a "shadow," or typical representation of Christ, it is not quite so easy to imagine the same of the other duties of the chirograph. As far as the context is any guide, this chirograph, as a whole, was blotted out, simply because it had served its purpose as a typical representation of the Redeemer. It was not one tenth part merely, but the entire chirograph, which had served this purpose; and consequently it became so dead by the cross of Christ, that the false teacher, who "judged" them in respect of the Sabbath festivals, was charged with "spoiling" the Collossian believers "after the rudiments of the world."

But is there no principle upon which it may be maintained, that the Decalogue held a peculiar aspect towards the Jewish nation, and served, in some sense, as a shadow of things to come? The Jews did indeed enter into a covenant obligation to keep its precepts. They bound themselves under a curse to do so. But if it be maintained, that that covenant was set aside when the "new and better covenant" was brought in, it must be remembered that moral obligation lies back of covenant obligation. And in whatever sense the covenant was a shadow, the Decalogue itself, upon which the covenant was founded, was not a shadow.

But we must here bring our remarks to a close. We trust that our readers will not be beguiled by the specious reasoning of "Exodus," but will be more than ever impressed with the duty of keeping the Sabbath holy to the Lord.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 30.

GLASGOW, February 28th, 1851.

In the beginning of the month, Lord John Russell intimated in the House of Commons his intention to introduce a Bill relative to the Oath of Abjuration, with a view to remove the difficulties preventing Baron Rothschild, the Jewish capitalist, from acting as Member of Parliament, as that oath binds the member "on the faith of a Christian." But the Premier having found difficulties, not yet fully explained, besetting his path, has been compelled himself to resign, and several days have elapsed, during which Lord Stanley has been endeavoring to organize a Ministry of a more conservative character—with what success, the varying rumors do not enable us to judge.

Six months ago, I gave account of a Popish miracle which had excited great attention in the south of France—the Virgin appearing to a peasant boy and girl to warn mankind of the wrath incurred by the desecration of the Sunday! This is now discovered to have been false. The boy declares that he invented the whole story; and the clergy now say that they never thoroughly believed it, although it was vouched for at the time by the Archbishop and all the priesthood. It is stated that a "station" was erected at the fountain of the "miraculous water," where the pious believers therein might pray and give of their charity to the clergy; a chapel was built, and rich and rare the gifts that were bestowed; medals bearing the image of the Virgin were struck in commemoration, for which a very good price was obtained, as these, it was promised, would exempt the wearer from every disease. And all this has gone on for upwards of three years; for The Church and State Gazette, giving these particulars, refers to an account of the alledged miracle which appeared in their columns in 1847.

A correspondent of the London Times states that, in the afternoon of Sunday, the 16th instant, "on the lowest calculation, there were upwards of 300 venders of different articles" around the Crystal Palace in Hyde Park. There were rows of stalls for sale of the account of the building, of oranges, fusees for cigars, glass ornaments, &c., and the noise of the venders, he remarks, was similar to the cries in a market-place. Another form of desecration has arisen, causing great offense to those substituting Sunday for the Sabbath, at the very time that strenuous efforts are being made to prevent Sunday trading. The daily papers contain advertisements by Mons. Lacroix of "Sunday French Classes, six shillings per quarter." The Classes meet at 11 o'clock in the forenoon, the church hour. The New Post Office Regulation, retaining over Sunday in the offices the letters and newspapers of parties desiring this, seems to be wrought fairly, and to the satisfaction of those who avail themselves of it—who, however, I apprehend, form but a small number, comparatively.

The Popish prelates and priests have been trying to outbrave the Government in reference to the Aggression—and I fear they may be too successful in their efforts. The state of the Episcopal Church, as itself so Romish, contributes much to this. Dr. Pusey having been charged by Mr. Dodsworth, who has gone over into the arms of the Papacy, as greatly inconsistent in remaining in the Episcopal Church, while really Romish both in principle and practice, he was required by the Bishop of Oxford to explain his views. He did so in a Letter (forming a pamphlet) addressed to the Bishop, defending the Romish practices used by him, but contrives so to mystify the matter, that the Bishop will not be ready to find fault. "I believe," he says, "that 'the body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten' (given by the priest and eaten by the people) 'only after a spiritual and heavenly manner' (i. e. not in any carnal, or physical, or earthly manner, but spiritually, sacramentally, truly, and ineffably.") Tractarianism, he affirms, will survive in the Church of England while the Scriptures are reverenced, and the ecumenical councils received, and the creeds recited, and the apostolical succession continues, and union with Christ her Head is cherished, and she acts not, God forbid, in the denial of any article of the faith. And in this I believe he is correct. If, instead of taking exclusively the Scriptures, there is taken with them creeds and decrees of councils, wholly inconsistent with the letter and the spirit of the Word, Tractarianism and Popery will flourish freely. Mr. Pusey adds, that the real aim of the present cry is to do away with the Prayer Book, and this he seems to dread as one of the greatest evils that could befall the Church.

The history of this man's declension is very melancholy. He was elected a Fellow of Oriel College, Oxford, in 1823; and, three years afterwards, he went to Germany. He there continued his theological studies, and the study of the Hebrew and German languages. He gave much attention to the history of the German Church. Luther and his allies won his high regards, and he turned an inquiring eye upon the cause of the decay of piety, and was deeply interested in the rise of Spencer, the forerunner of the despised German Pietists. After his return to England in 1827, he published an "Historical Enquiry into the probable Causes of the Rationalistic Character lately predominant in the Theology of Germany"—described as a valuable work, in which Luther is characterized as a "Great Apostle of Evangelical Truth." He speaks of the Reformer as having had a "right understanding of the Scriptures," which raised him "above the assumed authority of the Church, and above the might of tradition." He notes the want of an earnest inward piety in Germany, and speaks of "the four dumb church idols, the font, the pulpit, the confessional, and communion table." The means and the manner of his own transition to the shrine of these "dumb church idols" he has not recorded, nor does it appear to be known at present. The fact itself, however, is sufficiently notorious. He is the recognized head of a large party of whom this is the chief characteristic. The Bishop of Bath and Wells, in answer to a remonstrance on this point, writes that candlesticks upon the communion table are "the legitimate ornaments in a church;" and Mr. Bennett, whose histrionics in the Church of St. Barnabas have excited so much attention, is, it is said, about to be promoted to the Scotch Bishopric of St. Andrews and Dumblane.

NOTES OF A VOYAGE FROM CALIFORNIA—No. 2.

From a Journal of Dr. J. D. B. STILLMAN of New York.

Nov. 22d.—A long and tedious interval of light airs, calms, and sweltering sunshine, in which we have not averaged fifty miles in twenty-four hours. A fresh breeze would now and then favor us, but it was generally ahead. It was thought that the voyage would not occupy more than twenty days, and for the want of books we employed ourselves in watching the signs of wind, hoping and predicting something better for the morrow. O, what is so trying to the patience, when the will is strong and the pulse is bounding with eagerness to rejoin the friends from whom you have been separated so long, as to be caged up in your wooden prison at sea, with no hope but in the wind, and that obstinately refusing to blow a breath, notwithstanding all your signs and predictions. "Unfailing indications" do fail every day; and though you fret up and down the quarter-deck, and threaten never to trust yourself on a sailing vessel again, still the breeze won't come. For the want of some better means of passing time, I would stretch myself on the transom, with my head out of the window, overlooking the water, and watch the innumerable forms of animal life that floated past or followed in our wake. At long intervals a shark, that vulture of the ocean, would come prowling along. Too rapacious to admit of a partnership, he roams the sea alone. Then close to the surface comes a school of "trigger fish," about the size of the spread hand, beautifully spotted; and, being propelled chiefly by the large dorsal fin, they have a peculiar trotting motion, as they wag along in our wake, and visit every floating fragment from the steward's quarter. Many they were who rose victims to the treacherous little hook. For several days past we have had a surfeit of fish, chiefly bonitas and dolphins. At one time our deck was like a fish market—bonitas, from five to fifty pounds weight, threshing the deck in the strong agonies of death, intermingled with gay dolphins. They are caught by trolling a white rag attached to a hook, which they mistake for a flying fish. There are many beautiful fish in the tropical seas, but there is none so celebrated for its beauty and agility as the dolphin. He has a very fierce man-of-war look. From the profile of his forehead, you would think him a very intellectual fish; so bold is it, that his greatest width is in this region of the head; but the gross stupidity of the white-rag affair is very difficult to reconcile to your phrenological notions; and then a bird's-eye view of it confirms your skepticism of his great sagacity, for it is as thin and sharp as a broad-axe. He seems to have only those organs located on the medium line, particularly reverence and firmness. On the former you may place great dependence, for, with all his bold airs, he runs from a superior with the same readiness that he pursues his inferiors. You give him firmness large; and, for an illustration, just coax him into the idea that the rag and hook are bona fide a flying fish, as you skip it across the water. Ah! he does not see it. His sides yellow, inclining to green on the back; his tail long, forked, and richly tipped with yellow; his fins of a brilliant blue; and with a gallant, dashing air, he darts to and fro, driving the timid little ones out of the water. Now see! Quick as light he pursues his prey in its aerial flight, splitting the waves, and at the moment the poor little thing touches its element it is gone. You can see him at a great distance—so pure is the medium—as he takes a wide circuit and returns. Now be ready! His eyes seem to sparkle with energy, and dark bars appear on his sides, like those of the perch. Quick as an arrow he has struck the hook, and is fast; and now, if your tackle is strong, you may avenge the flying fish. No sooner does he find himself fast than his helm is put hard down, and every nerve is strained to resist the traction that is made with a strong hand. The whole broadside of the captive is opposed to the water, and you cannot gain an inch. But the ship must proceed on her voyage, and though you have gained nothing, he is sensible of having lost ground, and makes a prodigious spring into the air; and before he again touches his element, he has neared the ship by several yards. Now he makes another effort in an opposite direction, and after several such unavailing struggles, he yields, exhausted, and is raised on board, where he again renews his vain struggles, clearing a space in the curious crowd with the unsparing strokes of his tail, until he has covered the deck with his blood. Ah! who has not heard of the "dying dolphin?" The rapidly changing hues of green and gold flash and fade at intervals; his blue fins stand out erect as in swimming; his surface is in a fine tremor; the colors seem more brilliant than ever; and all around exclaim, How beautiful! But it is the last, and he lies at your feet lifeless, and of a dull lead color, as homely as any other fish.

Off the Gulf of Tehuantepec, something was seen floating on the water, about five miles to windward, which resembled a boat. The captain examined it with a glass, and thought he could distinguish two or more men in it. The ship was put about, and a boat lowered and sent off in charge of the second mate to her assistance. It was just the thing to rouse the sympathy and interest of those who live in the consciousness themselves that there is but a plank between them and a watery grave; and various were the speculations as to what it could mean. We were about three hundred miles from land; the boat was evidently without oars or sails, and the men seemed to be beckoning to us. In about two hours our boat returned, and reported that it was a large canoe, which had apparently drifted from the coast, was old, half full of water, and the persons on board were sea birds, known as "boobies." At the mention of boobies, I thought the mate looked at the captain, the captain at the mate, and gave the orders to "hoist in the boat," and "ready about." The next day the wind freshened to a gale, and drove us off our course.

Nov. 29th.—We have been beating up with light winds for some days towards our port. For a day or two we have had views of the twin volcanic peaks of Guatemala. To-day the water shows indication of a near approach to land, and lofty mountain peaks are visible to the northward. The bark Kirkwood hove in sight, and bore down to speak us. When off a mile or two to leeward, our whale left us and went to her, but returned soon after. He showed great restlessness last night; and to-day, whenever we stood off on the outward tack, he kept close under us, and rose just under our quarter, and most commonly to windward, to blow; but whenever we stood toward the land he invariably hung back and showed discontent. This afternoon he left us. It is twenty-four days since he attached himself to us, and during that time he has followed us as faithfully as a dog an emigrant's wagon. At first we abused him in every way that our ingenuity could devise to drive him off, lest he might do us some mischief; but, save some scratches he received from our ship's coppering, and numerous sloughing sores caused by the balls that had been fired into him, no damage was received by either of us from his close companionship—though our white paint was badly stained by the impurity of his breath. We long ago ceased our efforts to annoy him, and had become attached to him as to a dog; and we had named him "Blow-hard," and fancied, as we called him, that he came closer under our quarter, when I felt to pat his great glabrous sides and say, "You good old fellow." As the water grew shoaler he left us, with regret unfeigned on our part, and apparently so on his. This story of the whale is so remarkable, that were there not so many witnesses I would not venture to tell it, lest I be accused of exaggeration.

Nov. 30th.—For several nights past we have had bright flashes of lightning from the heavy clouds that hang over the land, but last night we seemed to have got within the domain of tempests, for, with vivid flashes of lightning, the thunder rolled, and a low black arch rose from the distant shore, betokening a squall of unusual violence. The light sails were taken in, and the heavier sails reefed. As the wind freshened, and the well-defined edge of the arch reached the forward cross-trees, the ship was hove to. The rain fell in large drops, and at every instant we expected the full fury of a tropical tornado to burst upon us. The sails were clewed down, and shook in the wind as though every thing was going to ruin, while the ship paused in her course, waiting the final charge of the elements. But it all passed over, and we could not log it as anything more than a "stiff breeze." As the night was dark, we lay to till morning, when the bark seen the day before was nowhere in sight; but the volcano of Viejo was before us, the land-mark for the port of Rialejo. All sail was spread to take advantage of a favorable wind, but before noon we were becalmed in sight of the harbor. Towards night a light breeze from the seaward carried us in. We took a pilot, who came off in a small boat, with a confederate having fruit to sell at exorbitant prices. The individual who officiated as pilot was recognized as the notorious "Chris. Lilly," who killed McCoy at Hoboken, some years since, and fled for his country's sake. The entrance to the river is rather obscure, but is easy and safe if one has ever entered it. A small island lies across the mouth of the river, leaving a passage on either side; but the one on the right is shoal, and the sea breaks in heavily. A few miles to the west of the harbor is the volcano of Cosaguina, which, though not so imposing as Viejo, is famous for its recent eruption, one of the most terrific on record. Its sides are naked, and deeply furrowed by the overflow of lava, presenting a very desolate appe[illegible]ce, though its fires are slumbering, as f[illegible] we could judge. On entering this place from the south-west, no less than ten isolated volcanic peaks, named on the sea-chart, are visible. The highest of these is the one that lies back from the anchorage, and is the land-mark to those entering. Seen from the seaward, it is a perfectly formed cone. Like all the others, it is dormant, though a little cap of mist, which forms as fast as it is blown off, is mistaken by many f[illegible] We passed quite a number of [illegible] at anchor in the river, that had left San Francisco before us, but none with later dates, though we thought ours a very long passage. Before our anchor was down, we were surrounded by canoes with fruit, of almost every variety of which we had been deprived for two years. Prices fell fast as competition rose; dimes were in great demand; and a large amount of fruit changed hands. In two hours the ship's deck was covered with the refuse of bananas, oranges, pine-apples, mangoes, sapotas, sugar-cane, besides other little fancy fruits whose names I did not care to remember. The same reckless disregard for the preservation of health was shown that had marked the whole career of Californians and sent so many of them to their graves. Many of the natives looked amiable, but convinced us that they were apt scholars in the arts of the outlawed Californians that have settled among them. Though disposed to be extortionate in their prices, they did it very innocently, and were well satisfied if they got any thing for their commodities. The harbor of Rialejo is the outlet of a small stream, and though called a river, there is no current except such as is caused by the tides. The banks are low, and covered with mangroves, but the scene appeared to us beautiful; and that place must be barren indeed that does not gladden the eyes that have looked only upon the blue sea for many weary weeks. We remained on deck until the sun had set, and the canoes had all left us to the reäction consequent upon a day of excitement, and the discordant cries of parrots and the flapping of the solemn heron on the shore. That night was spent on board, and after breakfast the following morning we took leave of Capt. Pousland, whose careful attentions and kindness of heart will long be held in grateful remembrance. The most of the passengers had determined to leave here, instead of going to Panama. A large canoe, called "bungo," made from some of the immense trees that this country furnishes, received us and our baggage, and we proceeded up the river about six miles. The shores for the whole distance were lined with mangroves, a singular tree, growing in some respects like the banyan, and extending its pendulous branches to a considerable distance into the water. Its roots bifurcate several feet above the ground, interweaving themselves in the most intricate manner, so that it is difficult to reach or even to see the earth. The river continued to narrow, and at length our bungo could go no higher. Above us the river was but a noisy brook; so it was necessary to get out on some muddy rocks, and pick our way up into the town.

EQUAL RIGHTS IN NEW JERSEY.

In the Legislature of New Jersey, during its recent session, several petitions for the relief of Sabbath-keepers were presented, and the following Supplement was reported to an Act entitled "An Act for Suppressing Vice and Immorality," passed March sixteenth, seventeen hundred and ninety-eight:

1. Be it enacted by the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey, That no person or persons shall serve or execute, or cause to be served or executed, any writ, process, warrant, order, judgment, or decree (except in criminal cases or for breach of the peace) upon the seventh day of the week, upon any persons who do statedly observe the seventh day of the week as a day of religious devotion or rest; but that the service of every such writ, process, warrant, order, judgment, or decree, shall be null and void, to all intents and purposes whatsoever; and the person or persons so serving or executing the same shall be as liable to the suit of the party grieved, and to answer damages to him for doing thereof, as if he or they had done the same, without any writ, process, warrant, order, judgment, or decree.

2. And be it enacted, That the first, second, fourth, fifth, and sixth sections of the Act to which this is a Supplement, shall not extend to and be applied to such person or persons as statedly observe the seventh day of the week as a day of religious devotion or rest; and that so much of the Act to which this is a Supplement as is inconsistent with this Act, be and the same is hereby repealed.

This Supplementary Act was brought up for final consideration in the Assembly on the 4th inst., when Mr. DAVID DUNN, the member from Middlesex, took occasion to remark respecting the interest a portion of the citizens of the State had in its passage, the objects it was intended to accomplish, the importance of the measure, and the principal involved in the repeal of the obnoxious law. It was intended, he said, to repeal an Act which went to establish the first day of the week as the Sabbath, contrary to the spirit of the Constitution, which expressly forbids the establishing one religious sect in preference to another. The Act, a repeal of which was sought, was anti-scriptural, as it allowed labor to be performed on the seventh day of the week, which the law of God forbids. "Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work, but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work." It was also intended to repeal an unequal and unjust law—a law which not only gave the preference to the majority, but that to the oppression and injury of the minority. It was unjust, inasmuch as it was a rod in the hand of any unprincipled person to perplex and annoy those who conscientiously regard the law of Jehovah. The repeal of this unjust law was, therefore, confidently expected. It was not asked as a boon; it was claimed as a right—demanded as a constitutional right, which had been wrested from the petitioners, and for the restoration of which they had asked again and again. Their call has thus far been disregarded, and they have suffered persecution, in one form or other, for more than half a century. What reasons can now be offered for a longer delay? The objectionable statute is not needed to secure society, since the several Acts under the head of Internal Police are abundant for the restraint of the vicious and immoral, as also for the protection of religious assemblies from disturbance. I urge the repeal of this unjust law, said Mr. Dunn, for another reason; it classes the people whom I here have the honor to represent among the vicious and immoral, because they observe the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath of the Lord—a stigma which is intended to be cast upon all those who do not recognize the first day of the week as the Sabbath. This law is a relic of the old English system, from which our forefathers fled when they sought the shores of America; and yet, no sooner were they in power in the New World, than they adopted the same unrighteous principle toward those who differed from them in matters of conscience. A curse from the hand of Him by whom the actions of all men are weighed, must follow the spirit of persecution which led to the enactment of the law in question.

Mr. HAYWOOD, (a Methodist preacher,) from the county of Ocean, replied, that it was expected he would say something on the bill now before the Assembly. He was willing to give the seventh-day people all that would be right, but he did not think it would be right to pass the bill in its present form, for it repeals a very important part of the present law. (He reads the sections which this bill repeals.) To repeal so much of this Act, said he, is giving great liberty, and I think we should do great injury to the morals of community. Why, how many would take advantage of this state of things, and that too under the cloak that they kept the seventh day! It would almost destroy the sanctity of the Christian Sabbath. I cannot go for the bill, Mr. Speaker, under this state of things. These people would drive their wagons and their stages through our streets, and there would be much confusion. I am willing to decide this question as we must all the great questions of the day, that is, let the majority rule.

Mr. DUNN said that the principle he contended for, and the principle held by the people he represented, was, that this body had no right to legislate on matters of conscience; they had no right to establish any religious creed; this was a matter beyond their control—a right which the people had reserved to themselves, and had never delegated to any man or set of men. It was never intended by the Constitution to proscribe any man for his religious opinions. [Here Mr. Dunn read an extract from the celebrated letter of Gen. Washington, in which he says: "If I had the least idea of any difficulty resulting from the Constitution adopted by the Convention of which I had the honor to be President, when it was formed, so as to endanger the rights of any religious denomination, then I never should have attached my name to that instrument. If I had any idea that the General Government was so administered that the liberty of conscience was endangered, I pray you to be assured that no man would be more willing than myself to revise and alter that part of it, so as to avoid all religious persecution. You can, without any doubt, remember that I have often expressed as my opinion, that every man who conducts himself as a good citizen is accountable alone to God for his religious faith, and should be protected in worshiping God according to the dictates of his conscience."] If the Legislature has the right to fix and establish the Sabbath day, continued Mr. Dunn, then it has the right to establish and fix any other point of a religious creed—the mode of baptism, or the different points of church discipline. And were the question now before us upon any other prominent principle in the Word of God, on which there may chance to be a difference of opinion, it would draw a very different line. Here let me remind the Representatives on this floor, that the principle I am contending for is the only principle of correct legislation, namely, to secure to every man his inalienable rights, which is, in short, equal rights. This is the principle which should govern all our acts of legislation. Are gentlemen here aware of the fact, that the law sought to be repealed forms a union of Church and State? So far as it goes to establish the first day of the week as the Sabbath, it is, to all intents and purposes, a union of Church and State. Are you willing to submit to such a state of things? Or do gentlemen think that we can legislate men pious and holy? These statutes may influence the outward conduct of men, but the law of God alone can reach the conscience. It is evident, then, that we have no right to prescribe religion for our neighbors; each must answer for himself, for to his own Master he stands or falls.

Mr. HAYWOOD rejoined—I trust, Mr. Speaker, that this honorable body believes the law of God, and that they are very desirous to grant to the seventh-day people all that would be right; and I think they have the privilege now of worshiping on the seventh day of the week. But it does appear to me to be granting them too much, to pass the bill now before us. It would seem to destroy all order in our community, and I therefore move to postpone the further consideration of it for the present.

The motion to postpone did not prevail. The bill was then put on its final passage, and lost. Ayes 22; noes 25.

On the following day, March 5th, Mr. PRICE, who voted with the majority, was induced to move a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill was lost; it was carried, and the bill was again before the Assembly.

Mr. DUNN remarked, that he was much gratified with the opportunity of testing the position of the House on the very important principle involved in the decision about to be had upon the bill. From the features of representatives on the floor, and their general deportment, he concluded that all were attached to some religious body, whose rule of action requires them to deal with others as they would have others deal with them. The vote now to be taken on the bill will show whether they possess the principle, or only the name, and whether they are prepared to meet the responsibility, to their constituents and to God. Yes, to meet the responsibility before that Judge whose holy law the existing statute disregards, and whose decision will be to every man according as his works have been.

Mr. HAYWOOD, replied. The subject before us, Mr. Speaker, is a very grave one, and I feel very sorry that I cannot vote for the bill, because, if we repeal this law, this people will open their workshops and their stores on Sunday, the Christian Sabbath, and they will ride through our streets on the Lord's day, and I fear that there would be but little or no attention paid to religion. It would indeed produce a fearful state of things. Now, Mr. Speaker, suppose one half of the citizens of Trenton were to keep the seventh day, and the other half the Christian Sabbath, don't you see what a state of confusion it would throw us into. No day would be kept. It would be an awful state of things indeed. No body could worship. I do not know what we should do in such a case. I think we had better not repeal all the old law now. I wish that this bill was amended, so that I might vote for it, on the account of that people.

Mr. DUNN followed. And after alluding to the "awful confusion" which the gentleman from Ocean seemed to apprehend, when one half of the people should keep the first day, and the other half the seventh day, and nobody could worship, he asked, Do those who keep Sunday ever meet for worship on any other day of the week? If so, how do they then avoid confusion and disturbance? Do not people pass and repass the streets with their wagons and stages, open their shops and their stores, and attend to all the business of life as usual? And do they complain of interruption from travelers and shopkeepers then? I do not recollect of ever hearing of a complaint being made for interruption on those occasions. And why should it so materially change the case, when worshiping on Sunday? I think, sir, that when an assembly or an individual is engaged in spiritual worship, holding communion with the Maker, there is no great danger of being disturbed by those who are peaceably and quietly pursuing their usual occupations. The people I here represent, and with whom I worship, are placed in a situation very like that portrayed by the gentleman from Ocean. They meet statedly on the seventh day of the week, where there is as much traveling and business done on that day, and probably more, than on any other day in the week. One of their houses for worship is on the line of the railroad, and within two rods of it, and I have known as many as three different trains of cars to pass and repass during the hours of public worship. The interruption is but momentary; it seldom interferes with spiritual devotion. I have never considered it a sufficient ground of complaint, nor entertained for a moment the thought of applying to the Legislature for a law to prevent people from attending to their usual occupations on that day of the week; much preferring to point them to the law of God. Had the gentleman who professes to see such "awful" results from the passage of this law, kept in view the principle of equal rights, which I have contended for, he would have discovered that it meets the case precisely. Let each enjoy like privileges; secure to every man his right, as the constitution directs; allow all men to worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences. By this rule no man's rights would be invaded; all would harmonize in the enjoyment of equal rights; and then the gentleman would have an opportunity to exercise those holy principles of charity which he so often recommends to others; and he would find his "awful" situation not so very awful after all.

Mr. HAYWOOD replied in nearly the same strain as before.

The vote was then called on the passage of the bill, when the following gentlemen voted for it, viz: Beardsley, Bilderback, Boice, Brown, Chamberlin, Crowell, Doughty, Dunn, Frits, Hoxsey, Huyler, Johnson, Marlow, Meeker, Opdyke, Phillips, Ribble, Richman, Risley, Simonson, Tatem, Valentine, Vanderpool, Van Vorst, Wetherby, Whitehead, and Williams—27 ayes. Against it—Bartley, Benner, Braddock, Connolly, Conover, Danser, Decker, Dermott, Doremus, Dye, Emley, Geroe, Haywood, Hopper, Loller, Mayhew, Moore, Pierson, Price, Rogers, Smock, Stockton, Tinsman, Wade, and Young—25 noes. So the bill was lost, three more votes being required to pass it.

BEQUEST.—The late Mrs. Charlotte B. Arden, of Morristown, N. J., who was the daughter of the Rev. Benjamin Woodruff, of Westfield, N. J., and well known for her acts of benevolence during her life, bequeathed the following sums in her last will:—

Theological Seminary, Auburn	$2,000
American Board of Missions	2,000
American Bible Society	1,000
American Home Missions	1,000
American Tract Society	1,000
American and Foreign Christian Union	1,000
N. Y. Colonization Society	1,000
	$9,000

The residue of her estate, if any, to the American Board of Foreign Missions.

Who will remember the Seventh-day Baptist institutions, when disposing of the trusts committed to them, at their deaths?

FUGITIVE SLAVE CASE.—There was a fugitive slave case in Philadelphia last week, which excited considerable interest. It seems that a colored woman about forty years of age, and her son ten years of age, were arrested as fugitive slaves at Columbia, Pa., on a warrant from Commissioner Ingraham of Philadelphia. They were claimed as the property of John Perdue, of Baltimore Co., Md., from which place, he asserts, they escaped in 1849, together with the husband of the alledged fugitive, and three or four other children. The other members of the family got wind of the pursuit, and managed to escape; but these were tried and sent back to slavery.

DAY OF HUMILIATION AND PRAYER.

The Board of the American Bible Union, deeply sensible of the weighty responsibilities resting upon them, and of the necessity of divine support and guidance, unanimously adopted the annexed report from the Committee on Versions, and requested its publication in the Sabbath Recorder:—

Resolved, That in view of the momentous interests involved in securing correct versions of the sacred Scriptures for all lands, the Board feel it to be their duty and privilege to rely for counsel and direction upon the wisdom that cometh from above, and therefore appoint the first Thursday in April as a day of humiliation and prayer for the aid and guidance of the Holy Spirit in their important enterprise.

The Board, and such other friends of the American Bible Union as may be present, will hold a meeting for conference and prayer, in the afternoon, at 3 o'clock, and a public prayer meeting in the evening at half past 7 o'clock, in some central position, to be hereafter designated.

We cordially invite "all who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity" to unite with us on that day, in such manner as may be most convenient, in seeking the divine bessing upon our noble enterprise.

The Mississippi Baptist State Convention, at its late annual meeting, adopted the following:—

Resolved, That, in view of the momentous interests which are involved in a corrected translation of the Scriptures, this Convention most earnestly recommends to the bodies composing it, to set apart the first Friday in April next, for humiliation, fasting, and prayer to Almighty God, for the special influence of the Holy Spirit, that he may direct the minds of his people in all their conclusions in regard to the revision of the Holy Scriptures; and that all Christians be affectionately invited to concur with us in this solemn appeal for divine guidance.

LITERARY INSTITUTIONS OF NEW YORK.—At a recent meeting of the Regents of the University of the State of New York, the number of students in the various colleges of the State was thus reported:—

Columbia College	113	University, City N. Y.	115
Union College	240	Madison University	75
Hamilton College	151	St. John's College	68
Geneva College	42	Genesee College	48
Total			852
The total number reported in 1850 was			948

The reports of the Medical Colleges stand thus:—

College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York	230
Geneva Medical Institution	101
University of the City of New York	411
Albany Medical College	92
Medical Department University of Buffalo	115
Total	949
The total number reported in 1850 was	848

The whole number of academies at the date of the report, subject to the visitation of the Regents, was 204. Of these 7 had been incorporated since March 1, 1850, by the Regents, and 2 incorporated by the Legislature had been received under their visitation.

CHURCHES IN PHILADELPHIA.—The Philadelphia Enquirer publishes a tabular statement of the number of churches in that city, with the amount of their property. The aggregate number is 247, seating 125,539 persons, and valued at $4,860,950. The Presbyterian churches are most numerous, numbering 23, and containing seats for 19,888 persons. Next come the Episcopalian—numbering 14, and seating 14,470. This denomination is the most wealthy. The Friends have 5 meeting-houses, seating 6,450 persons, and possessing property valued at $404,500. These figures include only the city proper.

TEACHERS FOR OREGON.—The steamer Empire City, which left New York for Chagres, last Fifth-day, took five female teachers for Oregon, who go out under the patronage of the Board of National Popular Education. Three of them were from the Empire State, one from Vermont, and one from Maine, viz: Miss Miller of Argyle, Miss Wands of Albany, Miss Smith of Lima, N. Y.; Miss Gray of Townshend, Vt.; Miss Lincoln of Portland, Me. They are of different religious denominations—Presbyterian, Congregational, Baptist, and Methodist.

EVANGELIZATION IN FRANCE.—A correspondent of the N. Y. Observer says that the city of Lyons is one of the most important centers of French evangelization. There are now five chapels established in different quarters. Three pastors and several evangelists or colporteurs are constantly at work. Between 2,000 and 2,500 persons attend more or less regularly the religious services. Most of these individuals were Roman Catholics a few years ago.

A GOOD EXAMPLE.—Some three weeks ago we received from one of our local agents a list of fifteen new subscribers for the Sabbath Recorder, with a letter stating that a series of meetings had just been held in the neighborhood, and he "took advantage of the occasion to do something for the paper." Last week the same agent sent us another letter, with the names of more new subscribers—a part, he says, of the number he had determined to make up before the commencement of the eighth volume. As we read his letter we thought, How easy it would be to sustain a denominational paper, if there was in each church an agent or friend of this stamp—"instant in season, out of season." We commend this example to all who desire the prosperity and extensive usefulness of the Recorder. A new volume commences in June—three months from this date. How many new subscribers can you, Mr. Reader, obtain in that time?

MURDER OF A SWEDISH MISSIONARY IN CHINA.—Mr. Collins, Superintendent of the American mission at Fuh-Chau, China, under date of December 9th, 1850, gives the following account of the murder of Rev. C. J. Faust, a pioneer missionary of the Swedish Lutheran Church:—

On the 3d of November last, accompanied by his colleague, Rev. Mr. Elquist, he went on in a small Chinese boat to the mouth of the river, for the purpose of cashing their bills of exchange at the ships lying there. They effected their object, and set out on their return with the money. They had not proceeded more than a mile when they were attacked by a large boat filled with armed men, first with stones, and then with spears. Hoping to intimidate their assailants, each fired a pistol he had with him, but with no effect. Mr. Faust, mortally wounded by repeated spear thrusts, fell overboard, and has not been seen since. Mr. Elquist, after several severe blows, leaped into the river, reached the shore, and having attracted the notice of persons on board the English ships, whence they started, was rescued. The boat and money fell into the hands of the robbers. Immediately on receiving intelligence of the robbery, the officers took measures for arresting and punishing the offenders. It was ascertained to what village the murderers belonged. Police officers, with an escort of 500 soldiers, proceeded there. About fifty houses, belonging to parties implicated, were burned down; five persons were arrested, and will probably be executed.

One Week Later from Europe.

The steamer Asia arrived at New York on sixth-day last, bringing Liverpool and London dates to March 1st.

Among the passengers by the Asia was Martin F. Tupper, Esq., the author of "Proverbial Philosophy," who intends making a short tour through the United States.

The principal topic of the English papers is the difficulty of forming a Ministry to replace that of Lord John Russell. All negotiations had failed up to the sailing of the steamer.

In France, the Anniversary of the Revolution (Feb. 24th,) was celebrated with considerable pomp. A union of the Legitimists and Orleanists, for the restoration of Henry V., is said to have been agreed upon.

There is more talk of revolutionary movements in Germany, but the matter will probably end in talk.

From Rome reports of Archbishop Hughes' sayings and doings continue to come. He preaches up the supremacy of the Pope with a boldness which excites surprise even where the doctrine is nominally believed.

The Sardinian brig Arpizo, Capt. Bartholetti, sailed from Constantinople on the 17th January, having on board 240 individuals, chiefly Poles, who had fought in Hungary, and accompanied General Bem to Turkey, but who have now quitted Shumla, where they have been in the service of the government, desirous of securing a home and a resting place far from the land of their fathers, but where, at any rate, they may be independent and free, on the shores of America. It is their intention to visit England on their route. About three hundred Hungarians still remain with Kossuth at Kutaya; and though they have the greatest desire to emigrate, they are determined not to leave the country without their leader.

The decease of Joanna Ballie took place at Hempstead on Feb. 23, a poet whose fame is indelibly inscribed on the annals of English literature, and whose genius, remarkable in character, has received the homage of the most exalted of her cotemporaries. Born in the year 1762, in the manse of Bothwell, near Glasgow, of which her father was minister, her great age connected her with a period signalized by the most remarkable events, and equally so by the great intellectual impulse which then leavened the social mass.

The Liquor Trade in New York.

The following is the substance of the bills to regulate and prevent liquor selling in the State of New York, reported in the Assembly at Albany, last week:—

Mr. Fordyce, from the majority of the Select Committee, reported that "to pass a strictly prohibitory law would be equivalent to repealing all restraining laws; and believing as they do, that the present law fully recognizes the doctrine that the traffic in intoxicating liquors as a beverage is dangerous, that the present law was intended for a shield to be thrown around the community to guard them against the evils liable to grow out of this traffic." Believing, however, that the present law may be modified, the majority report a bill which provides,

1. That hereafter no intoxicating liquors shall be sold in the same room where groceries are sold, nor at any place until the person applying for license shall give bonds in $1,000 to pay all damages which the community or individuals may suffer by reason of the traffic; also to support all widows, orphans and paupers occasioned thereby.

2. The bond to be filed, and be evidence in Court.

3. Authorizes married women to prosecute in their own names. When the wife neglects to prosecute, any person of kin may do so. In the latter case, the plaintiff must give bonds for the costs incurred by the defendant if plaintiff fails to make out a case.

4. Where a suit is commenced for damages done by a person under the influence of liquor, it will be sufficient to show that the person licensed had sold the party intoxicating drinks during that day.

5. When a judgment is obtained, the party mulcted may compel persons in the same town who had sold liquor to the same party to contribute equally to meet the judgment.

Mr. Chamberlain, from the minority of the committee, made an elaborate report, which closed with a bill providing—

1. That it shall not be lawful for any person to sell, or, by any artifice, to dispose of intoxicating drinks.

2. This provision to apply to all cities, villages, or towns, regardless of any provision in their charters; and to all canal boats, steamboats, &c., navigating the waters of the State.

3. Any person violating this statute shall forfeit $25 and costs; second conviction $50; third, $50 and thirty days imprisonment.

4. Any number of violations may be embraced in one act; but no prosecution shall be maintained unless the complaint is made within one year of the time of the alledged offense.

5. Makes it the duty of the Overseers of the Poor in the county, and Supervisors in the city, to prosecute. But if they neglect to do so, for ten days after notice, then the person giving the notice may prosecute. The fines to go to the poor fund.

6. Persons trafficing to be liable for damages to the extent suggested by the majority bill.

7. Judges to charge Grand Juries to take cognizance of offenses.

EXTENSIVE ROBBERY.—One day last week the Chief of Police in New York, received a telegraphic dispatch signed by the Presidents of Thames Bank, Norwich Bank, Merchant's Bank, and Quincy Bank, setting forth that Mr. Witter, the Messenger of the Norwich Bank, while in the ladies' room at the Norwich and Worcester Railroad Depot, at 1¼ o'clock in the morning, waiting for the steamboat train for Boston, was assaulted by a stranger, who struck him on the head with a small iron bar or billy, knocking him senseless, and made off with his carpet bag, containing about $40,000. Among the stolen money were ten $100 notes on the Quinebaug Bank, each payable to Lewis Hyde, dated January, 1851; also, $1,000 in $20's, 10's, and small notes on the Mystic Bank. A reward of $5,000 is offered—$3,000 for the recovery of the money, and $2,000 for the arrest of the robber, whom, it is to be hoped, will be speedily brought to justice. Mr. Witter states that the scoundrel accosted him in a friendly manner, and entered into conversation with him, and in a moment when there were no others in the room, embraced the opportunity, and assaulted and robbed him as above stated.

The steamer George W. Kendall, Saturday afternoon, March 15, when above Brandenburgh, Kentucky, and while under full headway in the middle of the river, burst the cylinder head of the larboard engine, the wind valve and stand pipe. The carpenter of the boat was instantly killed, and some deck hands were severely scalded. Seven horses were killed, and a number of persons were scalded and jumped overboard.

The Minnesota Chronicle of the 10th ult. states that sad accounts have been received there from the upper Indian country. The Indians above Crow Wing were suffering extremely, and many had literally starved to death. It is estimated, adds the Chronicle, that within a short time past, from five to seven hundred of them have died in consequence of privations.

By the latest advices from St. Jago de Cuba, we learn that the Commander of the U. S. sloop-of-war Albany had succeeded in liberating Capt. Mayo, who had been confined in prison in Hayti; and that the Haytien Government had agreed to pay damages to the amount of $5,000 to him.

Eighty-six gamblers (captured by Marshal Tukey in a descent on ten gambling houses) were brought before the Police Court in Boston and fined four dollars [illegible] were young and old among the number.

On a subsequent night, Marshal Tukey, of Boston, made another descent upon William Mead's gambling house, in Sudbury street, and captured twenty-six persons, among them a State street broker. They were fined eight dollars and costs. Two appealed.

Robert Treat Paine, of the Senior Class of Harvard College, committed suicide on the 8th inst., at his room, Holworth Hall, Cambridge, by taking 32 grains of morphene. He is said to have been insane.

The Cleveland True Democrat, (a Western Reserve Free Soil paper,) proposes a national convention, to be composed of all who are opposed to the Fugitive Slave Law, to be held on the 4th of July next, either at Buffalo, Cleveland or Pittsburgh.

A letter received in this city from Sierra Leone, Africa, under date of Jan. 20th, acknowledges the receipt of letters in 33 days from New York via England.

Agents Wanted,

FOR THE "BEST JUVENILE MAGAZINE IN AMERICA."

WOODWORTH'S YOUTH'S CABINET, elegantly illustrated, and filled with the choicest gems for the young, has recently entered upon a new volume. It is more attractive and popular than ever. "It is a little world within itself," to use the language of a metropolitan newspaper; and the price is only $1 a year.

Now is the time for Agents. The publisher wishes to employ fifty or more gentlemen, in different parts of the Union—North, South, East, and West—to act as Agents for the work. Their business will be to travel and to obtain subscribers. There is no periodical, of whatever character, which commands so ready and so general favor as Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet. It is a universal favorite. Those who devote their time wholly or mainly to the interests of this publication, will receive a compensation which cannot fail to be satisfactory.

Persons desiring an agency will please address the publisher (post-paid) with responsible testimonials as to character and ability. No time should be lost, as now is the best time to subscribe. Every particular respecting the agency will be immediately forwarded on application. Specimens of the work sent gratis.

D. A. WOODWORTH, 118 Nassau-st., N. Y.

In Preparation—Valuable New Works.

NATIONAL SERIES OF AMERICAN HISTORIES.—GOULD & LINCOLN have in course of preparation a series of Histories of the most interesting and important events which have occurred in the United States since the first settlement of the country. They will embrace the trials and adventures of the early colonists, both at the North and the South, their peculiarities of character and manners, their intercourse, of their institutions, sketches of their prominent men in both the Church and the State, incidents in the Revolution, with various other subjects of interest of more recent date. It is intended to be a NATIONAL SERIES OF AMERICAN HISTORY, adapted to the popular mind, and especially to the youth of our country, illustrated with numerous fine engravings; each volume to be complete in itself; yet, when all are published, to form a regular consecutive series, consisting of twelve or more volumes, 13mo, of about 300 pages each.

Cyclopedia of Anecdotes of Literature and the Fine Arts.
ALSO,
CYCLOPEDIA OF SCIENTIFIC ANECDOTES.

The First, containing a copious and choice selection of Anecdotes on the various forms of Literature, of the Arts, of Architecture, Engravings, Music, Poetry, Painting, and Sculpture, and of the most celebrated Literary Characters and Artists of different countries and ages.

The Second, containing a similar selection respecting the various Sciences and Mechanical Arts, of their most distinguished votaries. The two together, embracing the larger portion of the best Anecdotes in Ancient and Modern collections, as well as in various Histories, Biographies, and Files of Periodical Literature.

The whole classified under appropriate subjects, alphabetically arranged, and each supplied with a very full and particular index of topics and names, by author of "Cyclopedia of Moral and Religious Anecdotes;" the whole to be comprised in Sixteen Numbers, at 25 cents per Number, making two large 8vo volumes of about 700 pages each, illustrated with numerous fine engravings. The first number will be issued about the first of April, to be continued semi-monthly until completed.
KAZLITT ARVINE, A. M.,

Daguerrean Gallery.

GURNEY'S Daguerrean Gallery, No. 189 Broadway, has been known for years as one of the first establishments of the kind in the United States, and the oldest in the city of New York. He has recently greatly enlarged his Gallery by the addition of more rooms and large skylights, and other improvements, rendering it one of the most extensive establishments in this country. Mr. G. attends personally to his sitters, and from his great experience in the art he is enabled, at all times, to give perfect satisfaction. The large-sized pictures recently taken by his new process are universally acknowledged superior to any heretofore taken in this country. A large collection can be seen, at all hours of the day. Ladies and gentlemen are respectfully invited to examine them.

New York and Boston Steamboats.

REGULAR MAIL LINE BETWEEN NEW YORK AND BOSTON, via Stonington and Providence. Inland route, without ferry, change of cars or baggage! The steamers C. VANDERBILT, Capt. Joel Stone, and COMMODORE, Capt. William H. Frazee, in connection with the Stonington and Providence, and Boston and Providence Railroads, leaving New York daily, (Sundays excepted,) from pier 2 North River, first wharf above Battery Place, at 5 o'clock P. M., and Stonington at 8 o'clock P. M., or upon the arrival of the mail train from Boston. The C. Vanderbilt will leave New York Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday. Leave Stonington Monday, Wednesday, and Friday. The Commodore will leave New York Monday, Wednesday, and Friday. Leave Stonington Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday.

Methodist Quarterly Review.

THIS Review contains 160 pages Octavo, printed on fine paper. At the subscription price of TWO DOLLARS a year, in advance, it is the cheapest Quarterly Journal now issued. The publishers issue it at this low price, in expectation of greatly enlarging its list of subscribers, which, though by no means what it ought to be, is yet, as it is believed, twice as large as that of any similar Journal.

While the theology of the Methodist Episcopal Church is the standard for the Review, its tone is large and liberal, and its range of topics, not only in Biblical but General Literature, is extensive, as its Table of Contents will show. Its contributors are among the ablest writers in this country, of various religious denominations.

From its wide circulation, the Quarterly affords a most desirable medium of Literary Advertising. All advertisements, and books for notice, should be sent to the Editor, Rev. J. M'Clintock, D. D., 200 Mulberry-st.

Miscellaneous.

De Quincey, the Opium Eater.

Thomas De Quincey, the English "Opium Eater," is thus described by a correspondent of a Worcester paper:—

I have met De Quincey in the course of my peregrinations over this "terraqueous ball," and I can assure you that the physique of that celebrated writer is certainly as expressive as his lucubrations. Men of Genius have generally been mere parodies of that fine physicalism which ladies commonly designate manhood; and De Quincey's case strengthens the rule. He is one of the smallest legged, smallest bodied, and most attenuated effigies of the human form divine that one could meet in a crowded city during a day's walk. And if one adds to this figure, clothes that are neither fashionably cut nor fastidiously adjusted, he will have a tolerably rough idea of De Quincey's outer man. But then his brow, that pushes his obtrusive hat to the back of his head, and his little grey eyes, that do not seem to look out, but to be ever turned inward, sounding the depths of his imagination, and searching out the mysteries of the most obtruse logic, are something that you would search a week to find the mates to, and then you would be disappointed.

De Quincey now resides at Lasswade, a romantic rural village, once the residence of Sir Walter Scott, about seven miles from Edinburgh, Scotland, where an affectionate daughter watches over him, and where he is the wonder of the country people for miles around. They cannot understand why, on fair days, and at all hours, that little man with a brown coat and the woolly hat, is always climbing hills, and wandering among the shady woods, as if he sought for something he could never find. And then why, on cold, bleak, and wet days, he walks along the highway between two piles of stones, transferring them singly from one point to the other. The fact is, that the opium which De Quincey consumed in his younger days is now consuming him, and unless he walks ten miles per day, fair or foul, he cannot secure his maximum of two hours' sleep during the night. This exercise he easily secures in pleasant weather; when the weather is not so, he transfers his heaps of stones, and travels the ten miles in this way. This profound logician and eminent scholar is impressed with the belief that he bears a hippopotamus or some such animal in his stomach; and it is said that he manifests considerable sensitiveness if any of his friends doubt the fact.

Steel Pen Making at Birmingham.

Mr. Gillott, of Birmingham, who has done so much to improve it, considers the manufacture to be yet in its infancy. The first operations are performed by steam power. The sheets of steel, after they are received from Sheffield, are reduced to the requisite tenuity by successive transits through the rolling-mill—operations which are tended by men and boys. When reduced in this manner to the thinness of a steel pen, and to the length of about two feet, and the breadth of two inches and a half or three inches, the sheets of steel are ready for the next processes, which are entirely performed by women and girls. Describing the rooms according to the order of the processes, and building, the first to be entered is that where the "blanks" are punched out. Ranged in double rows along a large and roomy workshop, with windows at both sides, and scrupulously white and clean in floor, roof, and walls, are seated from fifty to a hundred girls and women, from the age of fourteen to that of forty and upwards. The only sounds to be heard are the working of the hand press, and the clinking of the small pieces of metal as they fall from the block into the receptacle prepared for them. This process is performed with great rapidity, one girl, of average industry and dexterity, being able to punch or cut out about a hundred gross per day. Each division of the workshop is superintended by a tool maker, whose business it is to keep the punches and presses in good working condition, to superintend the work generally, and to keep order among the work-people.

The next operation is to place the blank in a concave die, on which a slight touch from a convex punch produces the requisite shape—that of the semi-tube. The slits and apertures, which increase the elasticity of the pen, and the maker's or vender's name or mark, are produced by a similar tool. The last operation is that of slitting, which is also performed by girls and women. Previously to this, however, the pen undergoes a variety of processes in a different part of the factory, and under the hands of a different class of work-people. When complete all but the slit, the pen is soft and pliable, and may be bent or twisted in the hand like a piece of thin lead. Being collected in "grosses" or "great grosses"—the former containing 144 and the great gross twelve times that number—the pens are thrown into little iron square boxes by men, who perform all the work in this department, and they are placed in a furnace, where they remain till box and pens are of a white heat. They are then taken out, and thrown hissing hot into pails or tanks of oil—a process which cures them of their softness by making them brittle. When taken out of the oil, they may be broken by the fingers with as much ease as if they were so many wafers. As a great deal of oil adheres to them, they are put into a sieve to drain. There they remain until no more oil will run from them; but, notwithstanding all the draining which they have received, the oil is not effectually removed. To cleanse them thoroughly, they were formerly thrown into pits or heaps of sawdust, and stirred about; but as, by this process, the sawdust became clotted into oil cakes, and was rendered unserviceable, the ingenuity of Mr. Gillott was taxed to discover some means by which a saving both of oil and sawdust could be effected. It was not long before the thought struck him, that, if the pens were made to revolve rapidly in a perforated cylinder, the last drop of oil might be forced out of them—in fact, that the oil might be twirled from the pens like moisture from a mop.

The experiment was tried and succeeded admirably. The pens, after being allowed to drain in the seive until no more oil would run off them, were placed, apparently dry, but greasy looking, in the cylinder, but twirled around with great rapidity, until the oil ran off in a copious stream. The mingled oil and sawdust formerly constituted a nuisance, and it was necessary to change the sawdust, and burn it, three or four times a day. It now lasts for a week. By this means—a remarkable instance of the economy of manufacturers—Mr. Gillott has diminished his oil account about £200 to £300 per annum. This operation once completed, the pens are once more placed in revolving cylinders, where their friction against each other produces the necessary polish. Each pen is thus made to clean and polish its neighbor. The next process is to roast or anneal these brittle articles, and give them the flexibility of the quill, and produce upon them, at the same time, the color which may be desired, whether bronze or blue. The flexibility and color are both produced by heat, and it becomes a delicate matter so to arrange and regulate it as to attain the exact results desired. From this department they are once more consigned to the female part of the establishment, where, by the operation of the cutting tool, each pen receives the required slit. One girl, with a quick and practiced finger, can slit by this means as many as 200 gross, or 28,800, in a day. They are now ready for counting and packing, in boxes or grosses, for the wholesale market. This last stage of the business is wholly performed by young girls.

[Cor. of the Morning Chron.

Four Years in Mowing.

This we believe to be the best way to manage tillage land, from our experience of twelve years. We manure and plant the first year with corn or potatoes; second, sow down with wheat, barley, or oats, and grass seed; keep in grass four years, and then break up again. We think this is a far more profitable course than the old system of farming practiced by many of our farmers, that of keeping land in grass from ten to twenty years, as in that time the land becomes as hard as a highway, and the sod as tough as leather; so that it takes three years at least to rot it and lay it again to grass. I managed a farm in this way for eight years, and it increased the crop of hay from 6 tons to 20, while two years of the time the hay was about all sold off, and I purchased no manure. It is contended by some, that the rotting of a good sod is equal to 20 loads of manure to the acre, and I do not doubt it. This system makes a quick rotation of crops, keeps the soil light and mellow, and thus the crops do not suffer by drought. And I have a great advantage over the old system, for I rot two or three sods where others rot but one, as also a good crop of grass. The system practised by many of our farmers, after the first six years, will hardly pay for the cutting the grass at laborers' prices, $1 25 per day. We turn up the sod even if it bears good grass, when its turn comes, and do not wait for it to get worn out. It does not then require so much ox labor to plough, and is more easily cultivated afterwards. We have, therefore, this advantage, we work a field three times while the old system does it but once. I am now trying the plan on another old worn out farm, and if I should live, I may report my experience hereafter. In the mean time, we would advise our brother farmers to try it themselves; it will require sacrifice the first rotation, but no man will be dissatisfied with it after trying it two rotations. Now we would not advise anything wild or visionary; every farmer has already the means without extra expense, all that is required is his team and his plough to begin with.

New Patent for a Planing Machine.

Mr. George W. Beardslee, of this city, (says the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser,) has filed his caveat for a patent for a planing machine, which he claims to be a decided improvement upon those now in use. He terms his machine the "elastic cutter," and claims that its superiority over all other machines consists in its simplicity, both in construction and in operation, it having neither belts nor gearing in or about it, but all located beneath the floor. When once adjusted and in order, it cannot be deranged by the removal of the cutters, or from any other ordinary cause. It operates vertically, and thereby the grit, dirt, and shavings, pass off without aid.

The greatest curiosity about it is the movement of the endless sectional platform, and its manner of "turning corners"—the movement being on a concentric, and differing from any we ever saw. The whole machine is very simple in its construction, and consequently operates with little friction. It is of great strength, and the cost is much less than those now in use, growing out of its simplicity. It is claimed for it that its operation will produce work superior to that of the hand plane, and its ordinary speed will be 150 feet per minute, or 9,000 feet per hour, and that it can be increased to 200 or 300 feet per minute, without any danger to the machine. The planers are so arranged that they will yield, and permit splinters, if any occur, to pass away, without damaging or disordering the machine, which is a great fault of some of the other patents.

Mr. Beardslee, in connection with Mr. Samuel Albro, has also got a patent for a matching apparatus, which is to be connected with his planing machine. It is claimed that it is constructed on a plan that exceeds any now made to form a tongue and groove.

A New Trick.—The Legislature of Illinois has passed a law to prohibit the retailing of intoxicating drinks within that State. At Springfield some genius has hit upon a novel way of supplying his customers with the "critter," in defiance of the law, thus:—

The premises consist of a room, divided by a partition into two apartments. Upon entering the first apartment, a square opening, and it is the only one, is discovered, several feet from the ground, in the partition wall. Immediately before this opening, in the second apartment, a number of glasses, labeled 'rum,' 'gin,' 'whisky,' &c., stand upon a table. Upon a picayune being dropped into one of these glasses, the table begins to turn upon its axis, and by the time it has made a horizontal revolution, the glass is filled with the liquor indicated, and stands in its original position.

The Mayor and Marshal of the city have examined said "premises" closely, without being able to find any "man, woman or child," acting as salesman, or to discover the means by which the "table" is turned. And up to the last accounts the thing was still in operation.

The Cottager's Welcome.

Hard by I've a cottage that stands near the wood—
A stream glides in peace at the door—
Where all who will tarry, 'tis well understood,
Receive hospitality's store.
To cheer that the brook and the thicket afford,
The stranger we ever invite;
You're welcome to freely partake at the board,
And afterwards rest for the night.

The birds in the morning will sing from the trees,
And herald the young god of day,
Then, with him uprising, depart if you please,
We'll set you refreshed on the way;
Your coin for our service we sternly reject,
No traffic for gain we pursue,
And all the reward that we wish or expect,
We find in the good that we do.

Mankind are pilgrims on life's weary road,
And many would wander astray,
In seeking Eternity's silent abode,
Did Mercy not point out the way!
If all would their duty discharge as they should,
To those who are friendless and poor,
The world would resemble my cot near the wood,
And life the sweet stream at my door.

Show Furniture.

Furniture too good to be used is a nuisance. What can be more unpleasant than the aspect of a room, or suit of rooms, where every thing is bagged up? Chairs and sofas in pinafores, mirrors in muslin, a druggeted carpet, a hearth-rug wrong side out, and a chandelier in a sack, seen by rays of light that straggle in edgeways through the slits in the shutters, and exhaling that peculiar brown-holland fragrance which belongs to drawing-rooms in masquerade dress, form one of the most cheerless, dispiriting, unhumanlike spectacles in the diorama of domestic life. We would as lief be ushered into a vault as into such an apartment. Nothing can be more chilling to the feelings, except, perhaps, a perspective view of the family wash taking an airing on the clothes-lines.

Why do people buy magnificent furniture to clothe it in hideous disguises? Does the glory of exhibiting the articles undressed half a dozen evenings in the year pay for all the cost and trouble? The miser enjoys the flashing lustre of his gold every time he lifts the lid of his strong box; but what pleasure can there be in possessing a species of property that is invisible to the owner three hundred and fifty days out of every three hundred and sixty-five?

Give us furniture that is made for wear—tables upon which you can bring down your fist with an emphasis, without throwing the lady of the house into hysterics—chairs that you can lean back in—carpets that you can promenade upon; in a word, give us comfort, and let us wear things out. It is provoking to see chairs and sofas preserved for years without spot or blemish, while the wrinkles are multiplying in the face and the grey hairs on the head of the proprietor. For these and sundry other reasons, we have an especial spite against show furniture.

Hillotype.

It is stated that Mr. L. L. Hill, of Westhill, N. Y., has invented a process for procuring colored daguerreotype pictures, and that he has been offered $20,000 for a half interest in the same. The announcement is made in the Daguerreian Journal. Mr. Hill says:—

"Some two years ago I took to experimenting, with a view to this great desideratum," (i. e. photographing in colors,) "but with little faith. In one of my experiments a phenomenon presented itself which greatly surprised me, and in the nature of the case compelled me to believe the thing practicable. One color, the red, in a figured dress, was developed as bright as a ruby. I then repeated the experiment, and failed; but from that hour until a few months ago I continued to repeat it in every form I could think of, always failing, but never despairing, for I had reasons for believing in the correctness of my theory, that under certain circumstances, there is in the impressioned plate a latent colored image. I at length commenced experimenting on the developing power of the vapors of different metals, and found that a large number of them, such as arsenic, cadmium, zinc, selenium, bismuth, potassium, and sodium, would, when properly vaporized, bring out the latent image in light and shade. The same result followed the use of several gases. The impressions differed so little from daguerreotypes, that I was on the point of abandoning the pursuit, when I one day unexpectedly formed a singular compound, and, without much hope of success, applied it to my purpose. My surprise and joy were unbounded, when I found on my plate a true Hillotype."

Married Without Knowing It.—A gentleman of Indiana is claimed by a lady in this city, says the Cincinnati Commercial, as her husband! Hearing of the claim of late, the gentleman made his way to the city in considerable haste to see the person who claimed him. He searched the records and it was ascertained that the regular papers had been made out, that the marriage had taken place, and that a clergyman of good standing had officiated, and the whole matter was, to all appearances, a legal transaction. The lady herself states that the gentleman is the identical person she was married to. But our Hoosier neighbor denies all knowledge of the lady, and, in a card which we find in the Gazette, intimates that some person bearing a strong resemblance to him, and of course, knowing his residence, officiated as his representative, got married, and in a short time after left for parts unknown. This is the latest imposition, if imposition it be, and we doubt not it is, that has come to light. The object of the false man is plain, viz., to impose upon the lady and escape the law.

Important and Valuable Discovery.—Among the many valuable discoveries of late years, none is entitled to more notice, and should be more generally adopted, than that made by the late Dr. J. H. Johnson, of New Orleans. By chemical combinations, the inventor has found a method whereby cordage, sheeting, and, in short, all vegetable fibre, can be rendered completely fire-proof. The magnitude of this discovery is so startling, that we almost at once pronounce it impossible, and nothing short of actual experience could convince us of its reality; but we understand from very respectable authority, that the test has been made; and, if true, its general adoption as one of the great means of saving life and property to an incalculable amount must follow. So general is the operation of this agent, combined, it is said, of well-known chemical properties, that it is hardly possible to calculate the uses to which it may be applied.

A Knowing Horse.—The Chsistian Register closes an article on the Spiritual Rappings with the following anecdote:—

"We are tempted to draw from our college reminiscences a case, which we deem a very parallel to these audacious fooleries. Our coevals at Cambridge cannot have forgotten a man of livery-stable notoriety. His customers were often so oblivious as to the extent of their rides, that he contracted with the innholders of the surrounding country to score their names on such of his vehicles as visited their respective taverns. He had also a horse, which had been trained to lift his fore foot as often as a slight signal from his master's finger was repeated. A stupid freshman once returned, as he said, from a ride to Watertown, but bearing with him the sign manual of an inn-keeper in Concord. The youth persisted unblushingly in his lie. Says the man, 'My horse knows, and will tell me, how many miles he has been driven.' The signal was given and repeated. The horse lifted his foot fourteen times in succession. The astonished freshman paid his full stable fare, and retired firmly convinced of the preternatural endowments of the horse."

Large Sales of a Large Work.—Dr. Webster's Unabridged Dictionary of the English Language, published by Messrs. Merriam, of Springfield, is selling at a rate unprecedented, we believe, for so large a work. Almost 3000 copies have been distributed among the School Districts in Massachusetts, during the past year, in conformity with an act of the Legislature of the State. The demand from other sources has also increased to the amount of several thousand copies beyond that of the preceding year. Many copies are now sent to distant parts of the world, where the peeple speak or are learning the English language, for missionary, commercial, and other purposes. The Dictionary would be an inestimable treasure, not only in every School District, but in the family. Young children may be taught to resort to Webster, as the arbiter of disputes, as a safe and satisfactory guide, and as a storehouse of invaluable information. In this respect, as well as others, Dr. Webster and his Editor, Prof. Goodrich, are benefactors to the country.

New Form of Bridge.—The Montreal Herald thus describes an invention for crossing at Rouse's Point for lack of a bridge:—

"The engineers have shown the independance of their resources, by a contrivance which, though not a bridge, very nearly approaches one. On the Vermont side a very extensive pier has been made by driving piles for some thousands of feet from the shore, to such a distance from the bank as to reduce the channel to the width of 400 feet. A large vessel has been built of such dimensions as exactly to correspond with this 400 feet of channel, and upon the deck of this vessel iron rails are laid. Thus, when she is swung into the gap, there will be the continuous track required for the carriages, as there would be if there were really a bridge; and when the trains have passed over, there will be again the 400 feet of clear water way for the passage of craft."

The Astor Library.—The fruits of the wise and generous bequest of John Jacob Astor, for a Public Library will soon be ripe for use; the edifice is rapidly approaching completion, and the more difficult and important work of selecting the books has made good progress. By the labors of Dr. Cogswell, the librarian, 28,364 volumes have already been gathered, which number is to be increased by further purchases the coming season, and the library will probably be thrown open to the public in the summer of 1852, with not less than fifty thousand volumes judiciously selected. To an increase of this number, the total income of the large bequest is to be added after the completion of the building, which, before many years shall pass, will form a library surpassing any one in the country, and free to all. A noble monument is this to the one wise deed of Mr. Astor.

Destruction of Ships by Spontaneous Combustion.—Capt. Bates, of ship Nonantum, from Baltimore for California, which was destroyed by fire from spontaneous combustion of her cargo of coal, took passage at the Falkland Islands in the Scotch ship Hermagoon, Capt. M'Kenzie, for Valparaiso, with coal, but when 12 days out, west of Cape Horn, this ship also took fire from spontaneous combustion, and every exertion to smother it proved unavailing. They took to their boats, and were picked up soon after by the British ship Symmetry, Capt. John Thompson, of Liverpool, for Acapulco, with coal. Dec. 15, in latitude 47 S., longitude 79 W., they fell in with ship Fanchion, of Newburyport, from Baltimore for San Francisco, with coal, which also took fire and was destroyed, as before reported, making the third ship burnt by that means within a few months, while Capt. B. and wife were on board.

Ferociousness in the Dog.—In one of the Cincinnati papers, we find an account of an attack by a ferocious dog upon a little child. "The dog seized the child by the throat," we are told, and the more he was pounded to make him let go, the harder he held on. The people broke the dog's back, and after inserting a lever in his mouth, pried his jaws open and released the sufferer, but not till her throat was mangled. There is a sure remedy in such cases, which should be known by every one. If, instead of pulling upon the dog to disengage him when his jaws are set upon any thing, a sponge or cloth, wet with strong spirits of hartshorn, be applied to his nostrils, he will instantly relax his hold.

Age of Animals.—A bear rarely exceeds twenty years; a dog lives twenty years; a wolf twenty; a fox fourteen or sixteen. The average age of cats is fifteen years; of a squirrel and hare, seven or eight years, and a rabbit seven. Elephants have been known to live to the great age of one hundred years. Pigs have been known to live to the age of thirty years; the rhinoceros to fifty. A horse has been known to live to the age of seventy-two, but averaging twenty-five to thirty. Camels sometimes live to the age of one hundred. Stags are long lived. Sheep seldom exceed the age of ten. Cows live about fifteen years. An eagle died in Vienna of the age of one hundred and four years; ravens frequently reach the age of a hundred years. Swans have been known to live three hundred; pelicans are long lived. A tortoise has been known to live a hundred and ninety years.

Exactly.—Rev. Dr. Dewey said, in his recent lecture at Boston, that "he believed that the grandest reform society that could be got up, would be a society of people to speak their minds. The moderation of this country was asleep and dumb, when its voice is most needed to be heard. He was bound to neither party. He was not speaking to please anybody."

Many undoubtedly agree with Dr. Dewey in their sentiments, and if they would come out as boldly, a good purpose might be attained. Mr. John Neal of Portland says in his plain way, that there is not after all so much difference in people's notions as would at first sight appear. Most folks talk not what they really think, but only what they suppose will please others, or forward their own interest.

[Providence Mirror.

Public Speaking.—"I never," says Pope, "could speak in public. And I don't believe, if it was a set thing, I could give an account of any story to twelve friends together, though I could tell it to any three of them with great pleasure. When I appeared for the Bishop of Rochester, on his trial, though I had but ten words to say, and that on a plain point, (how that Bishop spent his time when I was at Bromley,) I made two or three blunders in it, notwithstanding the row of lords, which was all I could see, were mostly of my acquaintance."

Variety.

The contribution of New York to the Washington Monument is a block of Glen's Falls marble, four feet six inches in length by three feet six inches in breadth, and fourteen inches thick, weighing something more than a ton. It is of a deep black color, and susceptible of a high polish. The sculpture work rests upon a projection eight inches in width. Upon this base stands a pyramidal column in low relief, supporting a medallion, thirty-three inches in diameter, in which is sculptured in bas-relief the arms of the State, above which is a wreath of laurel. Upon the lower part of the column is chiseled, deeply beneath the surface, the word "New-York."

It is said that a balloon has been constructed at Paris which obeys the helm, and can be driven even against the wind by its conductor. This machine has made several voyages round the Hippodrome, and has been made to turn in every direction; but its progress in the air has not yet been tested, and the utmost secrecy is observed as to the means employed.

The Prarie Farmer, of Chicago, publishes the following as a verbatim copy of a certificate granted to a female teacher in Cook Co., not long since:—"The undersigners Bein Chosen to Inspect ———, The Schooll teacher ——— found hir Capabell of teatching Reedin, Ritin and E Rithmetick and has visated the Schooll and sas she kepts Regular Howers."

An inquiry into the cause of the recent death of a young lady in England, established that she had been distroyed by the portions of the lead contained in the coloring matter of burnt almonds. Medical authority was also adduced to show that within the last three years upwards of seventy cases of death had been traced in England to the use of poisonous figments used in fancy sweetmeats.

Gen. Tom Thumb was arrested in Savannah for driving his state carriage upon the sidewalk, and fined $10. The gentleman who reported the infraction of the ordinance, did so for the sake of the joke, expecting that nothing more than a little fun would come of it. But it seems that the matter was viewed in a different light by the authorities.

The Louisiana Supreme Court has decided that a will made by a person insane, during a lucid interval, is valid; but the interval must continue during a length of time sufficient to give certainty to the temporary restoration of reason. It is not sufficient to prove that reasonable things had been done by the testator, after the will was made.

A British provincial paper says that a rapid and emphatic recital of the following pathetic narrative is an infallable cure for lisping:—"Hobbs meets Snobbs and Nobbs; Hobbs bobs to Snobbs and Nobbs; Hobbs nobs with Snobbs and robs Nobbs' fobs. This is, says Nobbs, the worse for Hobbs' jobs, and Snobbs' sobs."

Mr. Cobden, the distinguished English reformer, has been recently challenged to fight a duel with Admiral Sir Thomas Hastings. As a man of peace, he of course peremptorially declined the challenge, rebuking its author in a reply of much wit and pungency, while exculpating himself from blame.

One of the reasons given why the Londoners omitted the use of wood in constructing the building for the World's Fair, is, that there would be so many Yankees there they were afraid they would whittle it down.

A bill to amend the charter of the Buffalo and Mississippi Railroad Company passed the House of Representatives of the Indiana Legislature, and went to the Senate, where it was stolen to prevent its final passage.

A London journal states that during the year 1850 four thousand four hundred new publications were issued in London alone. Of these, about five hundred were works of fiction—at the rate of almost one and a half daily!

A man was lately caught by machinery in Sheffield, Eng., which, instead of breaking his bones, as is usually the case, instantly stripped off all his clothes, except his stockings, and threw him naked on the floor.

The duration of human life in England is, on an average, fifteen or sixteen years longer in the country than in the town, as shown by the registration of deaths in that country.

Professor Agassiz, in a recent lecture at Key West, stated his conviction that the Peninsula of Florida, up to the surface of the water, has been entirely the work of the coral insect.

There are two classes of people that can afford to be modest—those who possess a vast amount of knowledge, and those who have but little.

Building materials of all kinds decay much sooner at the South than at the North.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year of this Seminary, for 1850 and '51, will commence the third Wednesday in August, and continue forty-four weeks, including a short recess between the terms, and one of ten days for the winter holidays.

The year is divided into three terms:—

The first, of 14 weeks, begins Wednesday, August 21st, and ends Wednesday, November 27th.

The second, of 15 weeks, begins Monday, December 2d, and ends Friday, March 14th.

The third, of 14 weeks, begins Tuesday, March 18th and ends Tuesday, June 24th.

Board of Instruction.

GURDON EVANS, A. M., President,
And Professor of Mathematics and Natural Science.
Rev. JOSEPH W. MORTON,
Professor of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, Spanish, and Moral and Intellectual Science.
Mrs. SUSANNA M. SPICER, Preceptress.
ADOLPH ROSENHAYN,
(Late of Friedrick Wilhelm College, Berlin,)
Teacher of German, Piano Forte, and Assistant in Greek and Latin.

Other competent Teachers will be employed as occasion may demand.

TEACHERS' CLASSES will be formed, as usual, at the beginning of the Fall and middle of the Winter Terms, and continue seven weeks.

In the Common Branches, classes will be formed at the commencement of each term; but in the higher, the interest of the student, as well as the welfare of the Institution, demand that a more systematic course of study be pursued.

In the Natural Sciences, Elementary Chemistry and Philosophy will be pursued during the Fall Term; Agricultural Chemistry, Astronomy, and Physiology during the Winter Term; Botany and Geology during the Summer Term.

Classes will be formed in Latin, French, and German, at the commencement of the Fall Term; in Hebrew, Greek, and Spanish, at the commencement of the Winter Term, and continue through the course of study.

In Mathematics, Geometry is studied in the Fall, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, and Astronomy, Surveying, Navigation, &c., in the Summer Term.

The course of instruction in Agriculture is thoroughly scientific, embracing study and recitation in the best authors. Instruction is given in a well-furnished laboratory, in the analysis of soils, ashes of plants, manures, &c. and the modes of testing for their constituent elements. The attention of farmers who wish to give their sons a practical education is especially called to this department.

Board in private families, from $1 25 to $1 50. Many students board in clubs for 60 to 75 cents.

Tuition—to be settled upon entering school—from $3 00 to $5 00. Extras—For Drawing, $1 00; Oil Painting, $5 00; Chemical Experiments, $1 00; Writing, including stationery, 50 cents; Piano Forte, $8 00; Use of Instrument, $2 00; Agricultural Chemistry, including chemicals, apparatus, and fuel, (breakage extra,) $12 00.

It is very desirable that students should enter at the beginning of the term; yet they are received into classes already formed at any time.

For farther information, address Gurdon Evans, J. W. Morton, or Rev. J. R. Irish, President of the Corporation.

"EQUALITY OF THE RACES."

Reply to Tamar Davis.

In proof of my position, that the different races of mankind are "psychologically identical," I have shown, by reference to the Ethiopian and Egyptian nations, that the Negro race has produced examples of mental development equal to other races; from which it follows, that this race possesses equal "mental endowment" with other races. To avoid this conclusion, my esteemed friend denies that these nations were Negroes, and makes me to base my whole argument on the single fact that they were black. She remarks, "But not the least shadow of historical testimony does he bring, to prove that the nations in question have ever been, either in ancient or modern times, identified by naturalists as exhibiting any Negro characteristics of physical structure, not shared in common with some varieties of the Caucasian type." The writer, in her zeal to demolish something, has reared a man straw, and she is welcome to the task of demolishing it. I have rested my argument upon no such contracted basis. Such a misrepresentation is hardly necessary in advocating a good cause. The partial reading which the writer seems to have given to my historical references demands a re-reading.

I have shown, by indisputable historical testimony, that the Egyptians were descendants of the Ethiopians. Whatever description, then, applies to one, applies also to the other, in the early history of these nations. I have quoted ancient Greek and Hebrew writers, who declare that they were black. Heroditus says, "They have the most woolly hair of all nations." Lucien says, "Besides being black, he had projecting lips, and his hair brushed up in curls." Denan says, "The cheeks of the Egyptians are round and thick, the lips full, the mouth large, displaying, in short, the African character, of which the NEGRO is the original type." Now, if all these characteristics "are shared in common with some varieties of the Caucasian type," then verily "some varieties of the Caucasian type" are Negroes.

I consider these quotations from the most learned and renowned historians and antiquaries to abundantly substantiate my position. But lest my friend should still see nothing but "black" about them, I will add the best testimony of the scientific world, which I have purposely held in reserve. My opponent has described the Negro through the pen of Hugh Murray. She denies that the Ethiopian has these characteristics. Hear Mary Sommervill, (Phys. Geo. p. 438,) —"The Ethiopians occupy all Africa south of the great desert. . . . Their distinguishing characteristics are, a black complexion, black woolly hair, thick lips, projecting jaws, high cheek bones, and large prominent eyes." Verily, these men look very much like Hugh Murray's Negroes! Reese (in his Elements of Zoology,) describes the African tribes, of which the Ethiopian is the most prominent—"Their eyes and skin are dark—the hair black and woolly—the skull looks as if it had been compressed laterally, so as to cause the face and back head to project—the forehead is low, narrow, and slanting—the jaws projecting—the nose broad and flat—the lips thick." This author, as do most of the others, includes the Ethiopians under the general term "Negroes."

Let us now consider "in what latitude the word Ethiopian is employed by Blumenbach." In his excellent work, (De Generi Humani Verictate Nativa,) as quoted by that most eminent naturalist, Dr. Good, he divides the human family into five races—the Caucasian, Mongolian, American, Ethiopian, and Malay. He says, "The color of the Ethiopian varies from a deep tawny to a pitch or perfect jet. The head is narrow; the face narrow, projecting towards the lower part; the forehead arched; the eyes projecting; the nose thick, almost intermixed with the cheeks; the hair black, frizzled, and woolly." Such were the characteristics which Blumenbach said predominated in the Egyptian mummies. My friend, however, thinks "even this would make the Caucasian predominate in his constitution." It would make rather a queer-looking Caucasian after all. Probably such an one would hardly find admittance to the parlors of certain "white inhabitants," who "are too well acquainted with the character and habits of Negroes to feel much of the spirit of abolitionism."

I hope my friend will now be able to find in the Ethiopians some "Negro characteristics not shared in common with some varieties of the Caucasian type."

If it should be doubted that the Egyptians were descended from the Ethiopians, it may be further substantiated by reference to Rotteck's History of the World—page 64—"Egypt received its most ancient inhabitants, and the greater part of its population, from Ethiopia." Again, page 74, vol. 1, "The mass of the population of Egypt was derived from Ethiopia, as Herodotus' description of their corporeal structure proves, which corresponds with that of the NEGRO race." This quotation is full of instruction. It teaches—1st. That Egypt was an Ethiopian colony; 2d. That by the description of Herodotus the Egyptians were Negroes; and, 3d. That the inhabitants of Ethiopia, whence they came, were Negroes. Herodotus was truly styled the father of historians. None were ever more noted for accuracy. He spent several years in Egypt, studying her manners and characteristics. His testimony alone on this point may justly challenge all criticism. The same historian, in classifying the human family, gives as his third class "the Ethiopian or Negro race." Reese, as we have said, uses these terms thus interchangeably. Dr. Good uses them thus; and so do most naturalists and historians. These terms, then, are not only synonymous in literal signification, but also in common acceptation. An Ethiopian is a Negro, and a Negro is an Ethiopian the world over.

It might be interesting just here to inquire, (admitting my friend's distinction between Ethiopians and Negroes,) whether the slaves of our country are Negroes or Ethiopians? To my friend's first article on the Fugitive Slave Bill, be the decision referred. She there calls them "Ethiopians." This is an involuntary witness against her own position, that "Ethiopians are not Negroes;" for every one knows, that the slaves of this country, (whose original type is not lost by amalgamation with the Caucasian,) bears the description given by Hugh Murray to Negroes. If, as the writer says, they are Ethiopians, then the Ethiopians are Negroes.

That Negroes are descendents of Canaan, is true. It is equally true, that Negroes are likewise descendants of Cush, the brother of Canaan. Such, as we have shown, were the Ethiopians. The descendants of Ham, through Cush, according to ancient Greek and Hebrew writers, settled in Arabia, on the east side of the Red Sea, and thence, by successive tides of emigration, peopled Africa. To this testimony we may add that of Dr. Adam Clarke, Scott, Henry, and a host of learned biblical commentators. Hence the various Negro tribes of Africa, the parent stock of which inhabited Ethiopia. We read, also, that the Canaanites settled on the western coast of Africa. Hence, also, many of the Negro tribes of that country. Thus, as we defined the Negroes in a previous article, they are the descendents of Ham, through his sons Cush, Canaan, and Mizraim.

But, to gratify my friend's partiality for Canaan as the exclusive father of the Negroes, I will grant it for a time. Now, have there been no illustrious nations of Canaanites? "To history be the decision referred." If we mistake not, all those great and powerful nations which inhabited the land of Canaan before it was possessed by the Israelites, were Negroes, (sons of Canaan.) The great extent of their territories, at a very early date, may be learned from the 10th chapter of Genesis. At a later date, we find the Phœnicians, one of the most renowned nations of antiquity. See Tytler's History, p. 22. "The Phœnicians (the Canaanites of Scripture) were a commercial people in the days of Abraham. Their first settlements were Cyrus and Rhodes; thence they passed into Greece, Sicily, Sardinia, and Spain, and formed settlements on the western coast of Africa. They were among the most civilized nations of the east. We are indebted to them for the invention of writing, and for the first attempts at commercial navigation." Rotteck's History of the World—"The Phœnicians, as a race kindred to the Canaanites, are said to have descended from Ham, and to have come to the coast of Syria from the shores of the Red Sea before Abraham. They soon obtained a great advantage over the other Syrians (descendents of Shem—Caucasians) in commercial fame, and in all the arts of life, and made their little barren country on the sea one of the most remarkable upon the earth." "By the genius and industry of its inhabitants, it made tributary to itself the greater part of the coasts of the Mediterranean, many of the ocean, and large inland kingdoms. We gladly turn our views to a nation which built its greatness, not by the sword, but by the instruments of pacific art. This nation formed not one but several States, as Sidon, Tyre, Aradus, Byblus, Berytus, Sareptha, and Tripolis. Carthage, the empress of the sea, and many other colonies, were founded by Phœnicians. Thus many colonies give proof of the commercial greatness of the Phœnicians, and their political importance. They built also Utica, and Adrumetum in North Africa." The magnificence of this Negro nation has been sung by poets and lauded by historians, time almost out of mind.

The foregoing extracts from the most reliable histories are all that time will allow me to make. Thus history, from every page, demonstrates the equality of the races in mental endowment, and heaps withering rebukes upon the defamers of God's image, as stamped in living lineaments on every human being. Let the learned and most renowned naturalist, Dr. Good, speak on this subject. After commenting upon the present depressed condition of the Negro races, he says, "But let the man who would argue from this single fact, that the race of Negroes must necessarily be an inferior species, distinct from the rest of the world, compare the taste, the talents, the genius, the erudition, that have at different periods blazed forth in different individuals of this despised people, when placed under the fostering providence of kindness and cultivation, with his own, or those of the generality of his own countrymen, and let him blush for the mistake he has made, and the injury he has committed." He then gives individual examples of Negro greatness. "Freidig of Vienna was an excellent architect, and a capital performer on the violin. Hannibal was not only a colonel in the Russian service, but deeply skilled in the mathematical and physical sciences; so too was Lislet, of the Isle of France, who was in consequence made a member of the French Academy; and Arno, who was honored with a diploma of Doctor of Philosophy by the University of Wurtemburg, in 1734. Let us add to these the names of Vasa and Ignatius Lauco, whose tastes and genius have enriched the polite literature of our own country; and with such examples as these of Negro power before us, is it possible to do otherwise than to adopt the very just observation of a quaint orator, who has told us, that "the Negro, like the white man, is still God's image, although carved in ebony?" The same author continues, "Nor is it to a few casual individuals among the black tribes, appearing in distant countries, and at distant eras, that we have to look for the clearest proofs of human intelligence. At this moment, scattered like their own vases over the eastern and western deserts of Africa, multitudes of little principalities of Negroes are still existing—multitudes whose national virtues would do honor to the most polished states of Europe; while at Timbucto, the most eastern of those principalities, we meet with one of the wealthiest, perhaps one of the most populous and best governed cities in the world—its sovereign a Negro, its army Negroes, its people Negroes—a city which is the general mart for the commerce of Western Africa, and where trade and manufactures seem to be equally esteemed and protected." "We know not the antiquity of this kingdom, but there can be no doubt of its having claim to a very high origin; and it is possible that, at the very period when our own ancestors, [Caucasians,] as described by Julius Cæsar, were naked, and smeared over with paint, or merely clothed with the skins of wild beasts, living in huts, and worshiping the misletoe, the black kingdom of Bamharra, of which Timbucto is the capital, was as completely established and as flourishing as at the present time."

The voice of the present chimes with that of the past, in redeeming from calumny a long-despised race. Verily, it needs no champion to vindicate its honor, but only to unravel the misty cobwebs of prejudice woven around its history. I trust my friend has now learned "what nations, both in ancient and modern times, have been Negroes."

There seems yet to be one difficulty. My friend confesses herself ignorant of any law changing the color of the races. There are very many who are not ignorant of it. Hamilton was not ignorant of it. In his "Description de l'Egypte," speaking of the pictures, in the temples, of black and red men together, he says, "These pictures can mean nothing else than that the red Egyptians were in fact descended from the black Ethiopians." This elegant author recognized a law adequate to change the human face from black to red. From these red men the Copts, Gypsies, &c., descended. They were consequently red, like their ancestors. Reese was not ignorant of this law, who says, "A series of nations may be traced in Africa, whose common origin can scarcely be questioned, which lose one Negro characteristic after another, until a very close approximation is manifest to the character of the white races!" Rotteck understood this law. "Climate and other external circumstances," says he, "produces the changes and diversities of the human family." Godman's Natural History says, "The action of external causes is capable of producing considerable variation in the appearance of individuals and tribes." Harris well understood this law. "History, in connection with Physical Geography, evinces that the diversities of mankind are resolvable into the prolonged action of external causes, producing and perpetuating them. The color of the eyes and skin is so dependent on external conditions as to be useless as a characteristic mark of races. The Jews of Germany, Portugal, and Cochin, are so far assimilated to the native population of these countries, as to be light-complexioned in the first, dark colored in the second, and black in the third." Dr. Good was far from being ignorant of this law. "All the deepest colors of men, beasts, birds, fishes, reptiles, and vegetables, are in hot climates, and all the lightest those of the cold. We perceive daily, that an exposure to the sun's rays turns the skin from its natural whiteness to a deep brown or tan, and a seclusion from the sun keeps it fair and unfrekled." This point is most ably elucidated in Good's Book of Nature, where the author proves conclusively, that the varieties of appearance are due to circumstances, and change with them. In the brute creation, for example, the swine is changed from black to white by a change of place; his size is doubled, and even his divided hoof becomes solid. Good says, "The whole difference between the cranium of a Negro and a European, is not greater than that of the wild and domestic swine." Change of condition merely has produced the difference. Blumenbach, in a most lively and effective manner, has elucidated this well-known law of change incident to men and animals. This law was known to the inspired writer, who said, "Look not on me, for I am black, for the sun hath looked on me." For the philosophy of this law, the reader is referred to Good's Book of Nature, where it is most ably illustrated. But very few indeed are ignorant of a law so universal, and so manifest in every-day life. My friend says, "Gibbon was ignorant of this law, for two thousand years are insufficient to change the color of the human face." What does such a statement amount to, when every sane man knows that two weeks of exposure to the sun is sufficient to change the "color of the human face" so as to be scarcely recognizable. Hugh Murray says, "The Abyssinian, in the same latitude with the Negro, has retained from time immemorial the Caucasian form and physiognomy." What has this to do with the question? The Abyssinian has retained his locality as long as he has his characteristics. If he were to move to Guinea, and remain as long as he has in his present location, his characteristics would change. He differs from the Negro in characteristics, because he differs in locality. Dr. Good says, "The Abyssinians differ from adjacent Negro tribes, because, though their latitude is nearly the same, their physical climate differs essentially, their country being much higher, and its temperature much lower." The wandering Gypsies can prove nothing against this law, for they have no locality, and stay in no one place long enough to receive any permanent impress. My friend asks, "If the Egyptians were Negroes, and are turning white, why is not the same phenomenon exhibited by other Negro tribes?" I answer, It is. "There are," says Dr. Good, "multitudes of tribes among the black tribes of Africa, exhibiting nothing more than the red or copper color, with lamp-black hair." Their peculiarities of climate, habit, food, &c., are abundantly sufficient to account for their degeneracy from the parent stock. We have already quoted Reese, who says there are many Negro tribes who are gradually assuming Caucasian characteristics, and losing their Negro traits.

An interesting chapter of inquiries might here be instituted. If there is no law at work producing these changes of the human countenance and structure, whence come they? Every one knows that there is an endless variety. In the tribes of Shem, some are black, some red, some white; so of the sons of Ham; and so of Japhet. Now certainly Shem was not white, red, and black, at the same time. These varieties in his descendants, then, came not by hereditary descent. How then came they? To this question there can be but one answer. That answer the scientific world has given, and that law of change all scientific writers have well appreciated. D. E. MAXSON.

"SABBATH DESECRATION."

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

An article in the Recorder of Jan. 23, professing to be an explanation of a former article on "Sabbath Desecration," contained arguments that may be, and doubtless are, used to justify any disregard of the Sabbath, and indeed of the law of God in general, which the individual concerned may choose to sanctify with the convenient position, that as he saw things different from others, he must be left free to act for himself. Who shall dictate to me my rule of conduct? You may answer, The law of God. But I must interpret that law for myself; and if I, by choice or unavoidably, come to a different conclusion from my covenant brethren, who may interfere with my freedom?

"The Report," it is said, "was not rejected because it condemned journeying, harvesting, &c., but that it unjustly placed 'cheesemaking' in the same category, and hence the odium justly attached to the former, unjustly attaches to the latter." Let us look a moment at the other side. Suppose a brother, quite a distance from home, on his return, comes aboard of a steamboat just pushing off, and pays his passage through. In a few days the Sabbath greets him. What shall he do? A family of small children are depending on his daily exertions for support, and will probably need every cent he can save. Now, shall he leave the boat, lose what he has paid, run the risk of finding another conveyance, and incur additional expense as well as waste of time? Would such a course be consistent with the declaration of the Apostle, who considered it worse than "denying the faith," to neglect one's family? "Journeying," in this case, was not "a doctrine of gain, but of saving," what his family needed.

The business of a majority of the farmers throughout the more Western States, is raising wheat, which, by many, is their sole dependence for meeting their engagements, and supporting their families. It sometimes happens, that we have so much rain during harvest as to endanger the crop, if not to ruin it entirely; and perhaps on the Sabbath the wheat is in the best order it has been since reaping, though much injured, and there is a prospect of a storm at hand. Now, what shall we do? The Bible enjoins the payment of our debts, and if our wheat is destroyed, we cannot pay them, and our families must suffer. "Here let it be distinctly understood, that the doctrine is not one of gain, but of saving"—of saving, too, what "nature, unsought, placed in our possession," as truly as she placed milk in the possession of our brethren of the dairy. Our wheat was not "cut on the Sabbath," yet it may be as "naturally incapable of lying over" (through another storm,) "without damage, or absolute loss," as the dairyman's milk. I am unable, as yet, to see the "odium" attached to saving wheat, hay, or the sap for sugar, that would not as "justly attach" to "cheesmaking." How does it happen, that the dairy is a business of gain on each of the working days, but on the Sabbath is only one of "saving?" Is not the cheese made on that day just as large and saleable? If it is merely a business of "saving" on every day, would it not be better to sell the cows, and engage in a more profitable business for a livelihood, thus averting the responsibility of employing a portion of each rest-day in labor, the lawfulness of which is at least doubtful?

Observation and experience would dictate to any person acquainted with the business, that to strain the milk into vessels, made ready the day before, to stand undisturbed till evening, would be much more consistent with the REST and SACREDNESS of the Sabbath, than to go through the whole process of making cheese, thus employing the time perhaps till 9 or 10 o'clock in the morning. The objection is frequently offered, "We have not dishes enough to set the milk?" Allow me to suggest, that they have, at least, a cheese-tub, which would hold one milking, and it would not cost a large fortune to buy pans sufficient to hold the other. I once heard a worthy minister, (since gone to his rest,) who was engaged in the dairy business, remark, that while he was able to own a sufficient number of cows to make the business profitable, he should consider himself able to own pans to set the milk during the Sabbath; and if he could command no other means, he would sell one of his cows for that object. If it is objected to setting the milk for butter, still it need not be thrown away. Our swine need feeding each day, and some new milk, as a treat, on the Sabbath, would be quite acceptable to them; and as they require some kind of food, the milk might thus be saved, better than to displease God by "doing our pleasure on HIS HOLY DAY." Isa. 58: 13, 14.

The principle laid down in the article in question is this—"that we are to pursue that course which best excludes waste, coupled with the least labor; and that 'cheesemaking' was as unobjectionable as any other form." This apology looks much like seeking to dispose of the milk in a manner to produce the greatest profit. We read of a man who anciently acted upon this saving principle, and who, when met by a prophet, blessed him, and said, "I have performed the commandment of the Lord." But what said the prophet? "Behold, to OBEY is better than sacrifice." 1 Sam. 15: 13, 22.

The apology farther says, "that the Report was an unjust interference with the lawful business of a large class of citizens, whose business is of vital importance to the community at large." An occupation may be not only lawful but laudable and necessary on the six days of labor, which would be quite unlawful on the Sabbath. A business may be lawful in the sight of men, which would be an abomination before God. Certainly, to have made the greatest quantity of cheese possible in the "community," cannot be of more "vital importance" than to possess a treasure in heaven, and become "rich towards God." The idea that the righteousness of a certain course must not be questioned because a LARGE MAJORITY are in favor of it, savors so strongly of Romanism, that I am surprised to see it countenanced by a Seventh-day Baptist. The theology of Rome teaches or countenances the notion, that any practice, however wrong or criminal, by being introduced or favored by a majority of the community, becomes a custom, and is therefore right; also, that any act, entirely wrong or criminal in itself, however it is opposed to the law of God, when it has been the custom of a community for ten years, becomes lawful and right; that there is no sin in working on the Sabbath, if we do not become fatigued, and if we do, there is no sin if it is customary, especially if we should suffer a temporal loss by refraining from labor. (See Synopsis of Ligorio's Theology of the Church of Rome, pp. 182—4, 209—18.) Our brethren seem very cautious of imitating Rome in permitting others to interpret the Bible for them. This is as it should be. But while they shun that error, may they not fall into one as egregious on the opposite extreme? My brethren claim the privilege to be their own judges of what is right, "as for himself each must give account to his God." They deem it their privilege to employ quite a share of holy time in ordinary business or labor. Suppose this labor, together with necessary chores, should occupy one-fourth of the rest-day; this, in a year, would amount to thirteen Sabbaths. Who can tell how many souls might have been won to Christ, had those lost Sabbaths been spent in humble but importunate prayer? Who can tell how many humble penitents, almost persuaded to be Christians, have concluded, from such examples, that they were already as good as the majority of professors, and thereby lost their anxiety for a new heart, and sunk to ruin? Who can say that there have not been many inexperienced youth, following on to know the Lord, who, encouraged by such examples, have become loose in principle, forsaken the house of prayer, and mingled with companions whose ways lead to DEATH? What a meagre compensation for the loss of a soul would the gain of a few dollars appear in the DAY OF RECKONING! The arguments referred to become a strong support to those who love gain more than the commandments of God, and are glad to find encouragement in the practice and arguments of a church. I have already heard of one who rejoices in such a sanction. Suppose I choose to work three-fourths, or even the whole of every Sabbath; who may interfere with my freedom? If admonished that the law is plain, my reply would be, that law is under an obsolete dispensation; the gospel reads, "Let no man judge you . . . . of Sabbath days." If discipline were enforced by the church of which I am a member, "dissatisfaction and division would ensue, which would threaten the existence of the church." Permit me to inquire, What is the advantage of a church combination, and in what case could there be church discipline on the above principle?

L. M. AYRES.

LEWISTON, Ill., Feb. 14, 1851.

"I CAN'T PRAY, BUT I'LL SING."

Bro. R. was the best singer in town. And he had the best choir of all the churches. All the young people came to the Baptist church, because their singing was better than in any other. And Bro. R. prided himself in the great good he was doing for the cause of religion, especially among the Baptists.

But Bro. R.'s religion consisted only in singing. He could not pray, nor exhort. For eighteen years he had belonged to the church, but had not prayed. The other brethren did the praying, and he the praising. The truth was, he could not pray.

For a number of years, for some reason, Bro. R. had not attended the communion. He loved the church, rejoiced in its prosperity, sung with all his soul every Sunday, defended the Baptist as the true gospel church, but he felt too unworthy to attend the communion.

Brother R. had a very interesting family of sons and daughters, and one of his daughters, it was believed, had been converted; but she would not acknowledge it. She was known to go alone and pray, and once said, "Oh, I wish father would pray at our house."

The Baptist church of which bro. R. was a member had a new minister, whose labors were blessed, and some signs of revival appeared. The prayer meetings were better attended, and one evening the chorister was there. He came the next, and the next; and our new minister thought he saw bro. R. weeping. Just before the close of the meeting, Bro. R. was called upon to pray. There was a long pause. Many had kneeled down. The minister said nothing. Bro. R. was in a dreadful state. At last the spell was broken by our chorister saying, "I can't pray, but I'll sing." And true enough he roared out—

I'll try to prove faithful,
Faithful, faithful, faithful,
I'll try to prove faithful,
Till we all shall meet above.

The singing was so unexpected, that no one could join in it, and Bro. R., as he sang only the bass, made it go rather roughly; and beside this, his body shook so much that his voice trembled most unaccountably.

The next Sunday evening, our minister preached to backsliders, and after sermon requested all in the house, backsliders and impenitent, who were now willing to seek God's face and favor, to rise up. The very first to rise was Bro. R., who came forward immediately to the front seat, turned around, and begged the church to forgive him, the world to forgive him, and his dear family, his wife, his children, to forgive him. He made a most penitent confession. "Brethren," he exclaimed, "I can pray," and he kneeled down amid a crowd of sinners crying for mercy, among whom were his own children, and sent up a most feeling and earnest prayer.

From this evening the work moved on with great power. His own children, with the exception of a young son, were all converted, and one of his daughters, before an accomplished and gay young lady, is now contemplating a missionary life among the heathen. Since that night the voice of prayer and praise has been heard uninterruptedly, morning and evening, at the house of our chorister; and no one is more punctual at the Lord's Table, or active in the prayer-meeting, than Bro. R. [N. Y. Chronicle.

A HUNDRED YEARS AGO.

Cook had not then navigated the South Seas; Polynesia and Australia were names unknown to geography; no Humboldt had then climbed the Andes; the valley of the Mississippi had not been explored; no European traveler had ascended the Nile beyond the first cataract; the Niger was wholly veiled in mystery; and the Brahmapootra was unknown, even by name, among the rivers of India. The language and dialects of the Eastern world were as little known as the physical aspect and phenomena of the countries. No Sir Wm. Jones had arisen to set the example of Oriental scholarship as a polite accomplishment; the Sanscrit had as yet attracted no attention from Western philologists; the Holy Scriptures had been translated into few vernacular dialects, except those of Western Europe; no Carey or Morrison, no Martyn or Judson, had girded themselves to the task of mastering those languages which had hitherto defied, like an impenetrable rampart, all attempts to gain access to the mind of India and China. A hundred years ago, there were neither Protestant Missionary Societies nor Protestant Missions, save only those which had been formed by the propagation of the gospel in the American Colonies, the Danish missions in Southern India, and the Moravian missions in Greenland and South Africa. In fact, the obstacles to success, in almost every part of the world, arising from the ascendancy and intolerance of the Papal, Mohammedan, and Pagan powers, added to the deficiency of our knowledge and the poverty of our resources, would have proved little short of insurmountable. THE GOSPEL ITS OWN WITNESS.

When the celebrated Tennent was traveling in Virginia, he lodged one night at the house of a planter, who informed him that one of his slaves, a man upwards of seventy, who could neither read nor write, was yet eminently distinguished for his piety, and for his knowledge of the Scriptures. Having some curiosity to learn what evidence such a man could have of their divine origin, he went out in the morning, alone, and without making himself known as a clergyman, entered into conversation with him on the subject. After starting some of the common objections of infidels against the authenticity of the Scriptures, in a way calculated to confound an ignorant man, he said to him, "When you cannot even read the Bible, nor examine the evidence for or against its truth, how can you know that it is the word of God?" After reflecting a moment, the negro replied, "You ask me, sir, how I know that the Bible is the word of God:—I know it by its effect upon my own heart."

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, March 27, 1851.

"OBLIGATION OF THE SABBATH."

As we are under the necessity of intermitting the Sabbath Discussion for a week or two, in order to make room for our correspondents, we would offer a few strictures upon the article from the Chronicle published in our last.

The acknowledgment of "J. N. B.," that the discussion is "seasonable, practical, and, in its relations to the Law and the Gospel, fundamental and all-pervading," we hail with satisfaction. Would that every one could feel so! We should then hope that discussion would not cease, till the Church of God were thoroughly convinced of the sandy foundation on which the popular observance rests. How many times have our attempts to excite the spirit of inquiry been rebuffed with the insinuation, that it was a question of no importance! Indeed, we suspect that "J. N. B." himself would not be slow to avail himself of such a retreat, were the discussion between him and a genuine Bible Sabbath keeper.

It is our conviction, that THE seventh day is vital to the institution; so that one who does not keep it, but substitutes another day in lieu of it, does in reality destroy the Sabbath. He destroys it, because, when another day is substituted, the Sabbath no longer witnesses to the world what the Creator intended that it should. The Creator's intention was, that it should serve as a standing witness against Atheism and Idolatry. It is a monument, upon which God's own finger wrote the inscription, as follows: "In six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested on the seventh day." It was intended, that every passer-by should read the inscription, and be convinced that the worlds sprang not into existence by chance, as the Atheist teaches, but were framed by the word of God. The acknowledgment and worship of the one true God, as the Creator of all things, lies at the very foundation of all religion. The whole law of God grows out of this fact, and consequently there would be no obligation to obey it, if the fact should be disproved. The next consequence would be freedom from all obligation to the gospel; for the gospel becomes a farce the moment that the law ceases to be obligatory. It is of the utmost importance to religion, therefore, that the commemoration of God's work in creation should be perpetuated. We should judge that "J. N. B." was fully sensible of this, from the earnestness with which he battles his anti-sabbatarian opponent. But he never seems to suspect himself of being quite as much an enemy of the Sabbath as the one he so valiantly opposes. Having, in defiance of all just rules of interpretation, assumed that the seventh day of the Decalogue means any seventh day, he fancies himself to be quite a champion for the Sabbath of the Bible. But in what respect is his Sabbath a witness against Atheism? In what respect is it a commemoration of the fact, that the worlds were framed by the word of God? It commemorates no such thing. It does not even pretend to do so, "J. N. B." himself being witness.

> "The work of Christ in our Redemption, in its eternal results, must, in the esteem of all Christians, be of far higher and sweeter import. The day that sealed the certainty of that glorious work, and of the 'new heavens and earth' for the redeemed, must, therefore, of necessity, be more sacred and joyful to believers than that which commemorated the creation of this visible globe."

To commemorate creation, then, in the opinion of this writer, is no longer of any importance! To continue to hold up, in our weekly celebrations, a fact which testifies emphatically against every atheistic notion concerning the origin and formation of the world, is not called for, since Christ has died! We see not but what it follows from his own principles, therefore, that his Sabbath on the first day of the week is not that Sabbath which bears testimony against Atheism. But the Sabbath of the Decalogue is that Sabbath which bears testimony against Atheism. Therefore the Sabbath of "J. N. B." is not the Sabbath of the Decalogue. He is as much an enemy of the Decalogue Sabbath as "Exodus" is.

Alluding to the first Sabbath kept by Adam and Eve in their state of unsullied innocence, the first day after their own creation, he says:—

> "My friend makes merry with the idea of that day as a day of holy rest for man. 'In the name of wonder,' he asks, 'rest from what?' It had better become him, had he risen upward in thought to the sublime repose of the Creator over his finished work, and rembered that man was then in perfect communion of spirit with his God."

We think so too; though we do not clearly see how this answers his "friend's" question. But we would remark upon it, that here gleams out the erroneous idea, that man is not properly prepared to keep the Sabbath till after he has first labored. Close upon this follows another idea, that the great design of the sabbatic institution was to secure to man and beast respit from toil. Then follow all those calculations and reasonings, which occupy such a large space in "Sabbath Manuals," and other publications of like complexion, going to show that man cannot endure labor seven days in succession; that it is unprofitable not to observe a day of rest; that he would make more money in the long run, and that life and health and soundness of intellect depend on a due regard to the day of repose. Seeing, then, that Adam and Eve had not yet given themselves to labor, (as the first Sabbath was but the beginning of their existence,) we are not surprised that "Exodus" asks, in view of the prevalent notion, 'In the name of wonder, from what?' Nor are we at all surprised, that the anti-sabbatarian meets all these physiological arguments for a Sabbath, drawn from the natural inability of the creature to endure uninterrupted toil, with the simple common-sense remark, that man needs rest when he is tired, whether after a longer or shorter interval. Common sense shows that a man may, in two or three days, so exhaust himself by excessive labor, as to require a day of repose for his recovery. And common sense shows, that he might, on the other hand, labor so moderately, that a day of rest once in ten days would answer all the purposes of his physical nature. It is, moreover, a dictate of common sense, that the man who works ten hours a day for six days, and rests the seventh, gains no more in the way of rest than the man who works eight hours a day for seven days; in fact, not so much by four hours. In view of which, the anti-sabbatarian judges it a sufficient reply to all these physiological arguments to say, that man sins by working so immoderately; and that what is necessary to correct the evil is, not a Sabbath, but due moderation in labor every day. And as Adam and Eve were not tired, so they needed no rest. But the true doctrine of the Sabbath gives no room for such objections. The true doctrine is, that it is a commemorative institution, reminding us of the fact that in six days God created the world, and rested the seventh. It is not necessary, therefore, that man should have previously labored, and become weary, before he can consistently keep the Sabbath. He can commemorate God's work, whether he has previously labored himself, or not; whether he is weary or not. Adam kept the Sabbath on the first day of his existence, therefore, just as properly as he did after six days of toil. He rested not from toil; he simply celebrated what his Maker had done.

It is this strictly commemorative character of the Sabbath, which renders its observance on the seventh day of the week necessary. Observed on the first day of the week, it does not commemorate a finished creation. Some have endeavored to make it appear, that the first day of the week was validly the day of creation, because on that day matter was brought into existence, and no new matter was afterwards created. They suppose, therefore, that in keeping the first day of the week they are virtually commemorating the work of creation, while at the same time they are celebrating the completion of a work far more glorious. "J. N. B." appears to entertain some such notion, as we judge from the following language:—"Either there are now two Sabbaths, (which 'Exodus' denies,) or the one Sabbath of the Creation and of the Decalogue is perpetuated—is exalted by a new association with the work of Redemption, and for that reason, by Divine Authority, attached to the first day of the week in preference to the seventh." But the notion is utterly untenable. He who observes the first day of the week may indeed celebrate so much of the work of creation as was performed on the first day; but that is far from answering the design of the sabbatic institution. The real design of it was to celebrate creation as a finished work. Otherwise it is no testimony against Atheism. Atheism is effectually refuted by showing, that all the works of God are wisely contrived, adapted to useful ends, and fitted for the comfort and happiness of the creature. It was, therefore, very wisely ordered, that the Sabbath should be on the weekly recurrence of that day from which the Creator looked back and "saw every thing which he had made, and behold it was all VERY GOOD." And this is the reason why we maintain, that he who does not keep the seventh day of the week, but substitutes another in lieu of it, does in reality destroy the Sabbath. He blots out the very thing which God designed to be a witness against Infidelity, and all under pretense of exalting the work of Redemption. And when we find "J. N. B." quoting with approbation the language of Montalembert to the French Assembly, that "the public profanation of the Sabbath is like a public profession of Atheism," we feel a good deal like saying, "Physician, heal thyself."

REVIVALS IN OHIO.—Our exchanges bring interesting accounts of revivals in various parts of Ohio. At Canaan, the Old School Presbyterian Church has been revived, and some thirty persons added to it. At Kingston, near Chillicothe, a revival of about two weeks' continuanbe has been enjoyed, in which 27 have already been received to the church, and 16 to 20 more are expected. The academy of the Columbus Presbytery shared the blessing, and at least eight young men are expecting to prepare for the ministry. At Oxford, where there is a college with 100 students, and a female seminary with a like number, it is stated that "God has answered the prayers of his people, and cast the salt of his grace into these institutions. A large number of young men have professedly given themselves to the Lord. At one time, forty-one persons made a profession, chiefly students." "The town of Circleville is unusually favored with the presence of the Lord. Revivals are in progress in the Presbyterian and the Methodist churches. Refreshing times from the presence of the Lord are still enjoyed in the Brethren church."

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 31.

GLASGOW, March 7th, 1851.

The British Government has been in a disorganized condition for a fortnight. The Ministry resigned, being, or supposing themselves to be, incapable of carrying the measures which they had resolved to propose. After Lord Stanley had failed in organizing a Conservative Government, and Lord John Russell had also failed in obtaining such alterations in his Cabinet as would have been to himself satisfactory, the latter noble Lord has been urged by the Queen to resume the helm of State with the colleagues he formerly had, and to do as best he can in the case. The first result of these circumstances, there is reason to fear, will be a weakening down of the already too weak proposed Bill for the Repression of Papal Aggression—which is to be again introduced, in the House of Commons, this afternoon.

The Marriage Affinity Bill, which proposed to legalize marriage with the sister of a deceased wife, was again brought before the House of Lords, at this early period of a Parliamentary Session, and negatived by a majority of 50 against 16, although even the prelates were not unanimous as to such marriages being condemned by the Word of God.

If the Ministry be enabled to act with vigor, one of the great questions with which the present Parliament must be engaged will be that of Education. Lord Melgund has brought in his Bill into the Commons, (but slightly altered since it was thrown out last Session,) "to Reform and Extend the School Establishments of Scotland." It does not, however, even with its amendments, find much favor from any party here. In the agitation of the subject last year, the Rev. Dr. Bacon, of New Haven, Connecticut, highly extolled the School System of the United States; and at the Manchester Educational Association meeting, in October last, Mr. Cobden spoke decidedly for the New England plan, and avowed a determination to "agitate" for its adoption. But I fear that Mr. Cobden could be content to dispense with religion in the education of the Family as well as in that of the School. Some of the leading men in the Free Church have addressed to the Privy Council a scheme of their own, in a form to save Parliament almost all trouble in adopting it as a law. They make provision for the Scriptures being read in the schools; but they equally require that the Westminster Assembly's Shorter Catechism shall be taught also—the Catechism, that is, which asserts that since the Resurrection of Christ the first day of the week is the Christian Sabbath; and has appended to the false proposition, what purports to be proofs that it is so. The Free Church have taken a very active part, since leaving the Establishment, in the promotion of Education, and have even been allowed considerable influence in regard to it. They even succeeded in prevailing upon Government to cancel a recent appointment of Dr. Gunn of Edinburgh—one of the members of their own church—as an Inspector of Scottish Schools; but another of their members, obnoxious to the same party, on the same grounds—Dr. Cummings of Glasgow—then received the appointment.

The Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Dublin, are included in the plans of government revision. Last year Commissioners were appointed to inquire into the state of education within them, with the avowed design of considering whether they could be better adapted to the existing state of the country. The proposal excited much displeasure on the part of those who considered their wealth or influence likely to be affected by changes which might be determined upon; and some such parties are stated to have refused to furnish the evidence required by the Commissioners. Resistance they will probably find to be vain; and great abuses are almost sure to be discovered and exposed. The Universities are composed of a large number of colleges, separately endowed by their munificent founders for "poor scholars;" but are now, and have long been, almost exclusively filled with the sons of the rich. They were intended as nurseries of religion, as well as seminaries of good literature; but their value for both purposes has been sadly marred. Sixteen years ago the London University was instituted to supply one of the defects of the older establishments, by receiving and giving equal advantages to students refusing to recognize as correct the doctrines taught by the Church of England. It had been well if even then the lesson had been learned of the need of thorough reform—for previously the observant could perceive, that veneration for antiquity would not screen long palpable perversion, where there seemed neither purpose nor promise to amend.

Confessedly, Oxford, as a University, is of great antiquity, whatever becomes of the tradition that it owes its foundation to Alfred the Great. Nearly six centuries ago, according to the annalist, 30,000 scholars attended in 300 halls—while now its students number only about 1,500. The Reformation greatly diminished the number of such scholars, as it affected the abbeys and monasteries from which very many of them came. In 1651, the number of students was 3,247, but there was soon after a great decrease. Besides the colleges, which are all endowed, there are halls, which are not endowed, the students in which hire their chambers and pay for their diet to the Principal. The property belonging to these halls is held in trust by the University. The University of Oxford has always enjoyed self-government; and in the reign of Charles I. an adjusted code of its statutes, known as the "Caroline Statutes," was compiled. Belonging to the colleges there are 400 fellowships, 500 scholarships, and 450 advowsons. The University is said to depend chiefly for revenue on fees, the profits of its printing press, and other fluctuating sources of income. Some of the fellowships are worth as much as £700 a year; and perhaps on an average £300 each—the aggregate income, it is said, being about £120,000 annually. The highest University Office is the Chancellorship, which till the middle of the 15th century was always filled by a churchman. J. A. BEGG.

NOTES OF A VOYAGE FROM CALIFORNIA—No. 3.

From a Journal of Dr. J. D. B. STILLMAN of New York.

At the landing stood a group of copper-colored men, with dirty white cotton clothing, and old flint-lock muskets, representing custom-house officers. Near by was a large one-storied adobe building, with a tile roof, like all that I had seen in South America. A few boxes were scattered about, and idlers in great plenty. Our baggage was soon on the heads of some natives, who led the way up to the town, and we followed on by a row of thatch cottages, half concealed by the trees and cactus, for the distance of half of a mile, when we found ourselves in a town of considerable size, but irregular, filthy, and ruinous.

Rialejo was destroyed by a party of Buccaneers in the seventeenth century. Dampier, the celebrated voyager, was one of this number. Their chief object was the capture of the city of Leon, fifty leagues distant. The traces of former greatness and wealth meet you at every step. Here a regular, substantial pavement, now disused; and every where the foundations of large strong walls of masonry, whose superstructure has given place to thatched cottages; a few of the better class have adobe walls. The ruins of a large convent, whose solid masonry has withstood the storms of nearly two centuries, still lift their broken arches and dome, fissured by fire and earthquakes. Time is rendering them more imperishable, by binding them up with climbing trees and vines, that cover them like the meshes of a net.

The hotel where our baggage was carried was of modern and improved construction, having a second story, open on all sides, which was used for a sleeping room. This was called the "American," and I recognized as the host Mr. Mulhado, formerly of San Francisco, and late of Sacramento. Tickets were furnished at the bar for dinner, which in due time was served up, with a parsimony better suited to a "prospecting" party at the mines, than to a country overflowing with its abundance. The charges were extortionate. It is unfortunate when one rises from his dinner in bad humor, for then every thing else goes ill. I went out regretting that I could not talk the language of the country, as it made me in a measure dependent on these scamps; when chance led me to an old church, whose walls were crumbling with age, and covered with lichens and grass. The niches in the front, where formerly statues had been placed, were almost obliterated. In a little thatched shed near by were three bells, which had evidently suffered the ordeal of fire, and were badly broken, but were still made to ring out their matins and vespers, as when they hung in the tower of the convent two hundred years ago. This church was accidentally left undestroyed by the pirates. The roof was of tile, supported on rude rafters, and the floor of square bricks. Notwithstanding the rude display of sculptured wood and gilded ornaments, upon the altars and walls, it had a gloomy, saddening appearance. On one side was a variety of gay flowers, decking the image and shrine of the Virgin; some were in wreaths or festoons; others were made into small bouquets, and introduced into the mouths of broken glass bottles or earthen ware. Opposite to this, where hung the wooden image of the Saviour crucified, was an old dusty skull, and other human bones. Within the chancel was another altar, upon which were various toys, fruits, and flowers, little offerings of piety, such as school children bring to a favorite instructress. While I stood with uncovered head in this rude but solemn temple, a half-clad female entered, and knelt in the middle of the floor. Fearing that my presence might be regarded as an intrusion, I removed my unsanctified feet from the floor, and picking a large cluster of purple flowers that grew in the threshold, I put it in a button-hole of my coat, and walked out into somebody's garden. Having helped myself plentifully to fruit, I returned to the hotel, and engaged a hammock for the night. At the time of the discovery of America, hammocks were in general use by the people of the country, and at this day they are the most conspicuous article of furniture in every house. They are beautifully woven from a species of native grass, and are both large and elastic. For comfort and cleanliness, I preferred them to any sleeping accommodations which I saw here. Between the annoyance of musketoes and the disturbance occasioned by disorderly travelers, my first night on shore was passed very uncomfortably.

Several companies of men, who have served an apprenticeship in California, have been formed here to forward passengers through to San Juan; and every assurance that may be necessary, and promises without stint, are made to convince the traveler that he will be forwarded through with greater economy and dispatch by committing himself to their care; yet a more graceless set of swindlers never infested a country. There are two modes of conveyance. One is by a clumsy two-wheeled vehicle, called a carita, covered with skins, and drawn by four oxen. The wheels are transverse sections of large trees, and about six inches thick. To the end of the tongue is fastened a cross-piece, which is lashed to the horns of the wheel oxen, so that the cerita cannot capsize without lifting one of the oxen from his feet. When the floor is covered with baggage, there is just room for two or three men to crawl in between it and the raw-hide top. Six men are furnished with one of these, and a driver, who sits on the carita, armed with a long sharp goad, which he thrusts into the animals till they bleed; while another boy, ten or twelve years old, precedes them as guide, carrying a machita, or long knife, which is worn by nearly all the natives while on the road, and which serves the three-fold purpose of sword, axe, and eating knife, and without which it would be difficult to penetrate the thickets. In this manner transportation is performed to Grenada, and the price asked is six dollars for each person. The other mode is by horses, which are provided for those who would ride at twelve dollars, which is the value of a good horse in this country. In this case, a guide is furnished, who is to provide for the animals, and return with them. I chose the latter method, and sent my little baggage on in a carita, in the care of some friends. I obtained a good horse, and prepared to set out on the morning of Dec. 2d, with one companion. When about to start, my attention was arrested by the humiliating spectacle of an American, who had died on the previous night from a debauch, carried along on a cart, like a dead dog, by the natives, unattended by a white man, and uncovered to the sun and dust. To any one at all sensible of the responsibilities of the people of the United States to their less civilized neighbors, a journey in the path of California adventure will furnish many a humiliating lesson, if it does not cover him with shame. It is with pain that I think of the brutal conduct of many of my countrymen, as it was exhibited during the whole route through Central America. The character which the nation enjoys, they arrogate to themselves, and abuse the confidence which it inspires. With less claims as individuals to a character for refinement, they perpetrate the most indecent outrages upon a people whom they call unenlightened, but who are greatly their superiors in every virtue that gives value to civilization. It is to be hoped, that an enlightened public sentiment will hold such to a strict accountability for their conduct.

Leaving the town behind us, we urged our horses at a quick pace through the narrow and thickly-wooded road, in hope of finding a more open, or at least a dryer one. We passed companies of girls, dressed with calico skirts, secured just above the hips, leaving them otherwise naked, carrying various kinds of produce upon their heads, or fowls in their hands—an extraordinary demand having been created for these last by the fastidious tastes of Californians, and no table could be considered as set for them unless it was supplied with eggs and chickens. We fell in soon after with two natives, one of whom, by the peculiarity and elegance of his dress, we knew to be a priest; and as we had heard much of the dangers of the road, though we had formidable looking pistols in our belts, we still thought it might not be amiss to have one of his order in our company; but from some cause he did not see fit to cherish a reciprocal regard for our society, and quickened his speed. At this time we should probably have parted company, when, by one of those fortuitous circumstances which so often pervert the ways of men, the animals were otherwise disposed. They had been trained to travel in companies, and when one went faster, the other was sure to follow; and, to the infinite mortification of both parties, they would not separate, until an unfortunate slip of the priest's horse nearly threw him from his saddle, and left his sacerdotal headgear lying in the mud. The road here was wide, and much broken by the recent rains and cart-wheels, but there was much to interest us, especially the strange birds, flowers, and heavy forest trees. The morning-glory coved the weeds and bushes along the road, and often climbed the tallest trees, and a beautiful species of parrot screamed discordantly.

We arrived about 10 A. M. at Chinandega, after a ride of three leagues, over a much-frequented road, but through a country that is a wilderness of forests. The land lies well, and is very rich, but it is held by a people without ambition. We had been furnished with a way-bill to the agent for the men who owned the horses, and now presented it at the Fulton House, and riding through the great door-way in the front, we dismounted in the court, after the fashion in all Spanish houses. At this place we were obliged to wait until the next day for a guide and a larger company. After dinner, I strolled about the town, which contains a population of about 10,000, and is regularly laid out on the Rialejo river, which is a mere brook at this point. The houses are mostly built of thatch from the cocoa-nut tree, though many on the principal streets are of adobe, with tile roofs and brick floors. The fences, as in Rialejo, are of a very tall and cylindrical species of cactus; they sometimes grow thirty feet high, and are of the very uniform diameter of six or eight inches. They are set in compact rows, and when one of these perishes, its place is supplied by cutting off a part of one unnecessarily long, and planting the cutting as a post, where it takes root and flourishes. It seemed impossible for art to have contrived a fence of greater durability, beauty, and strength. Within these enclosures are cultivated bananas, oranges, and nearly all that the people require for their support. The whole town has a cleanly and quiet appearance, much in harmony with the character of the people. They are mostly Indians, but kind, especially to Americans; indeed, it is difficult to find a bad countenance among them. Their conduct towards each other is uniformly courteous and gentle; but in those respects by which we judge a people rich, they are very poor. They cultivate no more than to meet their own consumption, and the plantain is to them what bread is to us. The dishes used by the masses grow also in their gardens, being made from the calabash; but knives and forks are as yet a rarity, even in the hotels. Smoking tobacco is a practice universal among men, women, and children. They have few foreign luxuries, and but little gold and silver. The most of the coin in circulation is American dimes, eight of which are taken for a dollar more readily than the same number of Spanish eighths of a dollar. The dress of the females is much as before mentioned, with a sort of shirt in embryo, reaching about four inches on the arms, and to within the same distance of the skirt. As in all the Spanish colonies, bonnets are never worn. Children go naked till the age of puberty; and it is no uncommon sight to see a boy in a state of nature, with the exception of a palm-leaf hat on his head, walking the street with a cigar in his mouth. The day was nearly spent in rambling and trying to sketch some views that appeared to me peculiar. While passing to the cathedral, just before sundown, I crossed the public square, and met a party of a dozen soldiers conducting a chain-gang of two convicts to the guard-house. One of them was a fat, jovial-looking fellow, smoking a cigar, and looking the very personification of contentment, wearing his chains with the dignity of commander. As I passed him, he asked me for another cigar. The officer in command grinned, and said, "Good morning," although it was evening. On my return, I passed the guard-house, where they were drawn up in line, with arms at "support," when the same officer again shouted out, to the extent of his voice, "Good morning." The whole State of Nicaragua is overrun with lean yellow dogs, and every household in Chinandega has more dogs than children—so numerous that they cannot find food for the necessities of life; and I found that to be literally true here, which I had always regarded as a hyperbole, that the dogs were compelled to lean against the houses to bark.

LYNCHING A MISSIONARY IN KENTUCKY.—Rev. Edward Mathews has been for some time preaching and lecturing in the South-Western States, under the patronage of the American Baptist Free Mission Society. On the 18th of February, in the vicinity of Richmond, Kentucky, he was mobbed and subjected to most brutal and barbarous treatment, at the hands of persons who probably supposed that the Union, or something else, was endangered by the manner in which he exposed the evils of slavery. To save his life, he was compelled to give a pledge that he would leave Kentucky, and not return.

METHODIST MISSIONARY FUNDS.—It is said that in raising money for missionary purposes, some of the Southern Methodist Conferences have manifested a spirit of great liberality. From the returns it appears that during the past year the Alabama Conference contributed $11,700, Georgia Conference $12,000, and South Carolina Conference $17,700. Query—How much of this money was received from men who buy and sell their brethren, and live upon the avails of their unpaid labor?

MISSIONARIES FOR OREGON AND CALIFORNIA.—The Methodist Missionary Board, at a late meeting in New York, recommended that five more missionaries be sent to Oregon and California, as early as the Bishop having charge of the Foreign Missions finds it practicable. Those five will be in addition to the five already appointed and announced, and who will sail on the 13th of March, viz. Rev. Messrs. Woodward and Kingsley for Oregon, and Messrs. Bateman, Dryden, and Maclay, for California.

REVIVAL AT SHILOH, N. J.—From Shiloh, N. J., we learn that an interesting state of things is in progress with the church in that place. The dedication of their new house of worship was followed by a series of meetings, and, at the last accounts, some thirty or forty professed to be under concern of mind, six had been baptized, and more were expected the next Sabbath. Thus writes Bro. Jones, under date of March 4th, and promises to communicate with us again.

HEALTH OF MRS. JUDSON.—The Baptist Register says that a letter just received from Mrs. Judson, ("Fanny Forrester,") of the 13th of October last, gives the melancholy intelligence that her health has become so impaired "by continued disease for the last five months," that "there is but little hope of a permanent relief except in a return to America." "The mission," she also says, "is enfeebled by sickness and death."

METHODISM GROWING "WORLDLY."—A statement is going the rounds, to the effect that a Methodist Church has just been completed in Louisville, Ky., which is one of the most costly and elegant Methodist churches in the world. It is ninety feet long, sixty wide, and forty high. The pews are circular, and finished in sofa style. The fresco painting is said to be in fine taste.

EPISCOPAL MISSION IN CHINA.—The Independent says that the Episcopal Board of Missions have obtained a very seasonable and valuable reinforcement to their China Mission, in Rev. Robert Nelson, of Lexington, Va., who has resigned his parish to accept the appointment of missionary to Shanghai.

LIBERAL DONATIONS.—The Boston correspondent of the Newburyport Herald says:—"The sum of twenty thousand dollars has been subscribed and paid, within the past few weeks, by the Unitarians in this city, in aid of the Theological School in Meadville, near Lake Erie, in Pennsylvania. One of the western friends of this institution, H. J. Huidekoper, Esq., offered to make a donation of ten thousand dollars, on condition that the farther sum of forty thousand was obtained. Twenty-six thousand dollars of this amount has been obtained in New England."

Love of the Jews for Palestine.—Mr. J. B. Goldberg, of the London Jews' Society, at Salonica, gives a description of the annual emigration from that port of Jews to Palestine, which forcibly illustrates the fervent love of the Israelites for their country. Some 80 families were then about leaving for Jerusalem, some of whom were from as far back as Widdin. A vessel leaves that port every year with passengers for the Holy Land. He says:—

"As most of these settlers exercise no trade, they live a listless, inactive life. Still they are not so dependent on the pittance of the community as their Ashkenazim brethren. They generally leave at their respective homes a house, shop, or some capital, entrusted to the management of some of their friends, from the income of which they expect to maintain themselves; while many of the Polish Jews are penniless before they have reached the Holy Land, and consequently from the first hour look for the alms of their richer brethren from different parts of the world."

The Jews at Salonica.—One of the missionary periodicals for March gives the following account, furnished by Mr. Dodd, of the religious interest among the Jews of Salonica. Under date of Jan. 4, he says:—

"About seventy persons were crowded into our little parlor. Mrs. Dodd had thirty or forty women in another room; and some forty were outside, who could not be admitted. We know not whereunto this may grow. Anathemas may reduce our congregation to two or three next week, or we may continue to have increasing crowds."

The expected anathema was pronounced a few days after by the Rabbis; it had no effect, however, and they resorted to the expedient of stationing men in the street before the missionary's house, who turned away large crowds from coming to the meeting.

Deaths of Editors.—Three able and eminent editors have died within a few days—John S. Skinner at Baltimore, Isaac Hill in Washington, and Mordecai M. Noah in New York. Mr. Hill had been for some years in bad health, but Col. Skinner was cut off by a deplorable casualty, while Maj. Noah's death was also sudden, caused by palsy. Mr. Noah was a Jew by birth, and edited the Sunday Times up to his last illness. For many years, in connection with a number of papers, he was one of the most popular editors in the State of New York. He was once Sheriff of this City and County, and had previously been a U. S. Consul in Barbary. Mr. Hill was a farmer's son, who early learned the trade of a printer, and while yet quite young established the first Democratic paper at Concord, N. H. He had talent, tact, and rare industry, and gradually acquired an unrivaled influence in his State. Col. Skinner started and long conducted 'The American Farmer,' the first agricultural paper published in America, and perhaps in the world. He was for years Postmaster at Baltimore, and afterwards, for some years, an Assistant Postmaster General. Subsequently he came to New York, and for some years edited the 'Farmer's Magazine.' Finally he removed that paper to Philadelphia, changed its name to 'The Plow, Loom and Anvil,' and was its editor at the time of his death.

The "Higher Law" in Wisconsin.—At the Fifth Anniversary of the Wisconsin Sunday School Union, held at Waukesha on the 18th of February, the following resolutions, introduced by Hon. E. D. Holton, and advocated by several clergymen, were adopted:

1. Resolved, That the highest law is God's law.
2. Resolved, That all human law that contravenes or comes in conflict with that law is wrong.
3. Resolved, That the late Fugitive Slave Law is in contravention of God's law, and that the youth of this State ought so to be taught.

Revival at Princeton, Ky.—The Louisville Watchman & Evangelist has a communication from Rev. G. D. McLean, describing a protracted service of thirty-one days, in which he was assisted by Rev. J. C. Province, of Clarksville, Tenn.; as the result of which, 75 persons, 47 males, professed religion, generally from 16 to 55 years of age, 33 of whom joined the Cumberland Presbyterian church. The pastors of the Baptist, Methodist and Presbyterian churches cooperated, and all who love revivals were enlisted. The Cumberland College, located at Princeton shared freely in the work, the entire senior class being now professors of religion. [Independent.

Affray at a University.—At the Missouri University, in Columbia, Mo., a serious affray lately took place. Geo. P. Clarkson, a student, took offense at Robert A. P. Grant, a tutor, for informing the faculty of some offense of his. He accordingly chastised him in the street, and the faculty then expelled him. On the afternoon of the 4th inst. Clarkson attacked Grant, with a stick in one hand and a pistol in the other, and Grant, drawing a pistol, fired first, the ball entering Clarkson's left side. Clarkson fired without inflicting any injury. Grant surrendered himself to the authorities.

The Legislature of New York have just made a visit to this city. They were invited by the authorities to come and see the practical working of those benevolent institutions to which they have been petitioned from time to time to appropriate large sums of money; the proprietors of the People's Line of Steamers between New York and Albany, voted them a free passage; and so they adjourned over from Friday last to Tuesday, for the purpose of visiting Gotham, to see and be seen. The representation was very respectable in number, and was received and entertained with a hospitality honorable to the city, and gratifying to the Legislators.

Fifteen Days Later from California.

The steamship Crescent City, from Chagres, arrived at New York on the evening of March 21st, with 129 passengers, $500,000 in gold dust, and fifteen days later news from California.

The passengers by the Crescent City brought a rumor of a murder having been committed on the Chagres River, on a company of 12 Americans, two of whom were ladies, by their boatmen and some outlaws from Carthagena.

The great discovery of gold on a beach north of San Francisco, turns out to be a thing very different from what it was at first represented—the "fortunes for all" are just no fortunes at all.

There has been another fight between the whites and Indians in Mariposa County, in which some forty Indians are reported as having been killed, and fifty horses and mules captured.

The Pacific News says that on Pitch (or Pitt) River, the principal affluent of the Sacramento, which flows through a charming valley, and about five days journey from Goose Lake, there is a hill of pure Carbonate of Magnesia, 100 feet high. Much of it is perfectly white, while some is more or less discolored with iron, as if a painter had been striving to give effect by a coloring of light and shade. Large masses are easily detached, which, rolling down into the river that washed its base, floated off as light and buoyant as cork, until it became saturated with water.

The following are the principal gold stories brought by this arrival—rather too rich to be generally believed.

Recent discoveries on Bear River, near Steep Hollow, have been made, which are said to pay the men engaged $40 or $50 per day. The gold is taken from what appears to be decomposed granite. Shafts have already been sunk in the hill to considerable depth, and the vein still pays. About fifty men are employed at this place.

The Transcript says that a rich crevice was recently struck on the north branch of the North Fork of the Yuba, by a Dr. Chase and partner, which yielded them one hundred and twenty ounces of gold dust in one day.

The Steamboat Bar Company, located on a bar at the forks of the Yuba, half a mile below Downieville, took out on Tuesday 72 ounces of gold dust; on the next day at noon they only had two and a half ounces, but on that afternoon they took 120 ounces.

We have been informed, says the Transcript, that a miner arrived at San Francisco in the Gold Hunter on Saturday, who had been engaged 11 days in digging on a bar in Trinity River, and each day he made $1,000. It may be true—it comes to us at second hand, and we don't vouch for it.

—Since the above was in type, farther news from Chagres has been received, which renders it certain that the report of murder on the Isthmus is true. The victims were eleven persons, passengers on board the steamship Empire City, from New York—eight men, two females, and one child, whose bodies have been found. The following are their names so far as known:—Thomas McDermot, 274 Greenwich-st., New York; Joseph Brooks, fruiterer, corner of Dey-st. and Broadway, New York; a man by the name of Moody; Fidele Pepin, a native of France; Leonore Landry, gold-beater, of Paris; John W. Steele, Waterloo, Ind.; Catharine Cameron; a man by the name of Patrick.

One Week Later from Europe.

Two steamers from Europe, the Franklin and the Arctic, have arrived since our last, bringing Liverpool and London dates to March 8.

The Ministerial Crisis in England has ended by the recall of the Russell Ministry, entire and unchanged. This was decided on by the advice of the Duke of Wellington to the Queen.

An important modification has been made in the Anti-Papal Bill. What was most essential is taken out of it, namely, the prohibition forbidding the Catholic Bishops to receive bequests in trust for Church purposes, and to perform the offices of the ordination and collation of priests. All that is left is a hundred pound fine for the unauthorized assumption of prelatic titles.

In France there has been a great flurry, caused by a speech in the Assembly, furnishing matter for innumerable newspaper articles.

From Turkey we hear that the exiles who have been kept at Kutahia are to be released at once, with a few exceptions. Among those still kept are Kossuth and Batthyany.

A new and serious war has broken out in the British possessions in Southern Africa between the colony and the native races of the Kaffirs. It is presumed that this war will not endanger the American Missions, although the London, Wesleyan, and Scotch Missions, will probably suffer severely. Rev. Mr. Bryant, the American Missionary, died Dec. 23.

The Swiss journals state that a sanguinary conflict had just taken place at Matten, in the district of Interlacken, between the troops and a band of insurgents, in the course of which two of the former and eight of the latter were seriously wounded. Several of the insurgents have been arrested.

Great sensation has been lately caused at Florence by an intended duel with pistols between two countesses, in consequence of a political dispute. The combatants were on the ground, and the pistols charged, when fortunately their husbands arrived, and put a stop to the affair.

A letter from Bologne, of the 26th ult., states that since the creation of Military Courts in the Papal States, upward of 130 banditti have been shot, and that nevertheless robberies are increasing to a frightful extent. The bands are mostly composed of youths of from 17 to 24 years of age, who submit to death with a most astonishing indifference.

In Washington, recently, a negro named Noah C. Hanson, charged with harboring two runaway slaves last Summer, the property of Hon. Walter Colcock, was tried in the Criminal Court and found guilty. He was fined $1,800, and to stand committed until the same is paid.

The Liquor Traffic in Ohio.

The Legislature of Ohio has passed the following "Act to restrain the Liquor Traffic," which was on the 12th of March duly signed by the Speakers of the Senate and House of Representatives:—

An Act to restrain the sale of Spirituous Liquors.

Section 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That if any person shall sell or vend, or give away with intent to evade the provisions of this law, any spirituous liquors, of any kind whatever, to be drank in the place where sold; or if any person shall sell, or vend, or give away with intent to evade the provisions of this act, any spirituous liquors, of any kind whatever, by less quantity than one quart; or if any person shall sell, or vend, or give away with intent to evade the provisions of this act, any spirituous liquors, of any kind whatever, to any person under sixteen years of age; each and every person so offending, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof, shall, for the first offense above specified, be fined in any sum not exceeding $25, nor less than $5; and for the second offense above specified, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined in any sum not exceeding $20, nor less than $5; and for the third offense above specified, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $15, nor less than $5; Provided, That nothing contained in this section shall be so construed as to make it unlawful to sell any spiritous liquors for medicinal or pharmaceutical purposes.

Sec. 2. All prosecutions under the provisions of this act, shall be by indictment in the Court of Common Pleas, in the county where such offense is committed, or before some Justice of the Peace, according to the second section of the act entitled, "An Act granting Licenses and regulating Taverns," passed February 17, 1835. Provided, That prosecutions under this act may be brought before the Mayor or other officer having judicial powers in any incorporated city or town in this State.

Sec. 3. In all prosecutions under the provisions of this act, it shall not be necessary to alledge or prove the kind of spirituous liquor sold; but it shall be sufficient to prove that the article sold was spirituous liquor.

Sec. 4. All laws or parts of laws licensing the sale of spirituous liquors, which are inconsistent with the provisions of this act, shall be and the same are hereby repealed.

Sec. 5. This act shall take effect and be in force after the first day of May, 1851.

Chaplin to be Demanded.—The Baltimore Patriot of Thursday last has the following:—

The bail which was given for the appearance of Chaplin before the County Court, now sitting at Ellicott's Mills, to answer several indictments charging him with attempting to kill, &c., has been forfeited. When the case was called before the Court, Chaplin was not there to answer. We understand that the money will be paid by the security, on proper demand.

The question now comes up, is this man, or can any man, charged with a criminal offense in this State, be released from punishment, by paying the forfeit of a bond which he gave for his appearance to answer the charge? Of course he cannot. The bail was for his appearance—not to free him from trial. This Chaplin is, therefore, now a fugitive from justice, and will, we understand, be demanded by the Governor.

Plank Roads.—A pamphlet on Plank Roads, by Mr. Kingsford, states that there are in the State of New York nineteen plank roads, of the aggregate length of 2,106 miles, which cost $3,860,298, or an average cost per mile of $1,833. The stock in these roads has all been subscribed for by individuals, and all pays handsome dividends. The Troy and Lansinburg road pays 10 per cent. semi-annual; the Utica and Burlington 20 per cent.. and it is believed that none in operation pay less than 10 per cent. annually. The value of lands on the line of these improvements has also materially advanced—in some instances from $5 to $10 per acre. In Canada there are 442 miles of road open, at a cost of $773,500, or an average of $1,750 per mile.

Terrible Explosion.—A recent arrival from Rio Janeiro gives an account of a terrible accident which occurred in the harbor on the 8th of January. The French schooner Eliza, which had arrived a few days previous, on her way to San Francisco, was at anchor near the fort of Villegaignow. She had 80 kilogrammes of powder on board, which by some neglect became ignited, when she blew up with a tremendous explosion, and soon afterwards sank. She had 240 passengers, only a few of whom were on board at the time; 10 were killed, and about 20 wounded. After the sinking of the schooner, the crews of the neighboring vessels rescued the survivors.

A Candidate for Congress Arrested for Murder.—Gen. William Cullum was on the 10th inst., nominated for Congress by the Whigs of the Nashville District, in Tennessee. A few days previous he shot Thomas Davidson at Gainsboro' Court, and the latter died of his wounds. It appears that Davidson had just been released from the Penitentiary for shooting Gen. Cullum some years since. He was pardoned upon a strong petition, in which Cullum joined. The latter is said to have acted on the defensive, and to have shot his antagonist a hundred paces distant with a rifle. He has been arrested and held to bail in the sum of $20,000, with two securities, each of $10,000.

Fighting at the Cape of Good Hope.—The Boston Traveler has received the Cape Town Mail, Extra, of Feb. 3. It contains the most deplorable accounts of the state of things throughout the frontier districts. English farmers had been murdered, and their farms plundered and dwellings burnt. From the last of December to the 4th of February a desultory warfare had been carried on. The English and their native allies were generally victorious in pitched battles, and numbers of the rebel chiefs had been killed. In one battle, near Fort Hare, where the Kaffirs were 3,000 strong, a much smaller number routed them, the Kaffirs leaving 100 dead upon the field. Most of the Hottentots who were in the service of the farmers had either joined the rebels or formed separate encampments, remaining neutral, but subsisting, it was supposed, on the plunder of the deserted farms. All the mission stations in Kaffir Land had been burnt down except the Seminary at Alice and the Chumie Station. Sir Harry Smith, the English Governor, at the last accounts, was near the frontier, assembling an army, which would soon amount to 10,000 men. The Dutch boors were assembling rather reluctantly. Those of the Colonists who were slack in turning out to fight, were, without ceremony, handed over to a Court Martial. It was feared that the Hottentots would generally join the rebels.

Oregon Indians.—The schr. Richmond, which arrived recently from Richmond, Va., had on board, as passengers, three Oregon Indians of the Callapooah tribe, on the borders of California. These, with six others, have been traveling through the United States, and sojourning at Westfield, Mass., where they have been receiving a finished English education. They are now on their return to the Pacific coast, under the guidance of Mr. James B. Crosmon. Their names are Oskinawah, Nicolasis, and Mocischee.

SUMMARY.

They had a spirited and interesting time in Tennessee on the 22d ultimo, in a celebration of the success of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company in tunneling the Cumberland Mountain. About seven hundred ladies and gentlemen participated, passed through the tunnel, heard speeches, ate a sumptuous dinner, drank spirited toasts, and danced the night. The tunnel is 3,000 feet long, and 185 feet from the top of the mountain.

The corporation of Sandwich, Massachusetts, among other commendable acts, voted that each family have one barrel of herrings, and that the Selectmen employ some suitable person to take charge of the river and take the herrings. The Sandwich Observer highly approves of this "Peace Measure," "inasmuch as many families last year failed to obtain their share of this delectable fish, much to their disappointment."

A statement of the condition of the Hamilton Exchange Bank has been published by the officers. They state the circulation to be $48,896, and the securities, New York and United States Stocks, at $51,000. The officers say that they feel confident that the Bank has not a bad debt, or a note that is not entirely good.

It is computed that the regular subscribers to the New York Sun, standing side by side, and each occupying eighteen inches space, would form a line seventeen miles, fourteen rods and three yards long. Standing with arms extended, and occupying six feet each, they would reach sixty-eight miles, fifty-eight rods and one yard.

Amin Bey, accompanied by J. P. Brown, Esq., U. S. dragoman, and lady, together with a private interpreter and servant, left Washington March 19 for Baltimore, where he will remain for a few days, and then proceed to New York, on his way homeward.

The stock jobbers of Lyons employ swallows instead of carrier pigeons to bring the prices of stocks from Paris. The swallows are taken from their young, and maternal instinct urges them back, wearing a ribbon marked with the prices in question.

The ship Robena, from Liverpool for Baltimore, went ashore during the snow storm on Monday last week off Cape Henry. Five of her cabin passengers, two ladies and three gentlemen, were drowned in the surf in attempting to land.

The "Equinoctial Storm," which occured on Sunday, Monday and Tuesday of last week, did great damage on the seaboard. The damage in the vicinity of Boston is estimated at $100,000. All over New England, the snow fell and drifted so as greatly to impede railroad travel.

Yesterday morning, says the Boston Bee of March 19th, a vessel was discovered off Lynn Beach, with signals of distress flying. Two men immediately set off in a boat to her assistance. The boat was upset in the surf, and both men drowned.

A dispatch from Buffalo, March 19, says: "The steamer Arrow, from Detroit, arrived yesterday afternoon. The Saratoga, from Detroit, has gone down to Black Rock; she has 180 passengers. Our navigation is now open, and hereafter there will be a daily boat."

A dispatch dated New Bedford, Friday, March 21, says, The Mary Euphrates, Uncas, and Dampworth, arrived here yesterday from whaling expeditions, bringing 11,700 bbls. of whale oil, 310 sperm, and 206,000 lbs. of whalebone; also a quantity of gold dust.

On Tuesday night, March 18th, after a long and hard struggle, the Legislature of New York elected Hamilton Fish, late Governor of the State, as Senator of the United States for six years from the 4th of March inst.

A Convention, composed entirely of colored citizens, was held in New York last week, to consider the present condition of the Negro Race, and to devise means for its improvement.

The Buffalo Commercial has a card from the cashier of the Hollister Bank, which says that this Bank is not affected by, and will not lose a single dollar by F. Hollister.

Nothing decisive is known about the Lewis Co. Bank, but it is generally believed that it will go on. Mr. Hollister, it is stated, has provided funds to pay all the circulation.

The Philadelphia kidnappers, Alberti and Price, have been sentenced, the former to 10 years imprisonment and $1,000 fine, the latter to 8 years and $700.

The bark Waldron, of Boston, from Baltimore, laden with Cumberland coal, was destroyed by fire, caused by spontaneous combustion, off the Falkland Islands.

The wooden paper mill building of Daniel Buck, Jr., of Hartford, at Poquonock, Conn., was burnt on Saturday morning, and with it was consumed the town bridge over the Farmington River adjoining.

The Legislature of Missouri has passed a bill fixing the legal rate of interest at seven per cent., but permitting as high as twelve per cent. to be taken when specified by contract.

Fast Day in Connecticut, Friday, April 18.

Gen. George McDuffie, of S. C., is dead, after a protracted and painful illness. He entered Congress in 1821, and served fourteen years successively in the House; was then eight years out of Congress, until 1843, when he was elected to the Senate, in which he served nearly or quite six years, when increasing and painful infirmities compelled his retirement from public life.

The Worcester (Mass.) Tribune learns that the house of Mr. Phillips, in N. Woonsocket, was recently destroyed by fire, and three of his children burnt to death by the devouring element, and another severely injured. Mr. P., while endeavoring with true parental love to save one of the children, had his ten toes completed burnt off.

We were recently shown thirty-five heads, with two thousand three hundred and thirty-six grains, or kernels, of wheat, the product of one at a single growth. One head alone contained one hundred and eight kernels. It was grown on the premises of Harvey Ely, Esq., of Hector, Tompkins Co., and of the kind denominated Hutchinson wheat.

A gentleman from Portland, Me., says that 31 Fugitive Slaves left that City, March 4, for St. Johns, N. B. They were urged to remain by the citizens, who promised them protection, but they were living in constant fear, and preferred to go into safety while all was yet quiet. A number of fugitives still remain at Portland, declaring that they will never be taken alive.

On Friday afternoon, March 21, John S. Skinner, editor of The Plow, the Loom, and the Anvil, fell through a door in the Baltimore City Post Office into a deep cellar, striking his head against a large stone, and fracturing his skull. He died the same evening, without recovering his senses.

The in-coming Wheat crop, says the Syracuse Journal, has passed the ordeal of Winter without injury, and, in all this section wears a very promising appearance. The plant was unusually well grown and rooted last fall, and the Winter has been favorable.

By the Shipping and Commercial List of March 15, we see that there was on that day, in the port of New York, 18 steamships, 82 ships, 75 barks, 105 brigs, and 140 schooners—making 420 sea-going vessels, beside an innumerable number of river steamers, sloops, and small craft.

During the week ending February 22d, three different shocks of an earthquake were experienced on the Island of Porto Rico. On the 29th, at 3½ o'clock in the morning, a severe shock was felt, which lasted for a minute and a half, and which cracked the walls of the City Hall.

The Wilmington (Del.) Journal says that kidnapping is of more frequent occurrence in that city and county than is generally imagined. On Wednesday night last a negro was kidnapped in Wilmington in the most flagrant manner, and the person committing the outrage formerly belonged to the city watch.

The Legislature of Massachusetts have passed the following order: "That a reward of $2,000 be offered to any person within this Commonwealth, who shall satisfy the Governor and Council, that, by a test of at least five successive years, he has discovered a sure and practical remedy for the potato rot."

A meeting was held at Knoxville, Feb. 18, to take initiatory steps for uniting with the people of East Tennessee in an earnest application to the Legislature for a more efficient system of common schools. A general convention for East Tennessee is to be held the 7th of May.

The number of children in Massachusetts who are supported at the public charge, is 3664, of whom 2158, or 58 per cent., are males. In Boston there are 1040, of whom 662 are males—63 per cent.

A post-office clerk at Augusta, Ga., named Brown, has been arrested on a charge of robbing letters. The amount he abstracted is over one thousand dollars. He confessed the crime.

DIED.

Near Shiloh, N. J., on the 15th of February, Jedediah Hall, in the 81st year of his age. Bro. Hall was a member of the Shiloh Church about fifty-three years, and although for the last thirty years of his life he was deprived of sight, he was far more conversant with the Holy Scriptures than most of his covenant brethren. He was a man of good understanding and deep piety, and we trust has gone home to glory.

Daguerrean Gallery.

GURNEY'S Daguerrean Gallery, No. 189 Broadway, has been known for years as one of the first establishments of the kind in the United States, and the oldest in the city of New York. He has recently greatly enlarged his Gallery by the addition of more rooms and large skylights, and other improvements, rendering it one of the most extensive establishments in this country. Mr. G. attends personally to his sitters, and from his great experience in the art he is enabled, at all times, to give perfect satisfaction. The large-sized pictures recently taken by his new process are universally acknowledged superior to any heretofore taken in this country. A large collection can be seen at all hours of the day. Ladies and gentlemen are respectfully invited to examine them.

New York and Boston Steamboats.

REGULAR MAIL LINE BETWEEN NEW YORK AND BOSTON, via Stonington and Providence. Inland route, without ferry, change of cars or baggage! The steamers C. VANDERBILT, Capt. Joel Stone, and COMMODORE, Capt. William H. Frazee, in connection with the Stonington and Providence, and Boston and Providence Railroads, leaving New York daily, (Sundays excepted,) from pier 2 North River, first whar above Battery Place, at 5 o'clock P. M., and Stonington at 8 o'clock P. M., or upon the arrival of the mail train from Boston. The C. Vanderbilt will leave New York Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday. Leave Stonington Monday, Wednesday, and Friday. The Commodore will leave New York Monday, Wednesday, and Friday. Leave Stonington Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday.

Agents Wanted,

FOR THE "BEST JUVENILE MAGAZINE IN AMERICA."

WOODWORTH'S YOUTH'S CABINET, elegantly illustrated, and filled with the choicest gems for the young, has recently entered upon a new volume. It is more attractive and popular than ever. "It is a little world within itself," to use the language of a metropolitan newspaper; and the price is only $1 a year.

Now is the time for Agents. The publisher wishes to employ fifty or more gentlemen, in different parts of the Union—North, South, East, and West—to act as Agents for the work. Their business will be to travel and to obtain subscribers. There is no periodical, of whatever character, which commands so ready and so general favor as Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet. It is a universal favorite. Those who devote their time wholly or mainly to the interests of this publication, will receive a compensation which cannot fail to be satisfactory.

Persons desiring an agency will please address the publisher (post-paid) with responsible testimonials as to character and ability. No time should be lost, as now is the best time to subscribe. Every particular respecting the agency will be immediately forwarded on application. Specimens of the work sent gratis.

D. A. WOODWORTH, 118 Nassau-st., N. Y.

In Preparation—Valuable New Works.

NATIONAL SERIES OF AMERICAN HISTORIES.—GOULD & LINCOLN have in course of preparation a series of Histories of the most interesting and important events which have occurred in the United States since the first settlement of the country. They will embrace the trials and adventures of the early colonists, both at the North and the South, their peculiarities of character and manners, their intercourse and conflicts with the natives, the gradual development of their institutions, sketches of their prominent men in both the Church and the State, incidents in the Revolution, with various other subjects of interest of more recent date. It is intended to be a NATIONAL SERIES OF AMERICAN HISTORY, adapted to the popular mind, and especially to the youth of our country, illustrated with numerous fine engravings; each volume to be complete in itself; yet, when all are published, to form a regular consecutive series, consisting of twelve or more volumes, 13mo, of about 300 pages each.

Cyclopedia of Anecdotes of Literature and the Fine Arts.

ALSO,

CYCLOPEDIA OF SCIENTIFIC ANECDOTES.

The First, containing a copious and choice selection of Anecdotes on the various forms of Literature, of the Arts, of Architecture, Engravings, Music, Poetry, Painting, and Sculpture, and of the most celebrated Literary Characters and Artists of different countries and ages.

The Second, containing a similar selection respecting the various Sciences and Mechanical Arts, of their most distinguished votaries. The two together, embracing the larger portion of the best Anecdotes in Ancient and Modern collections, as well as in various Histories, Biographies, and Files of Periodical Literature.

The whole classified under appropriate subjects, alphabetically arranged, and each supplied with a very full and particular index of topics and names, by author of "Cyclopedia of Moral and Religious Anecdotes;" the whole to be comprised in Sixteen Numbers, at 25 cents per Number, making two large 8vo volumes of about 700 pages each, illustrated with numerous fine engravings. The first number will be issued about the first of April, to be continued semi-monthly until completed.

KAZLITT ARVINE, A. M.,

Miscellaneous.

Try Again.

There's always something in the breast,
Which whispers, clear and plain,
"There's work to do; why idly rest?
Up, up, and try again."

There's magic in these little words,
Which have a greater power
Than level'd guns, or flashing swords,
In danger's darkest hour;
And when they're used to prompt the right,
To soothe distress and pain,
They bear a tone of glorious might—
"Up, up, and try again!"

The little flower, which lifts its head
Up to the sunlit sky,
Bow'd down beneath the heavy tread,
Does not lie there and die;
There is a voice, borne by the winds,
Which vibrates o'er the plain,
And says, unheard by passing hinds,
"Up, up, and try again!"

The student, poring o'er his books,
By the dim midnight oil,
With wearied eyes and haggard looks,
Fails, but renews his toil;
The man of science, searching out
Great truth, with throbbing brain,
Says, mid confusion dark, and doubt,
"Up, up, and try again!"

And that should be the watchword cry
Of all the good and wise,
Together banded, sworn to dry
The mourner's weeping eyes;
To set up Love and earnest Work
Where Vice and Sloth now reign;
Though long they toil, still let them cry—
"We'll conquer—Try again!"

Three Ships Burnt at Sea.

We have been furnished, says the Boston Journal, with the following highly interesting letter, giving the particulars of the destruction by fire at sea of three coal-laden ships, a brief account of which we have already published. The writer is Mrs. Bates, the wife of the Captain of the Nonantum, the first vessel mentioned. The letter is dated Bay of Sechura, Coast of Peru, Jan. 17, 1851, and after a few lines of a private nature says:—

I will now commence my narrative. After we left Baltimore, we proceeded on our voyage pleasantly, and I assure you I never enjoyed myself more. Nothing occured to mar our enjoyment until we were about in the latitude of the River Platte, when William discovered smoke issuing from the after hatch, and then the startling truth flashed upon our minds that the ship was on fire. She was loaded very deep with coal, which was taken out of the mines, brought directly down to the ship in the cars, turned (sometimes soaking wet, from the rain that fell on the way) directly into the ship's hold—and there it had remained heating through all the hot weather, until the gas that originated from it had generated fire. This result was feared by some before we sailed.

Imagine our situation—eight hundred miles from land, on board a burning ship, with very inclement weather, so rough that boats like ours could not possibly live for any length of time. There was no other way but to smother the fire as much as possible, and bear up for the nearest land—the Falkland Islands. The crew immediately commenced getting up provisions and water sufficient to last until we could arrive at the Islands, and during the short time they were employed between decks, so powerful was the gas that some of the men fell down senseless from its effects. They then caulked every seam and the hatches as tight as possible, and yet gas and smoke would escape through seams which were apparently water-tight. The gas finally filled the cabin so that we were obliged to vacate it. We were in momentary expectation of an explosion, as such things had been known to occur in similar situations. We had our boats ready to launch in case the fire broke out, although we did not suppose for a moment they could live. We were eight days in this situation before we discovered land. There were two men stationed aloft to keep a look out, and William was on the house. It was very thick, and soon William sung out "Land ho!" I shall never forget that joyful sound. Presently the high rocks, called the Volunteer Rocks, which make off two miles, began to heave in sight, and I can assure you those barren rocks presented to us a most welcome appearance. We ran into a little cove, under the lee of the land, and anchored that night, for it was blowing a close-reefed top-sail breeze, right down the harbor. The next day we beat up to the settlement, called Port Stanly, an English colony, consisting of 400 people. We had a survey upon the ship—opened her hatches, and found her all on fire. We commenced throwing water into the hold with an engine, but the fire still increasing there was no alternative left but to run the ship on shore and scuttle her. This was done, and after the fire was extinguished we went to work and stripped the wreck. Everything between decks was saved in a damaged state, and was sold at auction. She was dreadfully burnt inside. Her beams and stancheons were burnt off, and her lower deck had fallen in. She was so burnt at the bottom that she bilged immediately, although she was run on shore where it was very soft bottom.

After the business was all settled we should have come directly home, but the island being very little frequented by vessels, we might have remained there a year perhaps before an opportunity would have enabled us to return. There was in port a Scotch ship from Dundee, bound for Valparaiso, whence we should be more likely to have an opportunity of returning home. We left the Falklands about the 25th of November, in this ship, which was loaded with coal, but which had been in so long that we thought there was no danger from it. We had been at sea twelve days, and were just round Cape Horn, when we discovered the ship to be on fire, and it increased so rapidly that in three or four hours she was in flames.

We were at this time seventy miles from land, and immediately made preparations to take to the boats, preferring to take our chance of gaining the land, although it was an inhospitable coast, inhabited only by savages. Just at this moment a sail hove in sight. We hoisted a signal of distress, and she bore down for us. She proved to be an English ship called the Symetry, loaded with coal, bound to Acapulco. Capt. Thompson, her commander, took us all on board, and in a short time we saw the fine ship Humayoon burn to the water's edge.

We remained on board the Symetry 12 days, when a large ship hove in sight, and in answer to our signals hove to. She proved to be the American ship Fanchon, of Newburyport, Captain Lunt, bound to San Francisco. She loaded at Baltimore with coal at the same time we did. The Captain invited us to come on board his fine ship, and we at once accepted the invitation. The ship was 1,000 tons burthen, and had in 1,200 tons of coal. On the 25th of December, when we were in the Pacific, 1,200 miles from land, we discovered the Fanchon to be on fire! Efforts were immediately made to make her as tight as possible, and Captain Lunt shaped his course for the main land. We were on board this burning ship three weeks, and imagination cannot conceive the anxiety of our minds during this time. We never saw a sail of any kind from the time the fire was first discovered until we saw the land, and then nothing but those little "Catamarans."

Capt. Lunt ran the ship into a small bay, called the Bay of Sechura, anchored about two miles from the shore, at 4 o'clock P. M. He immediately commenced landing the dunnage in the surf on a good sandy beach. A tent was built, and, after taking everything off the ship's deck, they opened the hatches, and no sooner were they raised than she was one sheet of flame below. The hatches were put on again, and she was run on shore and scuttled, but the flames were too far advanced to prevent her from burning. And there lay that noble ship in this lonely bay, and burned to the water's edge.

[A postscript to the letter says, that the writer remained on the beach for one week, when the whole party were taken off by a brig and carried to Payta, where they were entertained at the American Consul's house. From Payta, the writer, with her husband, intended taking passage for San Francisco in an American vessel then loading for that port.]

The Deaf and Dumb.

From the Annual Reports of the Institutions for the Deaf and Dumb in Pennsylvania, Indiana, and Illinois, a writer for the N. Y. Tribune makes up the following account of their present condition and prospects:—

In the Pennsylvania Institution there were 134 pupils at the close of 1850, of whom 44 were admitted during that year; 14 had left, and 3 had died. Ninety-two were supported by Pennsylvania, 8 by New Jersey, 18 by Maryland, 3 by Delaware, and 13 by their friends. The pupils are divided into seven classes, of nineteen each. Trades are taught them, and their understandings are assiduously cultivated. Of the number admitted during the year, 29 were born deaf; a number lost their hearing by scarlet fever at an early age; others by whooping-cough, measles, etc. None are admitted into this Institution under ten years of age.

In the Indiana Institution, under the care of Mr. J. S. Brown, the mutes of that State have been afforded a comfortable and spacious home, which is unsurpassed by any kindred institution in the Union. The new buildings were completed in the summer of 1850, and were occupied on the 2d of October last. The number of pupils in attendance in January, 1851, was 125; total number enrolled, 141. The Agricultural Department in this Institution has been placed on a very satisfactory footing, by the employment of an experienced scientific farmer. The land belonging to the State, for the use of the Asylum, amounts to one hundred and twenty acres. By a legislative enactment, all the mutes of the State are alike entitled to the privileges of the Asylum, free of charge. Indiana has the proud distinction of being the first State in the Union to adopt this principle. Illinois was the first to follow the example, and it is believed that Ohio will adopt the same course, at least, in part of her benevolent Institutions.

In the Illinois Asylum, the number of pupils has increased from 77 in 1849, to 95 at the close of 1850. The estimated value of labor performed in this Institution during the year—under the plan of securing physical as well as mental and moral training to its pupils—was above $2,330. A large amount of manual labor has also been performed on the grounds of the Institution. The yearly expenses of the Asylum exceed $12,000; the ratio of expense per pupil is $120 to $125 annually. The Superintendent is Mr. Thomas Officer. Pupils are not admitted under the age of 10; natives of the State are admitted free of charge, while those from other States pay $100 in advance. Missouri, Iowa, and Wisconsin, having no provision for the instruction of this class of persons, send their pupils to the Illinois Asylum. There are now in that Institution 11 from Illinois, 2 from Iowa, and 1 from Wisconsin.

It is gratifying to learn that the pupils of these excellent Institutions manifest a commendable spirit of industry, both in their courses of study, and in the various branches of useful labor which are taught them. The importance of trades is urged by the Superintendents with great earnestness, as a preparation for the pupil's future life. The necessity of a careful selection of the kind of reading provided for the Deaf and Dumb is also commended to the consideration of parents, guardians, and friends. "A mute," says one Report, "reads no work which he fully understands, without drinking in much of its spirit, and living over in imagination the scenes which it depicts. Hundreds of books that might be named, which would produce but a slight effect on others, will prove positively injurious to them."

The World's Fair.

The great London Exhibition is to be opened in May. The conditions of admission are described in the following paragraph from the London Times of Feb. 11th:—"Tickets of the first class are to be saleable at three guineas for a gentleman's and two for a lady's ticket, and these vouchers will procure admission at all times when the Exhibition is open to the public. On the first day of all, the right of entrance will belong to the holders of these 'season tickets' exclusively, no offer or money being receivable at the doors on this occasion. On the second and third days, the price of admission, for the day only, will be £1; and on the fourth day 5s., at which sum the entrance-fee will continue stationary for the space of three weeks. On the 22d day the price will fall to 1s., so to remain during the period of exhibition, with the exception of the Fridays and Saturdays in each week, on the former of which days the cost of admission will be always 2s 6d., and on the latter 5s.

Clover and Gypsum.

Clover was cultivated first, we believe, among the Dutch and Flemish farmers, and formed one of the leading causes of the great superiority of the husbandry of the Netherlands over that of the countries around it. From thence it was introduced into Great Britain in the 16th century, where it has been instrumental in converting some of the most barren and worthless soils into the most fertile and profitable. Clover and gypsum were brought into the United States about 1770, from Germany, where the benefits resulting from the application of the latter in the growth of the former had been discovered by accident. And often thus are facts of vast importance brought to light—facts whose application in practice exerts an immeasurable influence upon the prosperity of a country.

From the analysis of clover may be seen at a glance the reason why gypsum, or plaster of Paris, is so useful in promoting its growth. In 100 parts of the ash of clover hay there are of the salts of magnesia and lime 56.00; and of silica 4.90. The constituents of gypsum furnish nearly one-half of these elements.

But this is not the only or the most important of its modes of action. "Gypsum," says Liebig, "has the power of fixing in the soil the ammonia of the atmosphere, which would otherwise be volatilized with the water which evaporates." But we will not enter upon the disputed question of the way in which plaster acts upon plants, but rather speak of the manner in which we may avail ourselves of its unquestioned power to further our interests.

In restoring worn-out soils to fertility, clover and plaster fill an important part in the management and economy of the thorough farmer. Profitable as a crop, and cheap and easy in application, clover is perhaps the best manure, for soils suited to its growth, with which we are acquainted. Mr. Croom, a Georgia farmer, estimates a good clover ley as equal in its effects to a broadcast manuring of stable compost; while other judicious agriculturists, from their own experience, think the benefit resulting equal to two such manurings.

Clover makes but slight demand upon the constituents of fertility in the surface soil—drawing freely upon the atmosphere, while its large and numerous roots, as well as extensive stalks and abundant leaves, supply much vegetable matter. A luxuriant growth of clover is an excellent preparation for any and every crop. The soil is loosened deeply and finely by its roots, which bring to their support, and to the surface, the valuable salts in the subsoil, not usually pressed into service. This, too, is the reason why clover so delights in a deep and vigorous soil—and why, where the subsoil plow has been used, such abundant crops are sure to follow.

The usual method of seeding with clover is to sow it early in the spring upon winter grain, to be followed in May by a top dressing of one or two bushels of gypsum to the acre. It is sometimes sown with barley or oats—but whenever or wherever, it should have its dressing of plaster. Lime, ashes, and salt, are also valuable adjuncts in its production. But so universal is its culture, and so well understood its importance, that we hardly need add farther, and perhaps unnecessary remarks upon the subject.

Printing by Water Power.

The proprietors of the Boston Traveler have just introduced, in connection with their fast press, a new motive power as applied to a printing press. Mr. Samuel Huse, an ingenious mechanic of Boston, has recently invented a wheel, which, driven by a two-inch stream of water, fed by a lead pipe, produces a force of three horse power. This machine was originally invented as a water measurer; and this is the first application of it as a motive power, it being found to possess this power in a most unexpected and extraordinary degree. It is simple, yet wonderfully efficient. It consists of a hollow cylinder, 10 inches wide and 16 inches in diameter; inside of which is a flange cylinder, about 6 inches in diameter. This inner cylinder has flanges, on which are four valves, extending from the one end to the other of the cylinder, and attached to it by hinges. These valves, when folded, or shut into the cylinder, form a little more than half its surface. Upon one side of the metre, the space between the inside of the hollow and the surface of the flange cylinder is so filled as to occupy something more than the width of one of the valves. This filling is made to fit so exactly as to prevent the water from passing. Upon one side of this filling the water enters the metre, and upon the other side is discharged. The metre is so placed that the valves will, by the force of gravity, open as they reverse from under the solid filling, and shut upon the opposite side previous to coming in contact with it. When thus arranged, the water is let into the cylinder, and comes in contact with the open valves; the inner cylinder revolves until the water escapes from the opposite side; and, of course, for every revolution of the interior cylinder, a given quantity of water must pass through the meter. This is carefully marked by means of a clock, which is attached to the cylinder, and which will indicate the precise quantity of water which has passed through the machine in any given time. The revolving flange cylinder is connected, externally, with cog wheels, a shaft and pulley; and from the pulley a belt extends to the driving wheel of the printing machine. This metre, or water-wheel, is driven by the Cochituate water, introduced from a six-inch distributing pipe, through a two-inch lead pipe; and the flow of the water is regulated by means of a screw gate near the metre. This wheel, though so small as to occupy only about 24 inches of room, affords about three horse motive power.

A Moral Wreck.—A correspondent of the Cincinnati Christian Advocate gives the following account of a distinguished man he encountered on a steamer as he was passing down the Ohio:—

"Among our passengers is Ex-Governor ——, formerly territorial governor, and once in the senate of the United States. He studied law in the same office with Henry Clay, and is about the same age with that distinguished statesman. His time on board, when not eating or sleeping, is spent in gambling and drinking. During such time, he is generally profaning God's name. Occasionally you can withdraw his attention from these things, and, when accomplished, you will find him a 'walking bookcase,' so retentive is his memory. He can give you correct dates of our political history during all the administrations; and he was connected personally with all except Washington and the elder Adams. His literary taste and knowledge is of the first class. How lamentable that such a man, now so near the grave, should prostitute his talents, time, and service to sin!"

Private History of the Pope.

The following remarks on the private history of the Pope were made at a Catholic soiree at Carlisle, by the Rev. C. Clifton:—

"Pope Pius the Ninth, who at present sits in the chair of St. Peter, was born of a noble family, and in his early youth he entered the army. Having been attacked by a serious illness, on his restoration to health, he, in gratitude for his recovery, embraced the ecclesiastical state. For some time he was employed on a mission in South America. After his recall he was appointed Apostolic Nuncio at Naples. By his indefatigable and praiseworthy labors there, particularly during the prevalence of the cholera, he gained the golden opinions of all men. He sold his horses, his carriage, and his furniture, and ministered to the necessities of the sick and dying; and when questioned on this point, he replied, 'It is not fitting that the ministers of Christ should ride in carriages when the poor of Christ's people are dying in the streets.' He was afterwards appointed Bishop of Imola, and on the death of Gregory the Sixteenth he was finally elected Pope. On hearing the news of his election he fainted away, and it was only after the repeated solicitations of the cardinals that he accepted the office. He accepted it, exclaiming, 'Lord, notwithstanding the unworthiness of thy servant, thy will be done.' His tiara has truly proved to him a crown of thorns."

Disciplining Fowls.

The Chinese, living in canal boats, send their ducks ashore, during the day time, to earn their living, and whistle them home at night. The last duck gets a switching; there is, consequently, a duck race—each one trying not to be the last.

Some years back, I kept a few fowls, and among them was a very fine, large, Dominique cock, that would get into my flower garden, and then call all his family about him. There was, of course, great scratching among them until I interrupted the sport by driving them off. The hens would fly in great alarm; not so chanticleer; but, perching himself on the fence, he would send me a crow of defiance, and as soon as my back was turned, cluck a recall to his hens.

This scene was repeated so often that at last I got out of patience with his impudence, and ran him down. When caught, I thought the Chinese method of drilling birds of another feather might have some effect upon my prisoner; so, holding by his legs, I laid him down at his favorite scratching ground, and, with a light switch, whipped him across the wings. After he had been well chastized, I let go of him and arose; but he lay still. I stepped back a foot or two, when he raised his head. At a threatening motion of my switch, however, he laid his head down again. I then retreated some twenty feet, keeping my eye upon him, and holding the switch "in terrorem." He lay almost perfectly quiet during the time. Occasionally he would raise his head, but the slightest motion of my right arm, at this distance, was sufficient to make him resume his very unnatural position.

Being much amused at the success of my experiment, I held him in this position by the power of whip and eye, for some fifteen minutes, and, in the end, had a little difficulty in starting him off.

The consequence was a complete reformation in his moral character, and he never afterwards trespassed on grounds that were forbidden him.

Probably some of the farmer boys that read the Evening Post, may like to repeat the experiment; if so, let me advise them not to act cruelly towards what ought to be the pet of the farm-yard. The lightest possible switch should be used—a blade of grass will almost answer. It is not the pain he suffers, but the degradation, that has effect.

The Miracle Machine.

An English paper gives the following recipe for the manufacture of bleeding saints:—

"Take an oil painting of a wounded man, cover the back of the canvas with pitch, cut out a portion of the latter immediately behind the part depicted as a wound, pierce the canvas at that part with several stabs of a cobbler's awl from back to front, place in the opening made by the removed pitch a piece of sponge saturated with blood thinned with water, cover the opening with a plug of pitch, the application of a hot iron removing the appearance of a seam round the plug. The 'miracle' may now be worked by gentle pressure, either from behind or in front of the pictured wound, which, squeezing the sponge, causes the bloody liquid to exude through the holes made by the cobbler's awl, and trickle out in the most natural and surprising manner, to the edification of all beholders. The 'miracle' is capable of being produced by other means, but upon the same principle. The application of a white handkerchief to the wound, and with some pressure, will assist in establishing the 'miracle.'"

Bedding for Strawberries.—It is an excellent thing to cover the ground around your strawberry plants. It keeps the soil light, warm, and moist, keeps down the weeds, and keeps the fruit from being covered with sand. The Prairie Farmer says:

"The English use straw—hence the name strawberry. Of late, spent tan-bark is much recommended; and where plenty, is no doubt a first-rate article; we have seen it stated somewhere, that it is apt to flavor the fruit. This would be fatal to it if true to any great extent. Saw-dust—which, by the way, is a first-rate manure—would be unexceptionable, and would be far better employed in mulching lands than in floating down creeks, or going off in smoke to the clouds. Let those who live near saw-mills look out for the saw-dust—it will pay for hauling."

To a Bereaved Mother.

BY HERMANN.

Its smile and happy laugh are lost to thee,
Earth must his mother and his pillow be.
W. G Clark.

Mother, now thy task is done.
Now thy vigil ended;
With the coming of the sun,
Grief and joy are blended.

Grief that thus thy flower of love
From its stem is riven;
Joy that it will bloom above,
'Midst the bowers of Heaven.

Gone, as oft expires the light
Of thy nightly taper;
Gone, as 'fore the sunshine bright,
Early morning's vapor.

Kiss its lips so mute and cold,
Cold as chiseled marble;
They will now to harp of gold
Glad hosannas warble.

At the last they sweetly smiled,
Told it not for gladness;
Would'st thou now recall thy child
To a world of sadness?

It is hard to gather up
Ties so rudely riven;
But thou'lt find this bitter cup
For thy weal was given.

Kiss again its hands so white,
Kiss its marble forehead;
Soon the grave will hide from sight,
That thou only borrowed.

Thou wilt meet thy child again,
Where no death or sorrow
Bring their sad to-day of pain,
And their dread to-morrow.

Modern Church Life.

It is said that in Sweden a physician has discovered a process of applying gradually increasing degrees of cold to all kinds of animals, from lizards up to man; and thus reducing them to a pefectly torpid state, without destroying life. Some culprits of the government have been taken through these different stages, and so long as kept at the proper temperature, proserved insensible for weeks, months, and even years; after which, by restoring warmth, they have been brought back to consciousness.

The fellowship of church members thus exists, all petrified and frozen up for long periods. It is not dead. It is there. It is alive; but only now and then, after months and years of torpor, is it thawed out in consciousness and activity. There is in our churches a mysterious energy, that only needs waking up. There is a real life, a something between which and the spiritual death of false and formal systems of religion, there is placed an immeasurable and impassable gulf. Still it is only a spark of life. It wants waking up, drawing out, and fanning to a flame.

Important Geographical Discovery.—At a late meeting of the Royal Geographical Society at London, it was announced that Rev. D. Livingstone, of the London Missionary Society, had discovered another large lake in South Africa, about 200 miles north of Lake Ngami, which he recently made known to the world. The new lake contains several large islands, and is connected with the Ngami by a rapid stream called the Teage. At the date of the last advices, Mr. Livingstone was proceeding northward. If he carries out his plan of exploration some important questions in African geography will be solved. [Bos. Trav.

Variety.

In the "Statistics of Lowell Manufactures," it is stated that there are twelve corporations of different kinds, which have fifty mills; their united capital is $13,362,400; they have 325,500 spindles, 9,906 looms, and employ 8,274 females and 3,702 males, and consume 575,400 lbs. of cotton and 69,000 lbs. of wool per week. The average wages of females, clear of board, per week, is $2, and of males $4 80; the average per spindle, yards per day, 1⅛. There are other manufactures in the same place than those specified above, of a value of $1,500,000, employing a capital of $400,000, and about 1,500 hands.

People, says Gœthe, are always talking about originality, but what do they mean? As soon as we are born the world begins to work upon us, and this goes on to the end. And, after all, what can we call our own, except energy, strength, and will? If I could give an account of all that I owe to great predecessors and cotemporaries, there would be but a small balance in my favor.

A loin of mutton was on the table, and the gentleman opposite took the carver in his hand. "Shall I cut it saddlewise?" he asked. "You had better cut it bridlewise," said his neighbor, "for then we shall all have a better chance to get a bit in our mouths!"

One of the best means to arrest dueling, suggests the Albany Dutchman, would be to pass a law forbidding the parties to have seconds. Men are so fond of applause, that they will not even make fools of themselves, unless there be somebody present to admire the manner.

A man with eleven daughters, was complaining that he found it difficult to live. "You must husband your time," said another, "and then you will do well enough." "I could do much better," was the reply, "if I could husband my daughters."

An Eastern caliph being sorely afflicted with ennui, was advised that an exchange of shirts with a man who was perfectly happy, would cure him. After a long search he discovered such a man, but was informed that the happy fellow had no shirt.

Soon after the battle of Logan, a wit observed that Bonaparte must now be in funds, for he had lately received a check on the bank of the Danube.

Out of any one hundred men you run against, you will find ninety-five worrying themselves into low spirits and indigestion, about troubles which will never come to pass.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year of this Seminary, for 1850 and '51, will commence the third Wednesday in August, and continue forty-four weeks, including a short recess between the terms, and one of ten days for the winter holidays.

The year is divided into three terms:—

The first, of 14 weeks, begins Wednesday, August 21st, and ends Wednesday, November 27th.

The second, of 15 weeks, begins Monday, December 2d, and ends Friday, March 14th.

The third, of 14 weeks, begins Tuesday, March 18th and ends Tuesday, June 24th.

Board of Instruction.

GURDON EVANS, A. M., President,
And Professor of Mathematics and Natural Science.
Rev. JOSEPH W. MORTON,
Professor of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, Spanish, and Moral and Intellectual Science.
Mrs. SUSANNA M. SPICER, Preceptress.
ADOLPH ROSENHAYN,
(Late of Friedrick Wilhelm College, Berlin,)
Teacher of German, Piano Forte, and Assistant in Greek and Latin.

Other competent Teachers will be employed as occasion may demand.

TEACHERS' CLASSES will be formed, as usual, at the beginning of the Fall and middle of the Winter Terms, and continue seven weeks.

In the Common Branches, classes will be formed at the commencement of each term; but in the higher, the interest of the student, as well as the welfare of the Institution, demand that a more systematic course of study be pursued.

In the Natural Sciences, Elementary Chemistry and Philosophy will be pursued during the Fall Term Agricultural Chemistry, Astronomy, and Physiology during the Winter Term; Botany and Geology during the Summer Term.

Classes will be formed in Latin, French, and German, at the commencement of the Fall Term; in Hebrew, Greek, and Spanish, at the commencement of the Winter Term, and continue through the course of study.

In Mathematics, Geometry is studied in the Fall, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, and Astronomy, Surveying, Navigation, &c., in the Summer Term.

The course of instruction in Agriculture is thorougly scientific, embracing study and recitation in the best authors. Instruction is given in a well-furnished laboratory, in the analysis of soils, ashes of plants, manures, &c. and the modes of testing for their constituent elements. The attention of farmers who wish to give their sons a practical education is especially called to this department.

Board in private families, from $1 25 to $1 50. Many students board in clubs for 60 to 75 cents.

Tuition—to be settled upon entering school—from $3 00 to $5 00. Extras—For Drawing, $1 00; Oil Painting, $5 00; Chemical Experiments, $1 00; Writing, including stationery, 50 cents; Piano Forte, $8 00; Use of Instrument, $2 00; Agricultural Chemistry, including chemicals, apparatus, and fuel, (breakage extra,) $12 00.

It is very desirable that students should enter at the beginning of the term; yet they are received into classes already formed at any time.

For farther information, address Gurdon Evans, J. W. Morton, or Rev. J. R. Irish, President of the Corporation.

"EQUALITY OF THE RACES."

Reply to Tamar Davis.

At this stage of a discussion already sufficiently protracted, it may not be inappropriate to call the mind of the reader to the true question at issue. The proposition which I have endeavored to establish is this: "The various races of men—viz., the Caucasian, Mongolian, American, Ethiopian or Negro, and Malay races—are equal in original mental capability or endowment." Now, if individuals and nations can be found in any one of these races, equally far advanced in the development of these original faculties as those of other races, the conclusion is inevitable, that the capabilities of the one are equal to those of the other; for, without equal capability, equal development of course is impossible. With this view, I have introduced two of the most renowned nations of antiquity; and, by the best historical and scientific testimony which ancient and modern times have ever produced, I have shown them to possess all the physical characteristics which distinguish the Negro race; whence I have deduced the equal capability of that race. My opponent has quoted various authors, and among them, in her last article, an Arab and a Moor, living in the twelfth century, to show—what? Why, just what every student of history knew before—that certain tribes of the Ethiopian race in Africa are low in the scale of mental development. What does this weigh against our proposition, when we have shown that these same "Canaanites," a little farther back in the world's history, have reared the proudest monuments of man's mental divinity? What does this weigh, when we have shown that even to-day, in the language of Dr. Goode, "multitudes of principalities of Negroes exist; whose national virtues would do honor to the most polished states of Europe?" What does this weigh, when we compare it with the fact, that multitudes of Caucasian tribes exist as low as these Negro tribes. In the very heart of Europe, under the shades of Switzer's snowy peaks, there lives a tribe of Caucasian idiots. By numberless examples of this kind, I might prove the inferiority of any race of men. But it is an evasion of the question. I echo my friend's injunction, "This question must be tried by generalities."

"My friend enters into a laborious metaphysical discussion on the nature of the soul, the annihilation of its faculties, and similar subjects; and attempts to prove that we must either admit the equality of the races, or deny their unity. I will inform him, that we are reduced to no such extremity. He says, 'The aboriginal Australian is not incapable of European civilization.' True."

Verily, "Parturiunt montes, nascetar ridiculus mus." I have quoted an eminent naturalist, who says, that the Australian, the lowest in the scale of mental development, is capable of the civilization of the European, the highest in that scale, as is claimed by my friend. This is the identical proposition which I have tried to establish; I have tried to establish no other, and to this my friend says, "True." So say I; so says reason; so says history; so says the Bible.

Again, she quotes me: "I have the best testimony of the literary world, that not only the Negroes, but tribes of other races immensely below him, are capable of Caucasian civilization;" to which she replies, "Granted." Truly, my proposition has a witness where I least expected it!

"I will inform him, that we are reduced to no such extremity." But how does my opponent avoid the extremity? Just as every one must, by admitting the equal capability of the races. There is no other way of avoiding it.

"But," says the writer, "the question is, Would he ever civilize himself, as the Caucasian nations have civilized themselves? . . . Could he bring himself up?" This is entirely a new question, not at all involved in the controversy. The question is, whether the races are capable of equal civilization by any means, and not whether those means are internal or external to the race. This is another evasion. But I am as willing to join issue with my friend on this, as on the original question. Her broad assertions must come to the test of historical criticism.

She affirms, without effort at proof, that "the Caucasian nations have civilized themselves." What a repudiation of the great law of national dependencies! The human race is a chain of dependencies, reaching from the beginning to the end of its existence. The several races are all links in this great chain, and

> "Whatever link you strike,
> Tenth or ten thousandth, snaps the chain alike."

We may safely "summon the record of ages past," to attest that no nation on earth ever did "civilize itself;" and the reason of the universe, to attest, that no nation ever will "civilize itself." There is not, and never has been, a civilized nation on earth, whose civilization is not attributable, in the main, to the influence of other nations, and these to others still, and so continuing back to a direct revelation from Heaven, without which even the mighty Caucasian would have lain forever under the dreary shades of moonless midnight.

Let us look a little, and see whether Japheth owes any thing to Ham, and even to Canaan, the son of Ham. My friend has placed the Pelasgi, the ancient Grecians, among Caucasian nations. This is correct; they were undoubtedly sons of Japheth. Let us look at them through the eye of history in early times.

Tytler's History, p. 23—"The extreme barbarism of the Pelasgi, who are said to have been cannibals, and ignorant of the use of fire, has its parallel in modern barbarous nations."

Robbins' History, p. 30—"The ancient inhabitants of Greece were extremely rude and savage, scarcely one degree above the brutes. They lived on herbs and roots, and lay either in the open fields, or sheltered themselves in dens and hollow trees."
